These Positions, which at the same time were fixed upon S. Paul's Church-doors, found a very favourable Reception in the Houses, and had so great a Party for them, that the Prelates were afraid all their gainful Doctrines and Practices, which were levell'd at in them, would not be long tolerated if the King did but consent to the Majority of the Members, as it was likely he would unless he could be otherwise engaged. This being the only way left, as they imagin'd, to support their tottering Church, Thomas Arundel Archbishop of York, and Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London, sent as was supposed by William Courtney Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Clergy, made a Voyage into Ireland to the King, to complain of the Insolence and Prevalency of the Hereticks, as they call'd them, and to beseech him to engage his Power in the defence of the Church and Religion, which without his assistance was in great danger of being ruin'd. The King, who was always zealous for the Religion he had been train'd up in, gave much attention to the Bishop's Importunities, and promising them his Protection, compos'd his Affairs in Ireland as fast as he could, and return'd about Easter into England.

The King's Actions against the Lollards.

Soon after his arrival he began to look into the Grounds of the Bishop's Complaint against the Lollards, and finding that some of his own Servants and Officers, viz. Sir Richard Story, Sir Lewis Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, and Sir John Montacute, had been most forward to encourage and uphold them, he called them before him, and made them severally swear, that they would not from thence forward hold or maintain any such erroneous Opinions; adding himself, that if they were found again to do it, they should certainly die for it. Having thus laid a restraint and check upon the chief Abettors of the Hereticks, he proceeded to suppress them, by giving the Bishops a Charge to execute their Offices diligently in their Diocesses, according to the Canon, to correct all Offenders, search out and examine all English Books, root out all erroneous Teachers and Doctrines with all their endeavours, and to bring all the People into the Unity of the Catholic Faith. And that the Laity as well as Clergy might advance this holy Design, as he accounted it, he sent out a Commission into all and every Shire of the Kingdom, appointing certain Persons zealous for the Church, to be Searchers out of the Lollards, their Favourers and Books, charging them to use their utmost diligence and care to find them; and when they have apprehended any, to commit them to the next Gaol till he should give farther Orders concerning them. The King was the more zealous in this matter, because Pope Boniface had by his Letters besought him to assist the Bishops in suppressing this Sect, and recommended it to him as a most meritorious Action; yet his Subjects did not shew as much Zeal in persecuting them, as the King did to excite them to it. The Archbishop indeed was active, and began immediately a metropolitan Visitation, in which he made a strict search for the Lollards and their Books, solemnly excommunicated all such Persons as maintained, or caused to be maintained, any of the Errors or Opinions of Mr. John Wickliffe at the Cathedral in Lincoln and Leicester-Abby, and made several to recant, and do penance for holding the said Opinions at Oxford and other places. But we do not find that there were any Prosecutions of them by the Laity, nor several of the Bishops; so that tho' the King had depriv'd them of his Protection, God may seem to have made their Enemies at peace with them.

This Spring the French King being in some doubts which of the Antipopes was to be acknowledged for the Head of the Church, called a General Council of all his most able Divines at Paris, and required their Decision of the dispute that was among the Christian Princes about it. The Divines, after much and serious Debate, determin'd, That Pope Clement was lawfully chosen, and ought to be accepted as the Head of the Church; and confirmed this their Judgment by the University of Paris Seal. The King of France having so good an Authority for adhering to Clement, sent a Copy of their Decision to King Richard, hoping to bring him over to acknowledge him; but King Richard would not subscribe to their Resolution till he had the Judgment of his own Divines upon it, of whom he summon'd immediately a Convocation of the ablest and most learned at Oxford. These, after mature Consideration of the Arguments of the contrary Party, made a contrary Determination for Urban and his Successors, and warranted their Judgment with the University-Seal; by which means the Breach in the Church was made more incurable than it was before, and the Schism much more justifiable.

This Summer the Danish Rovers much infested the British Seas, and did great mischief on the Coasts, plundering the Ships, and robbing the Sea-Towns. On the Coasts of Norfolk they set upon certain Ships belonging to the Merchants of Norwich, and took them, their Cargo being valu'd at twenty thousand Pound. This Wrong so incensed the Inhabitants of those parts, that they mann'd out some Ships to fight them; but after a sharp Engagement were defeated, and many of them taken Prisoners, whom they re-

D. 1395. deemed at a dear rate; and so they returned home enriched by Ransoms, and laden with the plunder'd Goods of the English. William Courtney also Archbishop of Canterbury, purchased a Bull of the Pope to levy 4 d. per Pound upon all the Spiritual Promotions and Benefices within his Province; which tho' it was generally disliked and disgusted by the Clergy, yet was paid by most of them thro' Fear, the Prebendaries of Lincoln being only excepted, who looking upon it as an unreasonable Exaction, utterly deny'd to pay it, and appealed to the Pope; but the Archbishop's Death prevented the farther Progress of the Controversie, which would have proved much more chargeable to them had it continu'd. His Death was esteem'd no small Security for the Followers of Wickliffe, to whom he was a bitter Enemy. John Waltham also Bishop of Salisbury and Lord Treasurer died, and was by the King's Order buried in Westminster among the Kings, and Roger Walden Secretary of State, and Treasurer of Callis, was put in his place. In the latter end of this Year, the King out of the Love he still retained to the Duke of Ireland after his decease, had his Corps fetch'd from Brabant where it lay ignobly interred, and brought into England for a more honourable Burial. It was first embalmed, and richly adorned with Robes, a Chain of Gold about his Neck, and rich Rings on his Fingers; and being put in a Cypress Coffin, the King himself came to view his Body, and to shew his Affection to him, looked on his bare Face and touched him. His Body, after some time, was interred at Coln-Priory in Essex; the King himself, with the Countess of Oxford his Mother, several Bishops and Abbots attending his Corps thither. Very few, or none of the Nobility, would shew any Respect to his Reliques, for the Hatred they bore to him when he was alive; the Memory of the Person being detestible, whom they found so great an Enemy to the common Good, so long as he was in Power and Favour.

The Duke of Lancaster being arriv'd in Aquitain summon'd the Lords and chief Inhabitants of the great Towns, and declar'd to them the Gift of the King of England to him, that their Country was given to him and his Heirs for an Inheritance, and desir'd their peaceable Submission to him as their Supreme Lord. But they returned him answer, That their Country was inseparably united to the Crown of England, and would never submit to him otherwise than as the King of England's Lieutenant. The Duke insisted upon his Gift, but would use no force to compel them to Subjection, unless it were the more lasting ones of Kindness and Moderation; but they constantly stood upon it, that they had ever been govern'd by Kings, and could not be alienated from the Crown of England without a Violation of the King's Coronation Oath, and therefore would never submit to those Terms. At length an Embassy was sent to the King about the Controversie, and tho' the Duke of Glocester (more to keep his Brother out of the Nation, than out of Love to Justice or to his Brother's Interests) pressed the inviolable Nature of the King's Grant to his Brother; yet the Arguments of the People of Aquitain were so prevalent with the King, that it was decreed, That the Country and Dutchy of Aquitain should always remain in the Demesne of the Crown of England, lest at length it should fall into the hand of some Stranger; but the Duke remain'd there governing as the King's Deputy, which Station he manag'd so well, that he gain'd the Love and willing Submission of all the People, being wise, liberal and moderate, so that lest the Grant which the King had so lately recall'd should be obtain'd against his Will, he sent for him home, and eas'd himself of that Jealousie; for tho' the Duke had been at great Expence to purchase their Favour, yet he chose rather to lose his Money than Loyalty, and so returned to the King at Langley, where he kept his Christmas. He stay'd a little at Court, and then retreated to his own House at Lincoln, where he marry'd the Lady Katharine Swinford, who had been his Concubine in his Wife's days, and born him two Sons Thomas and Henry, and one Daughter, whom he named Beaufort. This Match was much disliked by the Court Ladies, and the Dutches of Glocester, Countesses of Warwick, Arundel and Darby, particularly disdain'd her; but her prudent Behaviour conquer'd their Passions, and she became very grateful to them in a short time.

While these things were transacting abroad, the King's Mind inclin'd to a second Marriage; and because he very much desir'd a firm Peace with France, he determin'd to chuse a Wife in that Court, which was the likeliest way to effect his design; and to that end sent an Embassy by the Archbishop of Dublin, the Earls of Rutland and Marshall, and the Lords Beaumont, Spencer and Clifford, to treat of a Marriage between himself and the Lady Isabel the French King's Daughter, who was then but eight Years old. The Proposition was very joyfully accepted, and tho' the Lady had been a little before promis'd to the Duke of Britain's Son in Marriage, yet because this was likely to prove a more advantageous and honourable Match, and would in all Probability settle that Peace, which was so earnestly desired by the French as well as English, an Expedient was resolv'd upon to dissolve the former Contract, and she was assured to the King of England. The Embassadors having been sumptuously entertain'd, and their Charges born by the French King, so long as they were in his Country, returned home with this favourable Answer and Promise, to the great Joy of their Master.

Pope Boniface the IX. who was some time since got into the Papal Chair at Rome, after Pope Urban's decease, by which means the Schism was still upheld, having received Information of the Bishops of England, that the Followers of Wickliffe, notwithstanding all former Endeavours to suppress them, grew more numerous, and were spread almost into all parts of the Nation; the Bishops wanting Power to inflict what their Zeal was ready to do, wrote a second pathetic and earnest Letter to King Richard to assist the Bishops in the Cause of God, <sup>a</sup> Froissart, Vol. IV. Chap. 61. writes he was in the Court of England when these Deputies arriv'd from Aquitain, and that the reason of their desiring not to be alienated from the Crown was, because they depended chiefly upon it for Assistance and Protection.

<sup>b</sup> Henry Earl of Derby, the Duke of Lancaster's Son, was for granting the Petition of the Deputies of Aquitain, and annulling the Donation of that Dutchy to his Father.

<sup>c</sup> The Embassadors had no other Answer from the French King at this time, than that he thank'd his Brother of England for his good Will, but that the Lady was too young, and besides was affianc'd to the Duke of Bretagne, which former Agreement must be dissolv'd before another could be treated of. They carry'd this Answer to their Master, and being sent back with new Proposals, concluded the Treaty of Marriage and Truce.

A. D. 1396. as he call'd it, against the Heretical Teachers of his Realm; and to take care, that the late Statutes of Provifors, called the Premunire and Quare impedit Acts, should be taken away and abolish'd. But we do not find, that this Letter produced any of the desired Effects, the King being otherwise taken up with Matters of State, especially about his Marriage. The Pope at the same time sent over a Recovatory Bull to recall and confine all such Monks again to their several Orders, as had formerly purchased the Privileges of being his Chaplains, either of himself, or of his Nuncios, by which they were exempted from the Rules of their Profession. This was very ungrateful News to the Purchasers, but very acceptable to the Fryars, who were confin'd to their Cloysters: For they were forced with Shame and Loss to return to their Monasteries.

King Richard's Marriage, and the Peace between England and France settled.

The King having been encourag'd in his Proposals of a Marriage in the French Court, was not sluggish in the pursuit of it, but in the beginning of the Spring sent the former Embassadors necessary for the Completion of it; of which one was, That a Truce for thirty Years should be firmly enter'd into by both Nations. These Articles were easily assented to by both sides, and the Lady being marry'd to the Earl Marshal<sup>a</sup> in the Name of Richard King of England by Letters of Proxy, was from thenceforth called the Queen of England. Things being thus concluded in a manner, the King himself (now having enter'd the 20th Year of his Reign) took his Journey to Callis to perfect all things that had been assented to on both sides: He had with him his two Uncles, the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester, with a great number of Peers and Gentlemen. The Place appointed for the Treaty was between Guifnes, a Town on the Borders of the English Pale, and Arde which was on the Confines of the French Territories, rich Pavilions being there erected for the two Kings: The King of France came down with the Dukes of Burgundy, Berry, Britain, and Burbon. About the end of October, the two Kings having first solemnly swore to observe the Laws of Amity at this Interview, came to a Conference about the Peace; and having at several Meetings concluded and agreed on a Peace for thirty Years<sup>b</sup>, upon certain Conditions, they solemnly swore upon the Evangelists to observe and keep it faithfully. Then the King of France, with his own hands, deliver'd his Daughter to King Richard, who thankfully received her, protesting that he took her as the Token of a perpetual Peace between the two Nations; and then delivering her to the Dutchesses of Lancaster<sup>c</sup> and Glocester, with other great Ladies, had her convey'd honourably to Callis. The two Kings remained certain days in their Pavilions feasting each other, and then with solemn leave taken departed home. King Richard returned to Callis, where he staid a few days, till he was marry'd by the Archbishop of Canterbury in S. Nicholas's Church, and then sailed with his Queen to Dover, and so went forward to London. The Mayor and Aldermen of that City having notice of the King's Arrival with his new Queen, met them at Black-beath in their Robes, with a select number of Citizens in rich embroidered Liveries, and conducted him to Kensington, where he lodg'd that Night, and continu'd some time. About Christmas the Queen pass'd by Water to the Tower, and on the sixth of January was crown'd at Westminster with all the State and Magnificence that could be devised suitable for so great an Occasion. The Marriage and Coronation being thus compleated, there appeared a general Satisfaction in all Persons, unless in the Duke of Glocester, who shewed much Discontent in his Words and Actions, both at the King's Marriage and Settlement of Peace, which displeased the King; and so much the more, because he advised the Londoners not to pay the Tax granted for a War with France, because there was Peace; which they had follow'd, had not the Duke of Lancaster assur'd them that the Peace was settled at great Expence<sup>d</sup>.

Soon after Christmas, on the Feast of S. Vincent, a Parliament met at Westminster, and enacted several things necessary for the common Good, viz. That forasmuch as many Mischiefs were done by Persons who rode armed, it was forbidden all Persons as well Lords as Commons, to go or ride by Night or Day armed, except the King's Officers in doing their Duty. And that Justice might be administer'd without Favour and Affection, it was enacted, That no Lord, or other Person, should sit upon the Bench with the Judges of Assize under great Penalties, lest their Preference should influence or byass them in their Office. And because the Commons had been much oppress'd by certain Persons, who pretended themselves to be the King's Messengers, and took their Horses out of their Carts to ride about their own Business, therefore it was enacted, That none should take any such Horse without the Consent of the Owner: And lastly, That it should be lawful for the Judges Belknap, Holt, and Burgh, to return from their Exile into England, notwithstanding the Statute made in the eleventh Year of this King; which being contrary to his Oath, made to the Lords in that Parliament, begat some Discontents among his Subjects. In this Parliament the Duke of Lancaster obtain'd a private Act, to legitimate the Children which he had begotten on the Lady Katharine Swinford before his Marriage with her, and his eldest Son by her, Thomas Beaufort, was made Duke of Somerset<sup>e</sup>. In the Parliament Rolls of this Session there is also recorded a Declaration of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, for themselves and the Clergy of their Provinces; That forasmuch as at their Enstallment they were sworn to be obedient and faithful to the Pope and See of Rome, if any thing were attempted in Parliament in prejudice or restraint of the same, they would not assent to it, but withstand it with all their force: And this Protestation they desired might be enrolled, which was done accordingly. Some things that concern'd the Church were enacted by this Parliament, viz. At the Petition of the Begging Fryars it was ordain'd, That none of

As also that the King's Officers for making Arrests or Attachments in Church-yards should be excommunicated. For these Acts the Clergy gave the King a tenth alone, and so the Parliament was sent home.

Breft restored to the D. of Britain, for which the D. of Gloucester reproach'd the King.

The Duke of Britain, a little after the Dissolution of the Parliament, whether upon any private Agreement made at the Treaty at Ards, or merely according to the first Condition, sent over to King Richard a certain Sum of Money, for the payment of which he had engaged the Haven of Breft, and delivered it up to him, to discharge that Debt, and recover the Town to himself again; King Richard accordingly received the Money, and resigned it to him. The Duke of Gloucester knowing the place to be an Haven of Importance to the English, was very angry at this unusual piece of Justice among Princes; and being at Court one day, where he saw many of the Soldiers that were lately come from Breft, and had no way to live, crowding into the Hall, told the King, 'That those poor Men had been ill paid, and now having no Employment, knew not how to live. The King reply'd, 'That it was not his fault, but he would take care they should be paid. The Duke answer'd, 'That it had been better they had continued where they were; he should first have taken a Town by his own Valour and Conduct, before he had resigned what his Ancestors had left to him. This Reflection fell sharply upon the King, who changing Countenance immediately, said, What is it you say, Uncle? The Duke then repeated the same words again; whereupon the King in a great Passion, reply'd, 'Think you that I am a Fool, or Merchant, to sell my Land? No; By S. John Baptist, no: But our Cousin the Duke of Britain having paid the Sums for which the Town and Haven of Breft were engaged to me, Reason and good Conscience required that I should restore it. This Answer, tho' reasonable, did not take away the Resentment of the Affront which the Duke's Words made upon the King's Spirit, but he hated him ever after for the Brand of Cowardise he had laid upon him.

Earl of S. Paul comes into England, and advised the King against the Duke of Gloucester.

Before the King's Passions were cool'd throughly, Guido Earl of S. Paul, who was sent by Charles the French King to visit and compliment King Richard and his Queen, arriv'd at the Court, and after a short time was admitted into great Familiarity with the King, partly through his own Officioufness, and partly by the Troubles of the King's Mind, which made him not very choice to whom he unburthen'd his Discontents. With this Earl the King being one day discoursing, complain'd to him of the mutinous and factious Behaviour of the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle towards him, viz. 'That he openly disliked his Marriage, and used his utmost Endeavours to break the Peace so happily concluded between France and England, by stirring up a Rebellion among his Subjects. The Earl knowing that generally nothing is so pleasant to rooted Passions as Revenge, which would be sweeten'd in this Case by necessary Policy, gave the King this Advice, 'That he had no way to secure himself, and the Peace of his Kingdom, but by taking away his Life; for when a Subject is grown so Great and Popular, it is impossible for a King to be safe so long as he is alive. The King easily assented to this Counsel, and that he might not want Pleas enough to justify what he had in a manner fully resolv'd to execute, he observ'd every word and action of the Duke more narrowly than formerly; and taking every thing in the worst sense, as Jealousie and desire of Revenge suggested, thought him such a diseas'd Member as could not be cur'd but by cutting off. To make way for this he complain'd very grievously of him to his Brethren, the Dukes of Lancaster and York, with others of the Nobility; but as in all of them he found a good Opinion of the Duke, so his Brethren told him, 'That tho' their Brother Gloucester was somewhat rash in his Words, yet they knew him to be of truly loyal Principles, really studious of his Majesty's and Realm's Happiness, and that he would not act any thing prejudicial to either. These words so much allay'd the King's Anger, that had not ill Instruments apply'd themselves to blow the Coals afresh, all Animosities had been quite bury'd. But a little after, being inform'd by the Earls of Nottingham and Huntington, that the Duke of Gloucester was much dissatisfied that his own Counsels were not follow'd, and had utter'd many seditious Speeches, as, That the King was misled by evil Counsellors, which he daily had about him; That he was not fit to govern, and therefore ought to be remov'd from his Throne; That he would undertake a Reformation of things; and to that end had conspir'd with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Darby, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Abbot of S. Albans, and Prior of Westminster, (which two last had encourag'd him in the Attempt, by pretending that it was reveal'd to them by a Vision, that King Richard should destroy the Kingdom by his misgovernment) to take him and his whole Council, and punish them according to their demerits. Whether this were really so or not, our Historians are in doubt; yet 'tis certain, this Accusation sharpen'd the King's Anger so much against the Duke, that he entred immediately into a Contrivance with the said Earls of Huntington, Nottingham, and others, to apprehend the Duke and his Confederates suddenly, and put them to Death. The Duke of Gloucester was then at his House at Pleshey in Essex, and suspected nothing of what was resolv'd against him, and therefore was easily apprehended in this manner. The King himself with the above-said Earls having laid an Ambush of arm'd Men in Epping-Forest, went with a small Retinue to Pleshey to the Duke of Gloucester, whom finding in his Bed early in the Morning they raised, and pretending earnest Business of State, drew him with them to London. The Duke in haste posted along with the King, and took only a Servant or two with him. When they came at the place of the Ambush, the King riding before, the Earl Marshal arrested him, and the Soldiers immediately seizing him, carry'd him blindfold to a Barge, put him on Shipboard, and convey'd him to Calis. He was either too Popular, or else too Innocent to be brought to a publick Tryal in England, and therefore he was

Reg. 21.

The Duke of Gloucester apprehended and murder'd.

* This Story is in Grafton, but is not very probable; for Froissard affirms, the Duke of Gloucester was one of the Commissioners who concluded the last Treaty; by the Articles of which he had consented, that the Castle and the Town of Chierburgh in Normandy should be restor'd to the King of Navarr and the Duke of Bretagne their Owners.

A. D. 1397. remov'd to Calis; and after a formal or pretended Tryal before Judge Rikell, an Irishman, who sent the King word, that upon his Examination he confessed all that was alledg'd against him, he was order'd to be executed by Thomas Mowbray Earl Marshal, who is said to have been so unwilling to put him to Death, tho' he was assistant in apprehending him, that he would not do it till the King threaten'd him with Death if he did not execute his Orders. Whereupon he caus'd him to be smothered or strangled privately, as if he were aham'd to be seen an Instrument of such a base Act. The seizure of the Duke of Glocester was carry'd so secretly, that there was no noise of it; and the King shew'd such an even Countenance towards the Earls of Warwick and Arundel, that he invited them to Dinner with him as his greatest Favourites; but while they were in their Mirth, he caus'd them to be arrested, and carry'd immediately to the Tower to be kept close Prisoners; the Lord Cobham also and Sir John Cheyney were at the same time apprehended, and sent to the Isle of Wight. These Actions much amazed the People; and lest they should rise for the Lords rescue, a Proclamation was put out to assure the Nation, that they were seized for new Crimes which they had been found guilty of, and which should be prov'd against them at the sitting of the next Parliament, in which the Commons hoped they would have such fair dealings, that every Man rested contented, and did not doubt but if they were innocent they would be clear'd, and if guilty of any Crimes deserving Death, 'twas fit they should have their deserts.

In the Interval, before the Parliament met, the King and his Friends were very busie to lay a sure train for the ruin of their Enemies, whom they had now got in their power; and to this end, first, certain of the Nobility, whom the King could best trust, were suborn'd to impeach them of High-Treason, viz. Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Earl of Nottingham, and Earl Marshal, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, John Holland Earl of Huntington, Thomas Earl of Somerset, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, the Lords Spenser, and Scroop Vice-Chamberlain, whose Honour and Greatness was thought enough alone almost to justify a false Accusation. Next, All Endeavours were used to procure such a Parliament as might be ready to concur with the King's designs; and lest the Dukes of Lancaster and York should attempt any thing for the defence of their Brother the Duke of Glocester, whom they knew to be a Prisoner at Calis, or the Friends of the Earls of Arundel and Warwick should undertake their Rescue, the King provided a strong Guard of Cheshire-Men, and four thousand Archers, besides the Forces which he had order'd the Lords of his Party to bring with them, to attend and guard the Parliament, which might at the same time be an awe upon any refractory Members. These things being thus prepared, the Parliament was summon'd to meet at Westminster about the middle of September, which it did accordingly. The Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester doubting of their own safety, because their Brother was imprison'd, brought along with them a strong Body of Men to defend themselves, and were received into London, tho' the King before had forbidden the Citizens to entertain them; but certain of the Nobility, who were sent to them from the King, giving them Assurances that there was no ill intended against them, and that nothing should be done against the Lords but with their Advice and Concurrence, so prevail'd with them that they dismissed their Forces home. The Lords of the King's party, viz. the Earls of Darby, Marshall, Rutland, and Northumberland, the Lords Spenser, Henry and Thomas Peircys, and Scroop, brought great Troops of arm'd Attendants, which they kept and lodg'd in the Towns about London all the Session. It was open'd by Edward Stafford Bishop of Exeter, then Lord Chancellor, who in a grave Speech deliver'd, 'That the King was of absolute and uncontrollable Authority, inferiour to none but God; and that all Persons that shall dare to lessen or limit his Power, upon any pretences whatsoever, are worthy of Death, as wicked Traitors. These Words within the House, being seconded with the Guards without, were thought a manifest Indication, that not Law but arbitrary Power was to order matters that Session. In the lower House, Sir John Busby, Sir William Bagot, and Sir Henry Green, the King's Creatures, had a strong party, so that they could carry all things as they pleased. Sir John Busby was chosen the Speaker of the Commons, and a Vote pass'd presently, 'That any one that should be convicted of opposing the King's Power and Regality should suffer as a Traitor. These Foundations of Action being laid, the King by his Attorney preferr'd his Complaint of Rebellion and Treason against Thomas Duke of Glocester, the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and several others, submitting the Judgment of them to the Parliament. Sir John Busby having aggravated the Crimes and Ingratitude of the said Peers, first required, That since the former Grace and Favour had wrought so little upon them, their Pardons might be revoked; which was accordingly done: And then he demanded Judgment upon them for their late Crimes, and particularly for Treason, in compelling the King to grant them a Commission to govern the Realm; and upon the Archbishop for procuring the said Commissions, and granting their Pardons. The Archbishop rose up to make his Defence, but the King enjoyn'd him Silence till the next day, and then upon his Appearance in the House he commanded him by the Bishop of Carlisle to go home; and so he came to the House no more. After his departure, the King having order'd the Bishops to choose themselves a Procurator, because it was not lawful for them to be present in cases of Blood, (whereupon they chose Sir Thomas Piercy, and departed the House) he granted a Commission to several Peers, of which the Duke of Lancaster was High-Steward, to examine and try them for all Crimes and Treasons laid against them. The King had a little before prepared a large Building, like an Hall, open on all sides but the Roof, for their Tryal, with Seats for himself, the Parliament, the Appellants and Defendants. When the Day of their Arraignment was come, and the Earls were brought out to their Examination, the Appellant Lords accused them as Traitors, for 1. Forcing the King to grant them a Commission for the Government of his Realm. 2. For usurping the Regal Authority in holding a Parliament in prejudice of the King's Royal Dignity, under pretence of that traiterous Commission. 3. For traiterously murdering Sir Simon Burley and Sir James Barnes, two of the King's faithful Leige-Subjects, without the King's consent: And, 4. For raising a traiterous Insurrection at Haringey-Park, and entering arm'd with the Duke of Glocester and Earl of Warwick into the King's presence; and then

Twenty-third Parliament, 1397.

A. D. 1397. Earl of Arundel try'd and condemn'd. then severally flung down their Gloves, offering to justify their Accusation by Fight. The Earl of Arundel, Richard Fitz-Allen, first answered, and boldly deny'd their Charge, saying, 'That he was not a Traitor in Thought, Word or Deed; and that what he had acted, either by Virtue of the aforesaid Commission, or while he was in Arms with the Duke of Glocester and the Earl of Warwick, was not done with any ill Intention against the King's Person, but for the good of the King and his Realm, which he did not doubt but he could make good against any or all the Appellants by fight, if it would please the King to permit him so to vindicate his Innocency against their false Accusations. But because his Enemies had him now in their power, and his most innocent Actions would (as he very well knew) be construed in the worst sense; and what they had alledged as Treasons, they would make such, he added, as his firmest Plea, which he would abide by; that those very Acts, if Treasonable, were pardon'd to him by the King's Grace, and that not only more publicly with the Duke of Glocester and Earl of Warwick, but he had a special and a particular Pardon for himself. The Duke of Lancaster and Sir John Busby immediately reply'd, 'That both those Pardons were revoked by the King, his Lords, and his faithful People assembled in Parliament, and therefore could not avail him in this Case. The Earl reply'd, 'That the Revocation of his Pardon was not done by the People, for they lamented him, but by him and his Company, who love no faithful dealings. Then the Duke of Lancaster asked him if he had any thing farther to alledge for himself? But he said, 'The King's Pardon was freely granted him, and the benefit of it he hoped would not be deny'd him, for he insisted upon it. But that being over-ruled, they proceeded to give Sentence upon him in this form: I John, Steward of England, judge thee, Richard, to be a Traitor; and I condemn thee to be drawn and hang'd, beheaded and quarter'd; and thy Land, entail'd and not entail'd, from thee and from thine Heirs of thy Body descending to be confiscated. This usual Sentence in Treason was, according to the Custom, by the King's Grace released to him in respect to his Blood, and he was commanded to be beheaded according to his Condemnation; which was executed upon him the same Afternoon upon Tower-hill, and his Body was interr'd in the Austin-Fryars-Church in Broad-street, London. This noble Earl behav'd himself with much Courage and Calmness in his Sufferings. In his passage to his Execution he gave all the Money he had to the Poor, that he might carry their Prayers with him to his Grave. Several Lords attended him to his Execution, and among them three that were nearly related to him, the Earl of Nottingham that marry'd his Daughter, the Earl of Kent his Sisters Son, and the Earl of Huntington. These Men's forwardness he could not but take notice of, and therefore told them, A. D. 1397. 'It had been more decent for them to have been absent; but since they pleas'd themselves in his Misfortunes, he could foretell them, that their Miseries in a short time would be as remarkable as his then were. Then turning to the Executioner, he felt the Sword, and desired him to do his Office as carefully and speedily as he could; and kneeling down, his Head was separated from his Body at one Blow. His Lands, which were confiscated to the King, were annexed to the Earldom of Chester, which thereupon was advanced to a Duchy. His Death was much lamented by the Commons, among whom he was in very great esteem for Valour, and his Love of the common Good. Divers Repors were carry'd about, that Miracles were done by his Reliques, and that his Head was again miraculously cemented to his Body; which meeting with a good Opinion of him in Men's Minds, caus'd him to be honoured as a Martyr.

The Earl of Warwick, Thomas Beauchamp, was next brought to his Tryal, and accus'd of the same Heads of Treason. He answer'd for himself, 'That he never knew that it was Treason to ride so arm'd, as he confess'd he had done in Haringey-Park; but since the Judges had declared it to be so, he begg'd the King's Pardon; and with many effeminate Tears besought the Nobles to intercede for him to his Majesty. The King ask'd him, 'Whether he acknowledged himself guilty of the Treason charged on him? The Earl answered, 'That he could not deny it, and wish'd he had never seen the Duke of Glocester and Earl of Arundel, by whom he was led into it. Then the King having conferr'd a little while with the Duke of Lancaster, and received the Requests of several Peers to save his Life, told the Earl, 'That the ingenious Confession of his Fault had more pleas'd him than all the profit of their Lands could, and therefore he would pardon his Life. But his Estate was seiz'd upon for the King's use, and the Earl was banish'd into the Isle of Man, with an Allowance of four thousand Nobles a Year for his own and Lady's Maintenance; but it was so badly paid, that they are said to have liv'd there in great Poverty, which was so much the heavier to them, because of their old Age. The Lord Cobham and Sir John Cheyney were indicted, and condemned for the same Treasons; but by the Intercession of some of the Peers, their Lives were spared, and they were condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who had been summon'd to answer for the said Treasons, but was excus'd by the King, and pardon'd, with the Archbishop of York, Bishop of Winchester, and some others, was at the earnest Importunity of Sir John Busby, and the Commons of his party, banished, and his Temporalities seiz'd into the King's hands, having six Weeks limited for his departure. While these Tryals of the Peers were carrying on, a Certi-

 * This Earldom was never advanc'd into a Duchy. See Cambd. sub. Tit. Cheshire.
 * The People, who always pretend to be the best Judges of their Interest, and can distinguish their Friends from their Enemies, were ever ready to venerate the Memory of Patriots; and as they formerly reckon'd the Earl of Lancaster a Saint, so now they esteem'd the Earl of Arundel as a Martyr. Pilgrimages were daily made to the place of his Burial in Austin-Fryars, London. A Rumour was spread about in those superstitious Times, that his Head was miraculously fix'd to his Body. The King knowing such Reports were design'd to reflect on his Justice, caus'd the Corps to be taken up and view'd ten Days after its Interment. He commanded the Ground where it lay to be pav'd in, and no mention to be made of the place; forbidding any Discourses in his favour. However 'twas constantly averr'd for a Truth, that the King's Mind was disturb'd with the Horror of this Murder, and that he was haunted with an Apparition of his Ghost. 'Tis certainly true, that the proceedings of this pack'd Parliament hasten'd the end of this King's arbitrary Power in his Dethronement and Death.

A. D. 1397. ficate came from the Earl of Nottingham then Captain of Callis, that the Duke of Gloucester was dead, and Judge Rikell read a Confession of several Treasons owned and acknowledged by the Duke of Gloucester under his own hand; whereupon at the Petition of the Appellants, the same Sentence was pronounc'd against him, tho' dead, which was pass'd upon the Earl of Arundel, but his Body was allow'd to be deliver'd to his Friends, by whose care it was convey'd to Pleshey, and honourably interr'd in the Tomb which he had there prepar'd for himself in his Life-time in the Church.

After these Judgments passed on the Peers, the Parliament sat some time, till near Christmas, and pass'd several Acts relating to the present State of Affairs, viz. That all Benefices or Gifts granted or alienated by those that were already condemn'd, or should be hereafter condemn'd by this Parliament, granted since the tenth Year of this King, should be revoked and made void. That all such as gave either Counsel, Aid, or Favour, to the Children of such as were or should hereafter be condemn'd in this Parliament, should be punish'd as Traitors. That all the Lords Spiritual and Temporal should swear inviolably to observe whatsoever in this Parliament was enacted, and that the Censures of the Church should be pronounced by the Prelates, against all those that should oppose or violate them. That all such Persons as ow'd any Moneys to Rocheſter Bridge, should be restrain'd for the Payment of it for the use of the said Bridge. In the time of this Session, the King being desirous to see the Forces of the City of London, caus'd them to muster before him upon Blackbeath. He also order'd, that the Arms of King Edward the Confessor should be added to his own, and bare them together parte per pale. And then the Parliament was prorogued till after Christmas, and appointed to meet at Sbrensbury on the Quindene of S. Hilary, Jan. 28.

1398. The King having thus removed his Enemies, either by Death or Banishment, kept a triumphant and magnificent Christmas at Lichfield, and at the time prefixed went to Sbrensbury to meet his Parliament. At his first Arrival he held a great Feast for all his Nobility and Commons, at which he created <sup>b</sup> five Dukes, a Dutchess, a Marquess, and four Earls, viz. Henry Bul-lingbrooke Earl of Derby he made Duke of Hereford, Edward Earl of Rutland Duke of Aumerle, and of Corke in Ireland; Thomas Holland Earl of Kent Duke of Survey; John Holland Earl of Huntington Duke of Exeter; Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham and Marthal Duke of Norfolk; the Lady Margaret Countess of Norfolk, Dutchess of Norfolk; John Earl of Somerset Marquiss Dorset; Thomas Lord Spenser Earl of Gloceſter; Ralph Lord Nevil Earl of Westmorland; William Lord Scroop Earl of Wiltshire, and Sir Thomas Peirey Vice-Chamberlain Earl of Worceſter; to and among whom he dispos'd of the greatest part of the Estates of the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, thinking thereby to oblige them more firmly to be his Friends. At this time he made the Earldom of Chester a Principality, and assum'd to himself

A. D. 1398. the Name and Title of the Prince of Chester to grace that Honour the more. And as the King sought all means to strengthen himself, and greaten his Power, so also did the Parliament; for they enacted, That the Commission granted by the King to certain Noblemen to inquire into and reform Abuses in the Realm, Anno 10. of his Reign, should be repealed as extorted from the King by Threats, and that no such Commission should be granted for the future; and that the Heirs of such Persons as had been sentenc'd by the said Commission should be restored to their Inheritances, Lands and Possessions, but should not exact the Revenues of the Possessors from that time. 1. That it should be high Treason for any Person whatsoever to compass or imagine the King's Death; 2. To contrive his Deposition; 3. To ride armed, or make War against the King in his Realm; Or 4. to disclaim the Homage due to him; and that the Heirs of all Persons who were convicted of any of the said four Articles of Treason, should be for ever deprived of the Lands and Possessions of their Ancestors, and should not be allowed to have an Action of Claim for them. The King also obtained, that the whole Power of both Houses should for a time be put into the hands of certain Persons nominated by himself, viz. John Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Duke of York, Edward Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Survey, John Duke of Exeter, John Marquiss Dorset, the Earls of Northumberland, Salisbury, March, Gloceſter, and Wiltshire, Sir John Huby, and some others. These Men were enabled by Virtue of the said Grant to hear and determine all Matters and Petitions not ended in the last Session; and by Virtue of that Concession, proceeded to conclude and determine almost what they pleased. In the end of the Session the King had a Tenth and half of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth and half of the Laity granted him, besides the Customs of Wool at 50s. a Sack of every Engliſhman, and 3l. of every Stranger, and so the Parliament broke up; and a general Pardon immediately follow'd their Dismission, of all Persons but fifty, not named, which was done to keep the Nobility in Awe, the King being at Liberty to except almost whom he pleased by that means.

The King having thus establish'd his Power, and put himself beyond all Opposition and Contradiction, thought himself secure and an absolute Prince; but it being laid upon such a Foundation as begat many Discontents among the People, all the Fabrick proved weak, and was soon followed with lamentable Ruine. The Parliament was indeed dissolved, but there was strange murmuring about several things that attended it and were done by it, as 1. That it was a Parliament not freely chosen, but pack'd by the King's Interests, consisting of Men imposed on the Shires and Towns by the King's Authority. 2. That it was wholly managed by Court Favourites, and had bent all its Endeavours to destroy the Liberties and Privileges of the People. 3. That tho' the Duke of Gloucester was so illegally murder'd, they were so far from punishing the wicked Actors, that they

<sup>c</sup> Sir John Hayward in his Hist. of Hen. Anno 1412. made Earl of Dorset. This Nobleman was the first that ever bore the Title of Marquiss in England.

A. D. 1398. approved their Deeds. 4. That the Lords, who had deserved well of the Nations, and were pardon'd all irregular Actions, were made guilty by an unpresidented Power of revoking their Pardons. 5. That by disannulling the Grants of the condemn'd Persons, made so many Years before, they had deprived many honest and good Men, both Menial Servants of the said Lords and others, of their lawful Inheritances and Estates. 6. That they had not only laid heavy Taxes upon the Nation themselves, but had exalted the King's Authority to such a pitch, and allow'd him such a Power of acting, that he need not observe any Laws but his Will. These things concurring with other Matters of Complaint in the King's Actions, partly grounded on the Grants of Parliament it self, as his imposing the Oaths so severely on all Persons to observe inviolably the Ordinances of it, and farming the Taxes to Bushy, Baggot, and Green, who exacted them with the utmost Rigour and Severity; and partly on his own Management, as that he was prodigal in his Expences, lewd in his Behaviour, and partial in his Favours: That he discountenanc'd his ancient Nobility, and prefer'd such Persons to his nearest Attendance as were neither eminent for Birth nor Virtue, on whom he bestow'd the Revenues of the Crown, and impoverish'd the Nation by it: That he preferred such of the Clergy to Bishopricks and other Dignities of the Church, as either favour'd or joyn'd with him in his lewd Courses. These things alienated the Hearts of the People so much from him, that they lay expos'd to a Revolt upon the least Temptation; of which an Occasion shortly after happen'd after this manner, tho' it were some time before it was brought about.

Reg. 22. The Duke's of Hereford and Norfolk riding between Brainford and London, and discoursing friendly among themselves about Affairs of State, the Duke of Hereford having observed how fast the People's Affections toward the King declined, freely deliver'd his Thoughts to the Duke of Norfolk, and told him, 'That the present Management and Ministers were very distasteful to the Nation in general; That the King was made odious by his mean and bad Counsellors, who not only rais'd the Envy of the Nobles by enjoying the Favours which was their due, but gain'd him the Hatred of the People by their Conduct, which manifestly tended to their own, not the publick Interest; and therefore he advis'd the Duke of Norfolk, who was a Privy Counsellor, and had an easie Access to the King's Ear to advertise the King of it, that he might by a prudent Alteration of things prevent the ill Consequences which would certainly follow; adding, That it was not out of any ill Will he bore to the King, or an Humour of finding ' fault that he said this, but out of a pure desire of the Happiness of the King and his Government. The Duke of Norfolk seem'd to assent to the Duke of Hereford's words, as very necessary and good Counsel, and promised to represent them so fairly to the King, that they might have the Effect he wish'd, and so they parted. The Duke of Norfolk was not unmindful of his Promise, but 'being sensible how ungrateful a Message it was to the King, or perhaps designing to ingratiate himself by the Report, he gave a very invidious Relation of the Duke of Hereford's Words to him, adding such aggravating Expressions of his own inventing, as made them look like a Calumny both of his Majesty and Government. The King, who was ever very impatient of Reproof, was extremely enrag'd at the Duke of Hereford, and sends for him to appear before the Council to answer the Accusation brought against him by the Duke of Norfolk. The Duke of Hereford appeared, and having heard what the Duke of Norfolk had alledg'd against him, thank'd the King for his Favour in giving him Liberty to answer for himself, and then ingenuously confess'd what he had said, and with what Intention; but accus'd the Duke of Norfolk of perverting and misrepresenting his Discourse, either out of Malice or Flattery, which he offer'd to justify against the Duke of Norfolk by Combat, if the King would permit him. The Duke of Norfolk unwilling to undergo the Disgrace either of recanting his words, or refusing a Defence of them, stoutly avouched the Truth of his Relation, and flinging down his Glove, accepted the Combate. The King was unwilling to grant their desire, and endeavour'd to pacify the Contention between them by interposing with his Authority; but when nothing would prevail with them, the King in his Passion swore by S. John Baptist, That he would never more concern himself to make them Friends, and granted them a Combate to be fought on Sept. 17. at Coventry. At the time appointed, the King order'd a strong Stage to be erected for the Combatants; but having receiv'd Information, that the People were much discontented that the Duke of Hereford, a Valiant and Heroick Nobleman, should be suffer'd to justify his Innocency by the Hazard of a Combate, who might be so serviceable to the Nation, he permitted them to meet and bid Defiance of each of other; but before they fought, by the Advice of his Council, put an end to the Quarrel by a Sentence of Banishment to the Duke of Hereford for ten Years, as not wholly guiltless of the Calumny, and to the Duke of Norfolk for his Life, as having sown Discord by his false Information between the King and his Peers, which was executed within a few days. The Duke of Norfolk went into Germany, and from thence to Venice, where he

* Sir John Hayward gives him his Character in little. In former Times he had taken part with the Lords, but afterwards was desirous to be accounted rather among the great Men than the good.

<sup>b</sup> Polydore Virgil, the most unfaithful Historian that ever wrote of our English History, has drawn the Modern Authors into an Errour, by affirming, That the Duke of Norfolk accus'd the Duke of Hereford; whereas it appears on the contrary, on Record, Placit. Coron. in Parl. 21. Richard II. That in the 30th of January, Henry of Lancaster came before the King with a Schedule in his hand and said thus, That having attended him before at Haywood, he there accus'd the Duke of Norfolk of slanderous Words, reflecting on his Majesty, and now by his Command he repeated the same; which Schedule is to be seen at large in the said Records.

The Duke of Hereford at his departure had four Years of his Banishment releas'd, when he took his leave of the King at Eltham; but being still forced to leave the Kingdom for six Years, he went into France, and was honourably received in that Court by Charles the Sixth then King there<sup>a</sup>.

The King

teen Counties.

The Departure of the Duke of Hereford, being the only surviving Person of the popular Lords who was likely to head a Faction against the Court, gave Encouragement to more arbitrary proceedings of the King and his Ministers than they had dared to attempt before. For soon after he was gone, the King impos'd a great Fine upon all the chief Inhabitants of seventeen Counties in the East parts of the Nation, because they had sided with the Duke of Glocester and Earls of Arundel and Warwick against him; and having by his Agents induced the Noblemen and chief Gentry, as well Temporal as Spiritual, to acknowledge themselves Rebels and Traytors, upon assurances of Pardon, he compelled them to secure their Pardon and his Favour for the future by subscribing blank Charters, by which they oblig'd themselves to pay such Sums of Money to him as he should think fit to require, which prov'd very heavy to many; for some were forced to pay a thousand Pounds, and others a thousand Marks, with like insupportable Sums; commanding them also to take the Oath to maintain inviolably the Statutes of the last Parliament. This Oath, and these Charters were very offensive to the Citizens of London, and therefore they advis'd their Sheriffs, by whom they were order'd to be impos'd upon them, to withstand them. The King was highly displeas'd with their refractory Opposition, and threaten'd a more than usual Severity against them. But the new Archbishop of Canterbury, Roger Walden, who was remov'd from being the King's Chaplain to that See about this time, and their old Friend Robert Braybrooke Bishop of London so effectually interceded for them to the King, that he promis'd to forgive them, but did not do it, till by his blank Bonds and Charters which he sent to all the richest Citizens, he had squeez'd great Sums out of them, as he had done from the Clergy and Gentry of the seventeen Counties, and other places before.

And extorts

1399. On New-Years-Day the River near Bedford, which runs between Swelstone and Harewood, divided it self, and became dry for almost three Miles; and about the same time the Bay-trees, without any unusual or extraordinary Cold, dry'd up and wither'd; which tho' not so much taken notice of at present, yet were thought afterward to portend the Changes of State which happen'd the ensuing Year. About Candlemas dy'd that great and illustrious Prince, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, fourth Son of Edward the Third, at the Bishop of Ely's House in Holborn, and was honourably interr'd in S. Paul's Church on the the North-side of the High-Altar, by his first Wife Blanch, the Daughter of Henry the First, Duke of Lancaster. eldest Son Henry Duke of Hereford, who was then in France; and so not being present to take possession of his Inheritance, it was easily made a Prey to the Avarice of the Court Harpies. The King indeed had shew'd some Favour to the Duke of Hereford when he left his Country, and besides the Release of some of the Years of Banishment inflict'd by the first Sentence, he granted to him by his Letters-Patents a power to sue out by his Attorney a Livery to any Lands or Possessions, holding of the King in Capite, which should or might befall him in his absence, and a respite of his Homage, till he should return, for a reasonable Fine. But the rich Booty which was expos'd to their Pleasure and Will by his absence, so allur'd their desires, that contrary to all Justice and Faith they persuad'd the King to revoke his Grant, and seize upon the Duke of Lancaster's whole Estate for the time of his Son's Banishment, which he made perpetual by their Advice; and thereupon dispos'd of his personal Estate to and among his Favourites. This arbitrary and unkingly Action brought an Odium upon the King, not only from the Commons, who being factiously enamour'd with him, took every thing ill that was look'd upon as tending to his prejudice; but the Nobility themselves, who began to doubt of their security under so easie a King, and such covetous Counsellors. Edmund Duke of Tork, the only Uncle of the King that surviv'd, who seem'd not much concern'd at the Death of his Brother the Duke of Glocester, shew'd a great disgust at these Proceedings, and with his Son the Duke of Aumerle retir'd from Court to his Country-house at Langley, and others of the Nobility withdrew their Company from the King, because they found it ungrateful. But tho' the Duke of Hereford's Inheritance brought greater severity upon him in England, yet it was a cause of his greater Preferment and Favour in France; for being there reputed to be one of the Richest by his Father's Death, as well as Braveest Princes in the World for his Natural Courage, he was courted for a Match to the only Daughter of the Duke of Berry, the French King's Uncle, which was certainly a very great Honour to a banish'd Man. But King Richard having intelligence of the Design, and foreseeing how much such an increase of the Duke of Hereford's Interest might prove prejudicial to him, dispatch'd over the Earl of Salisbury immediately to hinder it by false Suggestions and a flattering Persuasion, that it would be a great Dishonour to a Lady of the Royal Blood of France to be marry'd to an English Rebel and notorious Traitor; and so prevented the French King's Kindness to him. So great an Enemy was King Richard to the prosperous Fortunes of the Duke of Hereford both at home and abroad.

King's Injustice to the Duke of Hereford after his Father's Death.

About the time of the Duke of Lancaster's Death happen'd several things of Importance; the Earl of Arundel's eldest Son, Thomas Fitz-Allen, who had been kept a close Prisoner in the Earl of Exeter's House ever since his Father's Death, made his escape from his Confinement, and by the help of one William Scott a Mercer, got over the Sea to his Uncle, the late Archbishop of Arundel, then sojourning at Cullen;

<sup>a</sup> The Pleas before cited report, That all this was done by the full Advice, Authority and Assent of Parliament, (that is, the Committee) and not by his absolute Power, tho' he pretended to it, and was as fond of it as any of his Successors. Sir John Hayward observes, That the Sentence was given against the Duke of Norfolk the same Day of the Year wherein the Duke of Glocester by his wicked means was strangled at Callis.

A. D. 1399. the Bishop of Chalcedon also came into England out of Greece with Apostolical Letters from the Pope, exhorting all well-disposed Persons to assist the Emperor of Constantinople with a liberal Contribution of Money, that he might be able to defend Christendom against the Inroads of the Tartars, and encouraging them to so important a Work by a plenary Pardon of their Sins; but another Accident hinder'd his success, and that was the Revolt of the Irish. For Roger Mortimer the Earl of March and Ulster (who was lately declared Heir Apparent to the Crown, and made Lieutenant of that Nation) being besieged at Kenlis by a very strong Body of the wild Irish, was there slain in a Sally with many of his Men, and the English Towns left as a Prey to the Natives, who under Obrian, Mackmore, and others, committed great Barbarity and Spoil upon the King's Subjects there. The news of this Rebellion much disturb'd the King and his Council, and put them into many Perplexities what to do; they had no Preparations for a War, and 'twould be a shame to the Nation to leave that Kingdom, which had cost so much to conquer, and had been held so long by the English, in the hands of the Enemy: Whereupon it was at last resolv'd, That the King should raise an Army, and go over himself in Person to subdue them to their Obedience. Money was wanting, which is the Sinew of War; and therefore the Ministers were forced to use many Exactions to raise a Sum to provide for the Expedition, partly borrowing upon the King's Letters-Patents of the Bishops and others, and partly extorting it from those that were unwilling to lend him; and tho' the Necessities of the Nation, and Interests of it might have been some excuse for his Actions, yet his extravagant Expences in Peace, when wise Princes are to provide a Treasure against War, were so good an Argument against his present Wants, that tho' he did indeed raise a considerable Army, yet it was with the extream discontent of the whole Nation. In the Spring the King was ready to embark for Ireland with his Army, but lest he should leave his Queen in discontent for his departure, he celebrated solemn Jufts to divert her several days; and about Whitsuntide set forward toward Bristol, and in two hundred Ships passed from Milford-Haven in Wales with his Army into Ireland, and landed safely at Waterford on the last day of May, having with him the Duke of Exeter, the Duke of Glocester's and Hereford's Sons, several Bishops, the Earl of Salisbury, the Abbot of Westminster, and many other Noblemen; and leaving his Uncle the Duke of Tork his Deputy in England, whom he had order'd to send Edward Duke of Aumerle with some Reinforcements to his Army, that he might not be too weak for the Enterprize, if the Troops he carry'd were not sufficient.

The Earl of Northumberland accused of Treason, and his Estate confiscated. While the King remain'd at Bristol he had some Information given him, that Henry Peircy Earl of Northumberland, and some other Noblemen, were contriving an Insurrection in his absence: Whereupon the King by his Pursuivant sent to the said Earl and his Associates to attend him in this Expedition with all the Force they could gather together. The Earl of Northumberland return'd answer, 'That it was not safe to draw away the strength of the North to go against the Irish, whom a less Force than what he had with him was enough to subdue, because by that means he should expose those Countries to the Injuries of the Scotish Borderers, who waited all opportunities, as the King well knew, to make their Advantages of England, and were no longer Friends than they wanted a fair occasion to shew their Enmity with gain to themselves; That since there was no Guard of those appointed in his absence, he hoped his Majesty would be better advis'd than to require his Attendance, which would be a greater disadvantage to him at home than his Service could profit him abroad. This modest Answer was look'd upon by the King as a crafty Evasion of his Command, and confirm'd him in his opinion that he was guilty of the Accusation brought against him: Wherefore to deter him from any farther Attempts he seized upon his Estate, and proclaim'd him and his Associates Traitors, and so departed into Ireland.

The King being arriv'd in Ireland, stay'd some days at Waterford to refresh his Army, and then march'd forward to Kilkenny, where he resolv'd to stay some time for the arrival of the Duke of Aumerle, whom he daily expected. The King's Army struck such a Terror into the Irish Rebels that they dare not appear against him, but after their usual manner kept close in the Woods, and by Parties made their Assaults upon the English, as they happen'd to meet with advantages. But the English being acquainted with their Artifices, went so well prepared for their Encounters, that they slew many of them. For Jenico Dartois, a valiant Captain under the King, in one Skirmish at Ford in Kenlis, slew two hundred of them with the Soldiers under his Command; and the Citizens of Dublin invaded the Country of Obrian, and slew above thirty, with very little loss. When the King had stay'd about a Fortnight at Kilkenny, and saw the Duke of Aumerle not come, he set forward and invaded the Country of the Arch-rebel Mackmore, who keeping in the Woods with about three thousand Men, little valued the King's Army. The King had two thousand five hundred Pioneers with him to grub up the Woods, and open Passages for his Army, who were set to work, but could not by Art and Diligence come at him; so that the English rather suffer'd than gain'd by this Attempt, because many of them were slain by Mackmore's Men when they were foraging. The Uncle of Mackmore, and several of the Irish of better Note, came to the King with Wythes about their Necks, submitted themselves to his Mercy, and were pardon'd. This the King thought would be a good Example for Mackmore himself to imitate, and therefore invited him to come and accept of the same Mercy. But Mackmore understanding that the English could not long subsist in those places for want of Provision, which could not be had by Force or Money, refused to submit, but offered to lay down his Arms upon assurance of Indemnity for his past Offences, and to have his Liberty for the future. This Answer much enraged the King, so that he swore he would not leave Ireland till he had Mackmore dead or alive; and being forced to retreat to Dublin to refresh and victual his Army, took such courses as he thought most effectual to obtain his ends: For first he published a Proclamation, wherein he promised a great Reward to any Person that should bring Mackmore to him alive or dead; and after he had rested and refreshed his Army fifteen days, he divided it into three parts, and sent them out to besiege the Enemy on all sides, and reduce them if possible. Just as the King had thus sent out his Army, the Duke of Aumerle arriv'd with a great Inforcement in an hundred Ships; and tho' his delay was blameworthy,

A. D. 1399. worthy, yet the King received him with much Joy, and by the Conjunction of his Forces brought so many of the Irish into subjection, that had he not been call'd home, he had reduced Ireland into as entire Obedience as ever. But his Fate was now to rule no longer, and the Period of his Dignity came thus.

*The Conspiracy to depose King Richard,
with the Reasons and Causes of it.*

The Nobility, Gentry, and Commons of the Nation having for several Years past been intolerably oppressed and slighted by the King and his Favourites, and now at the King's departure into Ireland vexed with unjust Exactions, began to long for Relief; and having an opportunity by the King's absence to put their Designs in Execution, contriv'd to settle the Crown on another Head, which might govern them with greater Prudence as well as Mercy. The Earl of Northumberland and his Friends, who had suffer'd lately so deeply for suspicion, were among the forwardest in this Action, hoping to regain their Losses by a real, which they had undergone for a supposed Insurrection. The Person whom they thought fittest to wield a Scepter, tho' he had none, was Henry of Bullingbrooke Duke of Lancaster and Hereford. He had all the Qualifications fit to make an excellent King, as well as a Lineal Title to it. For he was the Son of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, fourth Son of Edward III. and after the Death of Roger Mortimer lately kill'd in Ireland, next allied to the Crown. He was a Prince of great Wisdom, Courage and Experience, a Lover of the Commons, and a Friend to the Nobles, and having smarted so severely by the Injustice and Cruelty of a bad King, was most likely to make a good one, by not laying those unjust Impositions upon others Shoulders, which he found so heavy on his own. He was indeed in France, but would gladly have return'd home, if he safely might have done it before; how much more now, being invited by the People, and allured by a Crown: Wherefore they took up a general Resolution to send for him with all the privacy and speed possible, assuring him of their hearty assistance in settling upon him what they so much desired he would accept. These their Requests and Desires they drew up into a Letter, and sent it over by faithful Messengers to Archbishop Arundel, who was then in Britain, whom by Letters they also importun'd to be their Advocate with the Duke to comply with them. The Archbishop, being a Fellow-sufferer, gladly accepted the Office, and went with the Messengers to the Duke of Hereford at Paris, where having obtained a Secrecy fit for a matter of such Importance, they delivered their Letters from the Nobles and Commons of England, and the Archbishop seconded them with the best Persuasions which Reason could invent, or Rhetorick urge. He represented to him the Misery of the present state of the English Nation, 'That they were utterly ruined and destroyed by the ill management of the publick Affairs; in which tho' the King himself were not actually concerned, yet so long as he employed and upheld such unfit Ministers, he could not be thought fit to govern; That it is far more intolerable to be Slaves to mean Persons than to the King himself, and therefore so long as the King could not be won from maintaining their Pride and Tyranny over his Subjects, it was hardly any Crime to depose that Person, who left his Power in such base Hands; That the present Condition of the Nation was so low and distracted, that nothing but a present Remedy can save it from utter Ruine; for the ancient Honour of the Nation for Chivalry was degenerated into Effeminacy, and the Men who were famous for their Courage and Conduct, either put to death or banished, the Nobility is contemned and slighted, the Gentry abused, and the Commons miserably polled and taxed, and that not to support the Government, but the Pride and Avarice of their Fellow-Subjects; That the Relief of these Grievances could not be expected from any Hands but his reasonably, not only because he was so eminent for all warlike Atchievements, but because he had so near a Relation to the Crown; and therefore the Nation had devolv'd their Hopes of Ease entirely upon him, which he in Honour and Duty ought to endeavour, especially since they had resolv'd to stand by him in the Attempt, and it could hardly prove unfortunate to him, where so much Love, Power, and Interest were united. The Duke, who had all the Reason in the World to hearken to these Proposals, because 'twas the only way left him to revenge the barbarous Death of his Uncle, recover his own Honour and his Estate, free himself of an uneasy Banishment, and restore his Family and Children to their Natural Rights, yet was not so much enamour'd with so fair an Offer of a Crown, but he was very cautious of the Acceptance, and told them, 'That tho' he was sensible of the bad state of things in England, which stood in great need of a present redress, and was much obliged to his Countrymen for their good Opinion of him, yet he was not unsensible of the great danger in attempting the deposing of a King, and the fickleness of People's Affections; which tho' they might lead Men into hazardous Attempts, yet seldom held up to carry them through, and therefore could hardly think it prudent to trust to them. He declared himself free from all ambitious and aspiring Thoughts, being now of more staid Years and Consideration; and if he should engage in so difficult an Action, 'twould be more for the Love of his Country than his own Honour; That tho' 'twas some motive to rescue himself and Family from ruine, yet it was much greater to retrieve an whole Nation; and therefore since the Nobles and Gentry had gone too far to retreat with safety, he would rather run the hazard of his own Life than desert them; and so dismissed the Messengers with promises of Acceptance if the Nobles and People of England would hold to their Petition. This Answer, which was carry'd back with as great secrecy

* He objected to the Archbishop the Unlawfulness of the Design, to whom the Bishop thus reply'd: Examples of casting a King out of his State are not rare (as you affirm) nor long since put in practice, nor far hence to be fetch'd. The Kings of Denmark and Sweden are oftentimes banish'd by their Subjects, oftentimes imprison'd and put to their Fine. The Princes of Germany, about an hundred Years past, depos'd Adolphus the Emperor, and are now in hand to depose their Emperor Wenceslaus. The Earl of Flanders was a while since driven out of his Dominions by his own People, for usurping greater Power than appertain'd to his Estate. The ancient Britains chas'd away their own King Caractacus, for the Lewdness of his Life, and Cruelty of his Rule. In the time of the Saxon Heptarchy, Bernredus King of Mercia, for his Pride and Stoutness towards his People was by them depos'd. Likewise Aleredus and Ethelbertus, Kings of Northumberland, were for their Disorders expell'd by their Subjects. Since the Victory of the Normans the Lords endeavour'd to expel King Henry the Third, but they were not able; yet were they able to depose King Edward the Second, &c. Sir John Hayward, Henry IV. p. 67.

The Duke of Lancaster's Passage and landing in England. that he might pass the more unsuspected into England. Archbishop Arundel, and his Nephew Thomas Earl of Arundel, lately escap'd out of Prison in England, the Lord Cobham, and some other Gentlemen of note attended him. The Duke of Britain accommodated them with some Ships and Men for his design; but the Duke had so great Confidence in the English Nobles, that he would carry no Force along with him, but a small Guard of thirty Lances. From Port Blanc in Britain they set sail for England, and being arriv'd hover'd a while upon the Coasts to observe in what Forwardness the Nobles were for his Reception, and where he might most safely land. The Earl of Northumberland and his Friends, whose fresh Injuries had made them most zealous Enemies to King Richard, had so well disposed the People of the North to the Duke of Lancaster, that he easily found their Kindness to him; and thereupon landed at Ravon Spurr in Holderness in Yorkshire. The News of his Arrival was no sooner spread abroad, but the common People flocked in to his Assistance, and the Earl of Northumberland and his Son Henry Hotspur, the Earl of Westmorland, the Lords Nevill, Rosse, Willoughby, Darcy, Beaumont, and many other Persons of Honour, with a considerable Body of Men, came to him; infomuch, that in a very few days his Army was grown to near sixty thousand well accoutred and able Men.

The Duke of York gathers an Army against the Duke of Lancaster. The Duke of York, who was the Governour of the Nation in the King's absence, had Intelligence of these things, and like a Person faithful to his Trust, took the most effectual means to meet the impending Danger; and calling the King's Council together, propounded it to them, to consult by what ways they might secure the Nation in its Obedience to their King, and prevent the Designs of the Invader. The chief Men of the Council were Edmund Stafford Bishop of Exeter, Lord Chancellor; William Scroop Earl of Wiltshire, Lord Treasurer; John Busby, William Baggot, Henry Green, and John Russel, Knights. These Men, upon deliberate Thoughts, resolv'd, That it was best to leave London, which had been lately disoblig'd, and had always been inclined to the Lords Party, and raise an Army about S. Albans for the Defence of the King and Nation, with which they might oppose the Duke of Lancaster either at his landing, or before he had gotten a Body of Men together to his Assistance. This Advice was immediately put in Execution, and an Army of Men, whose Loyalty put them upon that Service, gotten together; but when they understood that they were to fight against the Duke of Lancaster, they unanimously declared that they would not oppose him, because his Quarrel was so just, and they believed he sought not the Crown, but the Restitution of his Right, which it would be the highest Injustice to keep him from. This Answer quite discourag'd the King's Friends, for they easily saw their Army, tho' in number sufficient to have done much, yet was not to be trusted to; and therefore dismissing it, betook themselves to other ways for their Security. The Duke of York and Bishop of Exeter kept a good Body of Men with them, but the Lord Scroop, Busby, and Green, fled to A. D. Bristol, and fortified themselves in the Castle; 1399. Baggot went to Chester, and so escap'd into Ireland.

The Duke of Lancaster marches to London. The Duke of Lancaster and Hereford, who had found Fortune even to out go his own Wishes, was invited to proceed in his Attempt by it; and therefore having taken an Oath to the Lords, That he would neither procure nor permit any bodily Harm to be done to King Richard; That he would require only the Lands which were descended to him by Inheritance from his Father, and in Right of his Wife; That he would obtain, that the Commons should be eased of their Taxes and Subsidies, cause the King to send home his Guard of Cheshire Men, and bring him to a better Order of Government; he made all the haste he could to London, the Metropolis of the Nation, of which if he could get the Possession, he should easily master the rest. In his Passage his Army daily increased, partly through the general Inclination that the People had to him, and partly through the Encouragement that Archbishop Arundel gave them by his Pardons from the Pope, promising Remission of all their Sins to such as would assist the Duke against his Enemies. The Duke of York had gotten an Army to oppose the Duke of Lancaster in his March thither, but they would not fight against him; and so he was forced to pass by him to meet the King at his landing in Wales. At London the Duke of Lancaster was received with all Demonstrations of Joy, suitable to the Expectations they had of him: The costliest Entertainments by Feasting, Pageants, and Processions, were thought too little Expressions of their Happiness by his Presence; and as if their Allegiance were transferred to him only, they bestow'd all their good Wishes and Promises on him, leaving nothing for King Richard but Railings and Curings. The Duke by his abode here, having secur'd the City on his side, had little to do but to pursue the Enemies of the common Good; and therefore bent his Course to Bristol, where the three chief Instruments of the Nation's Misery had fortified themselves, sending Parties on all sides to seize and plunder the Persons and Estates of all such as did not join with him and his Confederates. The Duke and his Army besieged the Castle of Bristol, and after four days Siege took it by force, with the Lord Scroop, Busby, and Green that held it. The Hatred of the People to them would bear no delay of their Punishment, wherefore being arraign'd before the Constable and Marshal, they were found guilty of Treason in misleading the King, and were immediately beheaded. The Duke of York after this Execution, became the Duke's Friend and chief Counsellor. The Parties arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham, and Sir Walter Burley, Lawrence Drew, and John Golofer, Esquires; and so what through Fear, and what through Affection, the whole Nation seem'd in a manner subdu'd to the Duke. From Bristol he went to Chester, which receiv'd him with Processions, and yielded their Charter up to him: From hence he sent his Son into Ireland, with the Duke of Gloucester's Son, but in their Passage the latter was drown'd.

While these great Changes were working in England, the King was in Ireland, and had no Intelligence of it; for the Irish Seas were so favour'd the Duke of Lancaster's Attempt, he met with little Opposition before he was settled in England. The News of it at last arriv'd, and put the King into strange Agonies and Perplexities: Something was necessary to be done, but what would avail him was past humane Invention to contrive. The best Advice that could be given him was what himself propounded, viz. That he should hasten with his Army into England, and give the Duke of Lancaster Battel, before his Friends were united with him; and in the mean time he would imprison the Duke of Lancaster's Son Henry, and the Duke of Glocester's Son Humphrey in the Castle of Trim. But the Duke of Aumerle (whether out of Design, or Ignorance is uncertain, tho' his Revolt afterward makes the former most credible) earnestly persuaded the King not to go himself into England, till the whole Fleet was ready, which it might be in few days, and to send some of his Friends before to gather him an Army, that he might not be in danger at his landing. This Counsel the King accepted, and accordingly John Montacute Earl of Salisbury was sent before to prepare an Army of Wessex and Cheshire Men against his Arrival, which he promis'd should be within six days. The Earl landed at Conway in Wales, and by his Zeal for the King's Service, and sending Letters to the Gentlemen of those Countries, which he had heard or knew to remain Loyal, raised an Army of forty thousand Men, ready to march with the King against his Enemies, if he had met them according to his Promise. But when the Earl of Salisbury, who led them to attend the King at the time appointed, seemed to deceive them; and some had raised a Report, That the King was dead in Ireland, the whole Army was so possess'd with the Fears or Belief of it, that they would not by any Arguments the Earl could use be persuaded to begin any Action, till they saw the King, but were contented to stay fourteen days longer for his Arrival; in which time, if it did not happen, they would depart home, as indeed they did, because the King did not leave Ireland till eighteen days after the Earl left him, and was three days in his Passage. The King with the Dukes of Aumerle and Exeter, the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carlisle, with divers other Nobles, landed at Milford Haven in Wales, and leaving the Forces which he had brought out of Ireland with the Duke of Aumerle at Milford, went in a disguise to Conway to see what Army the Earl of Salisbury had got ready to receive him; but he found, that his delays had robb'd him of his Friends to his great Grief, which he with the Earl of Salisbury much lamented. While the King was gone to Conway, the Duke of Aumerle shew'd the Falseness of his Heart by his Actions; for giving it out, that the King had quite left his Army and was fled, he dismissed every Man to provide for his own Safety, and fled himself with five hundred to the Duke of Lancaster. Thomas Peirey Earl of Worcester also, who was Steward of the King's House, brake his Staff in the midst of the King's Servants, and so dissolv'd the King's Family, and fled with him. But the Cheshire Men were not corrupted by these ill Examples of others, they went to Conway to the King; where meeting with others of their Countrymen, they made a considerable Army, and were resolv'd to maintain the King's Right against the Duke and his Adherents unto Death. But King Richard having heard, That all the Castles from the Borders of Scotland unto Bristol were deliver'd up to the Duke of Lancaster, and that all Lords, Gentry, and Commons of the North and South Parts of the Nation had joyned themselves with him, and that his trusty Friends and Counsellors had lost their Heads at Bristol, he despair'd of all Success; and calling his Army together, licens'd them to depart to their homes, chusing rather to submit himself to the Mercy of the Duke, than hazard the Lives of his Loyal Subjects in vain: And so he with the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scroop, and about ten more of his fast Friends, betook themselves to the Castle of Conway to the Earl of Salisbury, resolving to keep themselves there till he could gain better Terms and more Security.

The Castle of Conway was not only very strong in it self, but situated so upon the Sea-shore, that the besieged might easily escape into Ireland, if streighten'd by a Siege. These Advantages the King had so well secur'd, that he fear'd not all the Force of his Enemy the Duke of Lancaster, who was hastening with all his Army towards him, being the only Castle of moment which held out against him. The Duke was not insensible of the Impossibility of getting the King into his Power by Force, so long as he held this Castle; and therefore called a great Council of the Peers which adhered to him, to have their Advice how they should get the King into their Power. Force of Arms was generally agreed upon to be of little use in so mountainous a Country, and against so strong a Fortress; wherefore it was advised by Archbishop Arundel, that the King who was always simple and credulous, should be dealt withal by Policy; and since he had lately sent the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey to know of the Duke of Lancaster what he intended, and desir'd that certain Messengers should be dispatch'd to the King from the Duke with this Answer to his Demand, 'That he fought nothing but a peaceable Settlement of things for the Good of the Nation, and that if he would be pleas'd to call a Parliament, where- in those who had barbarously murdered, or advised the Death of the Duke of Glocester, should be punish'd, and other Irregularities of Government reformed, he and the Duke would be good Friends; only the Duke should have his Pardon of all Offences granted upon his begging of it upon his Knees, and enjoy the Office of high Judge, as his Ancestors had it for an hundred Years, to himself and Posterity. The whole Council approv'd of this Advice as most politick and sure, and accordingly the Duke sent the Earl of Northumberland with four hundred Lances, and a thousand Archers, to deliver the said Message to the King. In his way the Earl had the two Castles of Flint and Rutland deliver'd up to him: When he came at a narrow Passage near the Town, he divided all his Men into two Ambushes, and plac'd them under a Rock, charging them to keep it; and so he with five Men only in his Company went to the Town, where as soon as he arriv'd, he sent an Herald to the King to declare, That he was sent by the Duke about an Agreement between them, and desir'd to have safe Conduct granted him. The King not suspecting any Deceit, immediately gave him License, and the Earl passing over the Water, enter'd into the Castle, where he found the King and the Earl of Salisbury, to whom he deliver'd his Message with much Seriousness, and after confirm'd it with a solemn Oath taken upon the Sacrament, that the Duke should perform what he

The King not believing that Treachery could lurk under such holy and sacred Oaths, no ways compell'd, agreed to meet the Duke and settle this Agreement, intending to pass afterwards into Wales, and provide an Army to secure himself against all future hazards. The Earl having obtained his desires, hasten'd the King away with him to the Duke; and having got him on Horseback, with the Earl of Salisbury, Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scroope, and Sir William Feribee, who attended him, rode along with him to conduct him. The King desired the Earl of Northumberland to ride before to Rutland to provide them a Dinner, which he seem'd diligent to obey, and rode apace from them; but went no farther than his Ambushes, to whom giving notice of the King's approach, and commending their Order, he staid till the King came up, who seeing such a company of Men with the Earl, found that he was treacherously ensnar'd and betray'd; but he had no way to escape their hands, being on all sides inclosed with Rocks. The Earl seeing the King surpriz'd, went to him, and kneeling down to him, told him, That they were a Guard which he had appointed to attend his Person; but the King retorted, That they were needless, and contrary to his promise, who had assured him that he would not have above six Persons with him; and in an Anger said, he would return to Conway; but the Earl was then more plain with him, and said, That since he had him in his power, he would now carry him to the Duke of Lancaster, as he had engaged to do ten days since. The King, tho' unwilling, was forced to go forward, and dining at Rutland, was conducted to Flint-Castle that Night to lodge. The next Morning the Duke of Lancaster, who had notice of the King's arrival at Flint-Castle, drew up his whole Army, consisting of an hundred thousand Men, round about the Castle; and having first sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Peirey, and the Earl of Rutland, to the King in the Morning, to prepare and discourse him, the Duke himself waited on him in the Afternoon. The King received the Duke with much calmness and obligingness; and when the Duke told him first, that he came to obtain the Restitution of his Honours and Lands through his favourable permission; the King reply'd, That he was ready to accomplish his Will; and when he farther added, That since the People complain'd of his rigorous Government for these two and twenty Years, he was now resolv'd to help him to govern better. The King answer'd, Fair Cousin of Lancaster, since 'tis your Will to do so, it pleaseth me well. The Duke also spake to the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scroope, and Sir William Feribee, but took no notice of the Earl of Salisbury, who thence gather'd the Duke's deadly hatred to him. After this discourse was over, the Duke order'd the King's Horses to be brought out, and being mounted with his Friends, conducted him that Night to Chester, where he was kept in the Castle under the Care of the Duke of Glocester's and Earl of Arundel's Sons, who hating him for putting their Fathers to Death, would be more watchful to keep him for the Day of their hoped Revenge. From Chester he was remov'd by Nantwich to New-Castle in Staffordshire, where the old Earl of Warwick, recalled from his Banishment in the Isle of Man, met him to upbraid his Severity to him. From hence he was brought by Stafford to Litchfield, and being lodg'd in the Castle had like to have escaped out at a Window, but was discover'd and put under greater Security. From hence he was carry'd in a few days through Coventry, Daventry, Northampton, Dunstable, and S. Albans, to London. When the Duke was come within six Miles of London, the Mayor and Companies in their Liveries, with Trumpets sounding, met him, and paid him much more Reverence than the King himself. When the Duke came within less than two Miles of the City, he made a pause, and enquired of the Citizens what he should do with the King? Who answer'd, That he should be kept at Westminster; but he stay'd only one Night there, and was convey'd the next Day to the Tower, to be kept a close Prisoner till the meeting of the next Parliament. Several Citizens had contriv'd to kill him as he pass'd through the City; but the Mayor and Aldermen having timely notice of their Design, did by their Vigilance and Care prevent it, and reserv'd him to a more miserable Fate.

The Duke of Lancaster remain'd some Days in the City, at the Bishop of London's Palace and St. John's Hospital without Smithfield, and then retired for some time into Hertfordshire; and having at his first coming to London issued out Writs in the King's Name to summon a Parliament to meet on the last day of September, was extremely busie in Consultations with his Friends how to order matters in this critical Session. It seems that it was fully resolv'd among them, that King Richard should no longer govern the Nation, but the most plausible methods of depriving him was thought worthy of Consultation. Many things were propounded, but the Duke of Tork's Advice was follow'd, who thought it best, that King Richard should both voluntarily resign his Throne, and be solemnly deposed by the Parliament too; because, as he said, tho' the Judgment of Parliament may make him thought worthy to be deposed, yet his Deprivation will never be just unless he joyn'd in a Resignation. This Advice was much approv'd, and accordingly put in execution; for the Day before the Parliament met, which was on the Feast of St. Michael, there assembled in the Tower Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Scroope Archbishop of Tork, John Bishop of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaster, Henry Earl of Northumberland, Ralph Earl of Westmorland; the Lords Burnell, Barkley, Rosse, Willoughby, and Abergevenny, the Abbot of Westminster and Prior of Canterbury; William Thirnings and John Markham, Chief Justices; Thomas Stoke and Thomas Burbach, Doctors of Law; Sir Thomas Harpingham and Sir Thomas Gray, William Ferly and Dennis Lopham, Publick Notaries. When they were set in their places,

A. D. 1399. the King was brought forth in his Regal Habili-ments, and being placed in a Chair of State, he read the form of his Resignation to this effect:

King Richard's Resignation.

In the Name of God, Amen, I Richard by the Grace of God King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, do hereby acquit and discharge all Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, Lords, and all other my Subjects, both Spiritual and Secular, of what degree soever, from their Oath of Fealty and Homage, and all others Bonds of Allegiance to me due both from them and their Heirs, and do hereby release them from the said Oaths and Allegiance, so far as they concern my Person for ever. I also resign all my Kingly Majesty and Dignity, with all the Rights and Privileges thereunto belonging, and do renounce all the Title and Claim, which I ever had or have to them. I also renounce the Government of the said Kingdom, and the Name and Regal Highness thereunto belonging freely and wholly, swearing upon the Evangelists that I will never oppose this my voluntary Resignation, nor suffer it to be opposed, as judging my self not unworthily deprived of my Regal Dignity for my deserts. This Resignation King Richard read with much cheerfulness and calmness, as if he had gladly parted with the Burthen, not Honours of a Crown, and then signed and subscribed it in their presence, desiring that his Cousin the Duke of Lancaster, on whose Finger he put his Signet, might be his Successor, and appointing the Archbishop of York and Bishop of Hereford to be his Procurators, to declare and shew this his voluntary Resignation to all the States of Parliament, and his desire that his Cousin the Duke of Lancaster should succeed him in his Throne. And this done, they took their leave of him.

R. Richard deposed.

The Munday following the Parliament met, and after the Archbishop of York and Bishop of Hereford had declared in the King's Name, that he voluntarily had resigned his Regal Dignity and Power, which they all both Lords and Commons agreed to and accepted, they proceeded to his Deposition; and in order to it digested all the Misdemeanours of his whole Reign, as far as they could call them to mind, into 33 Articles of Accusation, alledging against him, 'That he had wasted the Publick Treasure, and given away the Possessions of the Crown to Persons of no merit; That he had impeached certain Lords of Treason for treating of Matters concerning the State of the Nation, tho' appointed to it by Parliament; That he had forced the Judges to give their Opinions contrary to Law for the destruction of the Lords; That he had punished the Lords, and fined their Attendants for Crimes pardon'd by his Proclamation and Charter; That he had detain'd Records of necessary concern for the good of the Nation; That he had unjustly banish'd the Duke of Lancaster and Hereford, and forbid all his Friends to sue for his return; That he had procured Bulls from the Pope to force his Subjects to observe Laws made for his own ends; That he forbid the Duke of Hereford's Proxies to prosecute or defend his Cause, notwithstanding his Grant to him under Seal; That he put out divers High-Sheriffs duly elected, and put in his Favourites, and kept them in that Office longer than usual; That he borrow'd great Sums of his Subjects, and would not pay them; That he taxed his Subjects at his pleasure, and would not pay them for Provisions had of them; That he said, All Law was in his own Breast and Head, and the Lives of his Subjects were in his Hands; That he put out Knights and Burgeses duly elected for the Parliament, and put in Men for his own turn; That he had extorted several Sums of the Clergy at his going into Ireland, contrary to Law; That he devised certain new Oaths, and forced his Subjects to take them; That he banished the Archbishop of Canterbury without just Cause, and gave his Goods to his Successor, on condition he should observe the Statutes made at Sbrensbury and Coventry; with other Misdemeanours of less Importance. These Articles being composed in form and engrossed, were brought into the Houses, and being read, it was demanded of the Lords and Commons, what their Judgment was concerning them? They reply'd, That they were notorious Crimes, and that King Richard being manifestly found guilty of the same, was worthy to be deposed from his Royal Authority and Dignity; and thereupon Commissioners were appointed by both Houses to pronounce a Sentence of Deposition against him in the manner and form following:

In the Name of God, Amen. We, John Bishop of Asaph, John Abbot of Glasfenbury, Thomas Earl of Gloucester, Thomas Lord Barkley, Sir Thomas Erpingham, and Sir Thomas Gray, and William Thirning Justice, Commissioners specially chosen by the three States of this present Parliament, representing the whole Body of the Realm for all matters by the said States to us committed, considering the manifold Perjuries and Cruelties, notorious Crimes and Offences, by Richard late King of this Realm committed and done, contrary to the Laws and good Government of the Kingdom, during the time of his Reign, as was made manifest to the whole Body of Parliament by several Articles exhibited against him, and by his own Confession of his own Insufficiency, and Misdemeanours of Government: We the Premises well considering, do by the Power and Authority to us committed, in the Names of all the said States, pronounce, decree and declare the said Richard unworthy of the Rule and Government of the said Realm, and for the said Causes do deprive him of all Kingly Dignity and Worship, expressly forbidding all Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, and Knights, and all other Persons within this Kingdom, of what Quality or Degree soever, from this Day forward to be obedient or attendant on the aforesaid Richard as King and Lord of these Realms. This Sentence of Deposition being pronounced, the said Commissioners in the Name of the Parliament resigned unto King Richard all their Homage and Fealty, which in time past they had made or did owe unto him; and so King Richard was look'd upon as wholly depriv'd of his Regal Power and Kingdoms.

The Report of these Commissioners being given in to the Parliament, it was presently voted that the Throne was<sup>a</sup> vacant by the voluntary Cession and just Deposition of King Richard, and therefore they ought to proceed immediately to the Election of a new Prince into the Throne, lest by a long Vacancy the Affairs of the Nation should receive any prejudice. Before any Person was or could be mentioned, Henry Duke of Lancaster rose up from his Seat, and having crossed himself on the Forehead and Breast, as the manner was, put in his Claim for the Kingdom in these words:

<sup>a</sup> The Throne was not formally voted vacant; but as soon as the Deposition and Renunciation of King Richard were read, the Duke of Lancaster rose up and claim'd the Crown by descent; after which the Lords and Commons severally and generally consented to choose him for their King.

A. D. 1399. In the Name of God, Amen. I, Henry Duke of Lancaster, do claim as my Right the Crown and Realm of England, with all the Dominions and Appurtenances thereunto belonging, being Lineally descended from Edmund surnamed Crouch-back, eldest Son of our good Lord Henry the Third; and through the Right which God of his Grace hath sent me by his Assistance, and help of my ready Kindred and noble Friends, who have adventur'd with me to recover the same, being at the point of Destruction for want of good Government and an orderly Distribution of Justice. And then he retur'd to his Place, and sat down again.

How far this Claim prevail'd in the Election, 'tis no ways evident. The Archbishop, who made the Proposals, did not think fit to insist much upon this Title, but put it to the Houses choice whom they would have for their King: For he in order mentioned several that had a near Alliance to the Crown, and asked the Houses, First, Whether they would have the Duke of York for their King? And they said, No. Then, Whether they desired his eldest Son Edward Duke of Aumerl? And they reply'd, No. Then he propounded the Duke of York's youngest Son, and several others, but all were refused. Then the Archbishop pausing awhile, asked them, Whether they would have the Duke of Lancaster for their King? They said, We will have him, and none else; and so answer'd three times. The Choice being thus fixed on the Duke of Lancaster, the Archbishops going to him, kneeled down before him, and declaring to him that the People had unanimously chose him for their King, desired his Acceptance of the Care and Government of the Realm. The Duke being also on his Knees when they spake to him, rose up and reply'd, That since the Kingdom was devolved upon him by a special Dispensation of Divine Providence, he durst not refuse it. Then the Archbishop having read to him the Duties of a King, signed him with the Sign of the Cross, and the King kissed the Archbishop; and the Constable taking the Ring with which the Kings were wedded to the Realm, shew'd it to the whole Assembly, and then put it on the King's Finger, and the King kissed the Constable. Then the Archbishops led the King to the Royal Seat, who made his Prayers immediately before it, and then turning himself to the Assembly, gave

Thanks to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, A. D. and all the States of the Realm; assuring them, 1399. That he would not by way of Conquest disinherit, or deprive any Man of his Rights and Franchises which he now enjoyeth, or hath had by the Custom and good Law of the Realm. Then a general Silence being kept a little time, the whole House gave Thanks to God for his Gift of so good a King to the Nation; the Archbishop rose up, and in a Sermon-like Speech upon 1 King. 9. 17. from whence he singled out these words for a Theme, A Manshall rule over my People, declared the Happiness of this Nation in the Person they had chosen; That he was not as the former King, a Child in Understanding, tho' not in Years, under whose Government they suffer'd so many Miseries, but a Man of perfect Reason and vast Experience and Judgment, under whose auspicious Government we have Assurance of a full and free Profession of Religion, a due Administration of Justice, a lasting Peace and Plenty, concluding with a short Prayer, 'That he might long prosperously reign over the Kingdom, to the Glory of God and the Prosperity of the Nation. To which the whole Assembly, with joyful Acclamation said, Amen, and Amen.

King Richard was thus deposed from his Royal Dignity, and Henry Duke of Lancaster settled on the Throne, when he had reigned two and twenty Years, three Months and eight days. The Manner and Form of it was signified to him by Justice William Thirning the next day, who at the same time surrender'd back all Homage and Fealty due unto him; but King Richard seem'd very little concern'd, hoping, that the new King would shew him the greater Kindness for his willing Resignation of all to him. King Henry, as soon as the Parliament rose, went to Whitehall, and made a great Feast for all the Members; at which he demean'd him with the usual Obligingness and Kindness, without the Majestic Reservedness or Distance of a King, to the good liking of all his Subjects present. In the Afternoon he was proclaimed King by the Name of Henry the Fourth King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland; and Proclamations were published to continue all Officers and Justices in their Places, to preserve the Order and Government of the Kingdom.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Richard II.

IN the 5th Year of his Reign, when his first Wife Queen Anne came from Bohemia, she had no sooner set foot on Shore, but such a Tempest immediately arose as had not been seen in many Years. Several Ships were dash'd in pieces in the Harbour, and the Ship in which the Queen came over was shatter'd and broken; which was the more observable, because his second Wife brought a Storm with her to the English Coasts, in which the King's Baggage was lost, and many Ships of his Fleet cast away. Sir John Hayward.

At Newcastle upon Tyne, as two Ship-Carpenters were squaring a piece of Timber, wherever they hew'd Blood issu'd forth in Abundance. Ibid.

In the 6th Year of his Reign, on the 21st of May, several Churches were thrown down by an Earthquake; and on the 24th of May there was an Earthquake, or as Holinshead calls it, a Waterquake; whose Motion was so violent, that it made the Ships in the Harbours beat one against the other, and very much endamag'd them.

About the same time the Use of Guns came in, and Sir Hugh Calverly, Governour of Calais, was the first that employ'd them in the English Service.

In his 10th Year Wine was so cheap, that the best was sold for 20 s. the Tun, and that which was not so good at 13 s. 4 d.

The same Year Sir John Montacute, a great Follower of Wickliff's, order'd all the Images to be taken out of his Church at Shenly in Buckinghamshire. Holinshead.

In his 12th Year, while the King was at his Manour of Sheen in the Month of July, there appear'd on a sudden such innumerable Swarms of Gnats, that they darken'd the Air. They skir-smith'd and fought in Parties, the slain fell down to the Ground by Heaps at a time; and being swept together with Brooms, were found to be many Bushels full. About a third part of the whole came off Conquerors, and flew away.

In the following Year a Hurricane threw down many Houses, destroy'd Cattel, and rooted up Trees. This preceded a great Mortality, especially among the Youth, and that a Famine; for says my Author, Wheat was sold for 13 d. a Bushel. Hol. Tho' Money was scarce at that time, yet one wou'd think such a Price for Corn had never been the Sign of a Dearth in England.

On the 9th of July, in his 15th Year, the Sun appear'd to be obscur'd by certain thick and dreary Clouds between that and the Earth: Its Beams seem'd of the Colour of Blood, and gave little or no Light from Noon till it set. These Clouds rose daily for almost six Weeks together. The North and East Parts of England were at the same time sore afflicted with a Pestilence: In a few Weeks there dy'd eleven thousand Men, Women, and Children, in the City of Tork. Hol.

The next Year Wool was so cheap, 'twas sold in some places at 22 d. the Stone. The same Year a Dolphin was taken near London Bridge ten Foot long: His coming up the River so far was an ill Omen of the Storins that happen'd soon after.

In his 18th Year an Apparition of Fire was seen in divers Places in England in several Forms, sometimes like a turning Wheel burning, sometimes like a Barrel with Flames of Fire flashing out at the Head, and sometimes like a long burning Lance: When it appear'd to any Persons, it wou'd go as they went, and stop when they stopp'd. A Head was made at this time, the Cruel Parliament then sitting, which spoke of it self and said, The Head shall be cut off, the Head shall be lift up aloft, the Feet shall be lift up aloft above the Head; which was done, as Holinshed supposes, by Necromancy, and as we wou'd think now by a Trick. In April a fiery Dragon was seen in several Counties, and some time before there happen'd a Conjunction of the two greatest Planets Saturn and Jupiter.

In the Reign of this King the most Famous Soldiers were Henry Earl of Darby, who succeeded him in the Throne, Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earl of Arundel; Popular Lords, Henry Earl of Northumberland, and Roger Mortimer Earl of March. For Learning the most Eminent were,

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY IV.

Reg. 1.
K. Henry
his Pe-degree, Birth, and Succession.

HENRY, surnamed, of Bullingbrooke, a Town of Lincolnshire, the Place of his Birth, having obtain'd the Crown of England by the Resignation of King Richard, and Election of the Three States of the Realm, then assembled in Parliament, assumed the Government, Sept. 30. 1399. He was the Eldest Son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, Fourth Son of King Edward the Third, and after his Father's Death was himself Duke of Lancaster, as he was before in Right of his Wife, Duke of Hereford. The Regal Power did not belong to him in a Lineal Succession after King Richard, because there were yet surviving some of the Posterity of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, (the Elder Brother of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster,) by a Female Branch, his Daughter Philippa, who being married to Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, left a Son Roger Mortimer, who had been declared next Heir of the Crown by Parliament in K. Richard's Time, and dying left Edmund Mortimer the Heir of his Honour and Estate, with several other Children. But as the great Opinion of Henry's Merit, in rescuing the Nation from the Tyranny of Favourites, and the Oppression of bad Governours, made no Reward to be thought great enough for him, but that of the Crown; so Henry being confident of the People's Favour, and considering the Obscurity of Mortimer's Family, ventured upon it, and, as if the Salick Law had been in Force in England, claim'd the Royal Authority, as the next Heir to it. Edmund Mortimer was not insensible of his Right, and tho' he saw it in vain, while the Nation was in so great a Ferment, and the Minds of the People were so passionately fix'd upon the Duke of Lancaster, to oppose the Current of Favour, and Power with his Claim, and therefore betook himself to Privacy at his Manor of Wigmore, in Herefordshire; yet it was very grating to him to hear Henry call himself Heir of the Crown of England, and therefore said to his Friends, that he was Heres malus, such an Heir as the Pirate is to the Merchant's Goods, which he by Force takes from him.

K. Henry's
Coronation.

Henry being thus got into the Possession of the Crown, used all the Arts of a politick Prince, to settle himself firmly in it, and entail it as strongly as was possible upon his Posterity. The First of these he had no other Way left to do, but by his Coronation; which for that End he appointed to be celebrated on St. Edward's Day, October 13. as soon as Preparations could be made for so great a Ceremony. The latter he resolved to do by Parliament, which he upon mature Deliberation dissolved, (because it was called by King Richard's Writ, and therefore its Acts might become disputable, if it had been continued,) and sent out his own Writs to have another chosen, which he appointed to meet the next Day after his Coronation, October 14. in order to his Crowning, which drew on apace. He not only supply'd all Offices of the Court, which were vacant either by the Deaths of such as had suffer'd, or were fled for their Misdemeanors under King Richard, with such Persons as were most faithful and deserving, (viz. Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, he made High-Constable; Ralph, Earl of Westmoreland, Earl-Marshal; Sir John Norbury, Lord-Treasurer; Sir John Sherley, Chancellor; and Sir Richard Clifford, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; and confirm'd the other Officers of State, who were to assist at that Ceremony,) but constituted a Special Court to receive the Claims of such as by certain Tenures or Custom were to officiate at it; of which his Second Son Thomas was appointed Steward, (a) and for that Purpose kept his Court in Westminster-Hall several Days together, till all Things were settled, and order'd for the Solemnity. The King on St. Edward's Eve lodged in the Tower of London, and there made his Three Sons, with several of the Sons of the Nobility, and many others to the Number of Forty Six, Knights of the Barb. On St. Edward's Day in the Morning he rode through the City to Westminster, being attended by the Mayor, Aldermen, and chief Citizens of London, clothed in rich Liveries, and follow'd with a costly Equipage, where he was consecrated, anointed, and crown'd by Tho. Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury. He was anointed with an Oil, which was then thought to have a peculiar Sanctity, and Excellency in it, being given to his Grand-father by the Mother-Side, to Henry, Duke of Lancaster, by a religious Hermit, with this Prophecy; That the Kings that should be anointed with it, should be endued with a Zeal to patronize and defend the Church. King Richard having found it among his Father's Jewels and Treasures, with a Label, signifying the Use of it, had a Design to have been crown'd again, that he might be anointed with it; but Archbishop Arundel asserting it unlawful for him to be anointed twice, put him from that Resolution; and so Henry having got it of King Richard, at Flint-Castle, by the Archbishop's Means, was the first that was anointed with it. At his Coronation, King Henry ha-

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1. ving observ'd that his Hereditary Claim was not justifiable, (b) and that it began to be ridiculed by his Enemies, caused himself to be proclaim'd King of England, first by Conquest, and then by the special Designation of King Richard, who at his Resignation of his Crown had given it to him, then Duke of Lancaster, as his adopted Son. And thus did Henry seem to himself, to have clear'd up his Title, and secured himself a firm Possession of the Crown, which some at that time judged to be given him by God's special Favour and Providence, so much the more, because his Coronation happen'd exactly upon that Day Twelve-month, on which he had been banish'd by King Richard, as if this great Change of the Kings had been the Reward of the Injustice of the One, and the Innocency of the Other, and God had bestowed Crowns not for Civil Titles, but Deserts.

(c) The Parliament, according to Appointment, assembled the next Day after the Coronation; and having chosen a new Speaker, William Durwood, Esq; in the Place of Sir John Cheyney, who desired to be excused for his Infirmary and Sickness, they were order'd by the King, in the first place, to inspect into the Abuses of Government, in the Reign of King Richard, and to regulate all Things that had been found prejudicial to the publick Interests; to examine the Case of the condemn'd Lords; and, more especially, to bring the Murtherers of the Duke of Gloucester to condign Punishment. The Parliament were very zealous to obey so just a Command; and in pursuit of it, having recited, and condemn'd the Transactions of the Parliament, in the 21 Rich. II. in banishing the Duke of Hereford without any reasonable Cause; in condemning the Arch-bishop, without hearing his Defence; in barbarously justifying the Duke of Gloucester's Murther; in denying the Earl of Arundel the Benefit of his Pardons, and putting the whole Power of the Parliament into the Hands of certain select Persons, to the great Injury of the Nation, they repeal'd, and utterly made void all, and singular the Statutes and Ordinances of the said Parliament, and abrogated the Authority and Power given to any Person or Persons by any Act or Law of the same, and revived the Statutes of the Parliament held in 11 Rich. 2. by which the Supreme Power of the Nation was put into the Hands of the Duke of Gloucester, Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and some others, till the King should be of full Age to assume the Government himself. By these Acts the Attaint of Blood was removed from the Lords, which had suffered, or were condemn'd in the said Parliament; and as a necessary Consequence of that, the Heirs of the condemn'd Lords were restored to their Honours and Estates by another Act made for that Purpose; yet, with a Proviso, That the Rents of their Lands should not be exacted of the Persons that had been in Possession of them for the Time past. And because many Things had by the said Parliament been made to be Treason, which had not been formerly so esteem'd, and that for no other Reason, but that the Crimes of the said Lords might be more notorious; yet with such Prejudice to all the King's Subjects, that no Man hardly could behave himself cautiously enough to avoid the Penalty of it; therefore it was further enacted, That nothing for the future should be esteem'd, or adjudg'd to be Treason, but what was ordain'd to be Treason by 25 Edw. 3.

The next Thing they enter'd upon, was the Duke of Gloucester's Murther, concerning which they had a very particular Information given them by Sir John Baggott, then a Prisoner in the Tower, who in a kind of Narrative, among many other Things relating to King Richard's Actions and Sayings, discover'd; That it was by the Advice and Instigation of the Duke of Aumerle, that the Lords were apprehended by the King, and that the Duke of Gloucester was inhumanely murther'd at Callis; That the Duke of Norfolk did keep the Duke of Gloucester alive Three Weeks against the King's Will; but, that for fear of the King's Displeasure, both the said Duke and himself, with several of the King's, and Lord's Servants, went over to Callis, and saw him put to Death. The Duke of Aumerle denied the Charge brought against him by Sir John Baggott, and offer'd to justify his Innocency by Combat, in such manner, as should be thought requisite; but Baggott not being at Liberty to accept the Challenge, the Lord Fitzwater, with Twenty other Lords, offer'd to make it good by their Bodies, That he was the very Cause of the Duke of Gloucester's Death. The Duke of Surrey stood up against the Lord Fitzwater; and having affirm'd, that what the Duke of Aumerle had done against the Duke of Gloucester, was by Constraint and Force, offer'd to vindicate him by Fight: Their Hoods, which they flung down as Pledges of their Intention, were deliver'd to the Constable and Marshal to be kept. The Parliament might have taken Occasion from these Dissentions of the Noblemen to have proceeded with greater Severity against all the Instruments of this barbarous Fact; but the King having prescribed them such Measures as were more suitable for his present Condition, they contented themselves to inflict a more moderate Punishment on them, viz. That the Dukes of Aumerle, Surrey, and Exeter, the Marquess of Dorset, and Earl of Gloucester, who had been the Accusers of the Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lords, should be reduced to the same State they were in before the Arrest of the said Duke and Lords, losing not only their present Titles of Honour, of Duke, Marquess, and Earl, but also all those Castles, Lordships, Manors, or other Possessions whatsoever, which had been given them since the last Parliament, and belonged to any of the Persons whom they had impeach'd, or were held by Gift from the King, and should forthwith bring the Charters and Deeds of the said Lands, Castles, or Manors into the Chancery to be cancell'd; and, That it should be utterly unlawful for any of the said Lords to give Liveries to any Retainers, or keep any Persons about them, but necessary Servants; and, That it should be High-Treason in any of them to enable, or any ways assist King Richard, to recover his Crown, and disturb King Henry in the Possession of it.

These Inflictions satisfied the King and Parliament, but the Commonalty were not so con-

(b) His Hereditary Title was one of the Three by which he proclaim'd, that he held the Crown. The First was, By Right of Conquest; the Second was, King Richard's Resignation and Designation of him for his Successor; the Third and Last was, His being of the Blood Royal, and next Heir Male of King Richard; which last Words in the Proclamation occasion'd that Pun of Mortimer's, Hares Milus; but Edmund had his Jest and Henry his Crown.

(c) On the Day of his Coronation his Eldest Son Henry was by assent of all the Three Estates created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, being then about Eleven Years old; the Crown was also settled upon him after his Father's Death; and in case of the Death of the Prince, on Kings Henry's other Sons.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1. tented, for they repined against the King, Archbishop, Earl of Northumberland, and others, that they were not put to Death, as well as those who had been immediate Actors; of whom John Hall, who confessed himself to be one, was in the Time of this Session hang'd and quarter'd, and his Head sent to Calis, to be set upon the Castle; for, if the Executioner acting by the King's Command be guilty of Murther, much more the false Accusers and Witnesses, who caused his Condemnation; but Moderation was thought more necessary at this Juncture, and especially, since the King's Authority was pleaded for their Action: But, that no such Pretences should be used for the future, a Statute was made, enacting, That it should be no Excuse hereafter for any Persons doing an unlawful Action, to alledge, that he was forced and constrained by the King; and a general Pardon was then granted to all Persons, but the Duke of Gloucester's Murtherers.

Proceedings against King Richard. The Parliament having proceeded thus far in the Matters done in King Richard's Reign, came next to consider about his Person; and the Motion being made how he should be disposed of, (d) that he might not be a Trouble to the King and Nation for the future, the Houses enter'd into hot and long Debates concerning it, as being a Matter of very great Importance; and among others, who by special Order of the Houses were allow'd to deliver their Opinions upon that Subject without Interruption, John Marke, Bishop of Carlisle, a Person both of Learning and Integrity (and as Sir Walter Rayleigh says, the only honest Man in the Parliament, who scorn'd his Life and Estate in respect to his Sovereign's Right, and his own Allegiance) having always disliked the former Proceedings, in deposing King Richard, and setting the Duke of Lancaster on the Throne, deliver'd his Judgment to this Effect, in a grave and learned Speech; That the Resolution of this Question being so necessary for the Settling the Peace of their own Consciences, as well as the future Order and Quiet of the Nation, they ought to consider, before they came to any Determination upon these Two Things. 1. Whether King Richard be sufficiently and lawfully deposed: And, 2. Whether King Henry be justly and prudently chosen in his Place. As for his own Opinion upon them, he freely and boldly laid it down before them thus: That though in a Popular or Consular State, such as of old, the Commonwealth of the Lacedaemonians and Romans at first were, and such as the Empire of Germany, Kingdoms of Denmark, Swedeland, and Dukedom of Venice at this Day are, it may be lawful for the Nobles, or People to restrain, or remove their Princes from their Imperial Power and Dignity, because they have not Regal Rights, yet in such Governments as the Sovereign Majesty is absolutely seated in the Prince, as it was in the Three first Empires, and in the Kingdoms of Israel and Judea anciently, and is in the Nations of England, France, Spain, and almost all the Kingdoms of Asia and Africa at present, it is not, nor can be lawful for any, nor all their Subjects, whether Nobles or Commons, to injure and hurt the Persons, nor limit and abrogate the Power of such Kings, either by any judicial Proceedings, or by Force, altho' they be become not only unprofitable and hurtful, but intolerable and destructive to their

Subjects; and that because neither one, nor all Magistrates have any Authority over their Prince, from whom all their Power is derived, and whose Presence doth immediately suspend all their Rule and Jurisdiction; and more especially, because no Subject of what Degree or Condition soever can imagine, attempt, counsel, assist, or undertake any thing prejudicial to the Person or Authority of such Princes, but they incur the great and heinous Crime of High-Treason. Who were more cruel, unjust, and impious Princes than Nebuchadnezzar and Saul, and yet the Prophets Jeremiah and David command Obedience to, and condemn all rebellious Attempts against them? The Law of God allows not the Child to lift up his Hand against his Parent, be he a Robber, a Murtherer, and a Person never so execrable for Villanies, both to God and Man; and surely our Prince, who is Pater Patria, the common Father of all his Subjects, and therefore ought to be more sacred and dear to us than our natural Parents, may much less be rebelled against or deposed, though never so Tyrannical and Impious. The Oracles of God tell us, That Kings have Dominion over the Bodies and over the Cattle of their Subjects at their Pleasure; and the Church hath declared it an Heresie, to hold, That a Prince may be slain, or deposed by his Subjects for any Defects, either in his Life or Government. And if it be really unlawful to depose the worst of Princes, how unjust is it to depose good King Richard, who is really guilty neither of any Cruelty, nor Impiety. For, if we impartially examine the Accusations brought against him, we shall find nothing either of Truth or Moment objected. Some Errors and Overights he may be guilty of, but such as have proceeded from such Originals viz. want of Experience, or corrupt Counsels, as are very pardonable, and in their worst Effects have not favoured of Tyranny, or Cruelty; and if these Failings may be allow'd as just Causes of deposing Kings, the best of Princes will be daily in Danger, and every Tax, Execution of Criminals, or disapproved Action shall arm their Subjects against them. But suppose King Richard must be deposed without Authority in us, or desert in him, yet what Right had the Duke of Lancaster to the Crown? Why did we give it him? Heir he could not be to the Crown, not only because King Richard is still alive, and the Living have no Heirs; but because some of the Posterity of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, are yet surviving, whose Line by the Judgment of the Parliament, holden 8 Rich. II. was declared Heirs to the Crown. By Right of Conquest he could not have it; for being a Subject, all War raised by him against his Sovereign was Rebellion; and Victory, Treason. As for King Richard's Resignation of the Crown to the Duke, it gives him no Title; for by the Laws of the Land the King can't alienate so much as the ancient Jewels and Ornaments belonging to the Crown, much less the Crown it self and Kingdom; which, if it were in his Power, yet since it was exacted of the King in his Imprisonment, and under Constraint, it can't in Reason be thought of any Force to bind him; for no Act of a King can be obligatory that is not free, and none is free where Liberty is restrain'd, and Fear justly suspected.

(d) Holinhead says, The Commons Address was to this Purpose; That since King Richard had resign'd, and was lawfully deposed from his Royal Dignity, he might have Judgment decreed against him. P. 512.

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1. We have no Custom in England, that the People should elect them a King at their Pleasure, but they are always bound to submit to him, who by Right of Blood is the next Successor; and therefore the People's Election, as it can neither create a Title to the Crown, nor give any Regal Right, so neither can it make that Title good, which is before by Violence gotten and usurp'd. 'Twas nothing then that rais'd Henry to the Crown, but Ambition in himself, and a seditious Disposition in the People, who, though they have gotten greater Wisdom and Courage in their King by the Change; yet will find, if not greater Cruelty and Policy, shou'd the right Heirs ever be able to vindicate their Title by Arms, that they have entail'd Misery and Bloodshed upon themselves and Posterity. From these Premisses, he boldly concluded, That they had neither Power nor Policy to depose King Richard, nor elect King Henry in his room; That King Richard was still their lawful King, and that they ought not to pass any Judgment concerning him; That the Duke of Lancaster had offend'd more against the King and Realm by his impious Arms, than King Richard hath against him or us; and if they thought not fit to take Notice of Henry's Injuries done to the Nation, contrary to his Oath, yet their private and publick Dangers ought to deter them from any violent Proceedings against King Richard.

This Speech how well soever it was inwardly approved in such Mens Minds, whose Loyalty was stifled rather than extinct, yet was outwardly generally disgust'd, and the Bishop himself being apprehended and sent to the Tower by the Earl-Marshal, (e) the House proceeded to this Resolution, and caused it to be enacted, That King Richard having been lawfully deposed from his Royal Dignity for his Misgovernment, was by the Clemency of King Henry, granted his Life; yet, for the Security of the Kingdom, should be kept in close Imprisonment so long as he lived, being allow'd a Princely Attendance and Maintenance; but, if any Person should attempt his Deliverance, King Richard himself should be the first Man that should be put to Death for it.

And thus was the Nation secured against King Richard, and the bad Effects of his Government, as was thought; whereupon the Houses proceeded to provide as effectually as they could for the future Safety, Greatness, and Continuance of their new King, his Friends, and Children; and to that End made several Statutes, viz. 1. That no Persons that had been assisting to King Henry, either in subduing King Richard, and his Adherents, or in raising King Henry to the Regal Dignity, should be hereafter impeach'd for Rebellion and Treason. And whereas King Richard had procured a Bull of the Pope for the more certain Observation of some Statutes made by him and his Parliament, as tho' there were not sufficient Power in them to enforce Obedience without the Pope's Concurrence: This was look'd upon by the Parliament as a Derogation to the Regal Dignity of England; and accordingly, after they had voted it to be an Act of Wrong to the Nation in King Richard, to desire any such Bull of the Pope, they enacted; That the Crown of the Realm of England, and the Jurisdiction belonging to the same; as also the whole Realm it self is still, and at all Times lately past hath been at such Liberty, and enjoy'd such an independent and absolute Prerogative, that neither the Pope, nor any other Prince or Potentate, who is out of the Kingdom, ought or may intrude himself, or intermeddle with the Rule and Government of the same; and so secured the full Power of the Regal Dignity to King Henry. And that not only himself, but Posterity might enjoy it, an Act of Settlement was made to entail the Crown upon King Henry, and the Heirs of his Body, lawfully begotten, viz. That from and after the Decease of King Henry, his eldest Son Henry, lately created by his Father, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, should succeed him in the Crown and Government of the Nation, and his Heirs after him; but for want of such Heirs, it should descend and come unto his Three Younger Brothers, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, in order, in case the Heirs of any, or all of them did not survive them. By this Parliament also Arch-bishop Arundel was restored to his See; and Roger Walden, who had been put into it by King Richard, was removed. (f) Other Matters relating to the present State and Condition of the Nation were resolv'd, and agreed on; as about the Accompts of Sheriffs, the Liberties of Merchants-Strangers, the Necessity of sending Ambassadors to the Neighbouring Princes, about the present Change, to satisfy them in the King's Title, and Reason of his assuming the Kingdom, with such like Things; and so the Parliament was dissolved.

Henry having thus attended his Parliament for his Establishment; and not much minding how other Affairs went, till he saw what the Effects of that would be, because he knew that if the Parliament stood by him, other Opposition would easily be conquer'd, found the English Dominions both at Home and Abroad in great Disorder, and himself to stand very dubious, not only of the Affections of many of his own Subjects, but also of the Foreign Princes his Neighbours. The Scots, while the Parliament sat, knowing that the Lords and Gentlemen, who were the Guardians of the Northern Parts, could not be absent from it in this Juncture, invaded these Countries; and because the Pestilence so afflicted the Inhabitants of them, that few Men of Interest or Estate were left in them, had an Opportunity of doing much Mischief, which they were not wanting to make use of, and took the Castle of Warke in Northumberland, and demolished it.

The People of Aquitain, and especially those about Bordeaux, the Place of King Richard's Nativity, were much discontented, and were almost resolv'd to desert that perfidious Nation, which had proved so false and treacherous to their natural Prince, fancying they could not expect a Blessing from Heaven upon so unjust an Usurpation; and to join in Submission, was to bring themselves, as they supposed, under the Stroke of the deserved Vengeance, which was due to so unreasonable a Rebellion. The King of France, who was extremely incens'd at the Severity of the English against his Son-in-Law, King Richard, because he was disappointed at once of the Advantage he had propounded to himself in so good an Alliance, and to his Daughter in so great a Match, was not a little pleas'd to see his Neighbours in Aquitain so much disturb'd at the Change in England; and endeavouring to make their Discontents his Ad-

A. D. 1399. Reg. 1. *W*antage, sent the Duke of Bourbon to solicit them to a Revolt, which they had easily been tempted to, had not Sir Robert Knolles, the English Governour there, and some of the most considerate Men over-perswaded them, that it was Madness to yield their Necks to the unsupportable Burthen of French Tyranny, out of mere Fears and Jealousies of a bad Consequence of the Revolution in England, which was at best changing a Certainty for an Uncertainty, and so restrain'd their Determination for a Time. King Henry being a watchful and crafty Prince, was not insensible of all these Inconveniencies to himself and Government, but with a wonderful Dexterity he applied such suitable Remedies to them all, as, in some measure, quickly dispelled the Dangers which seem'd thus to threaten him on all Sides. His own Subjects he won by Kindness, taking the Dukes of Aumerle and Exeter into particular Favour, and special Trust about his Person; which Confidence, tho' his Friends blamed him for, yet he chose to shew to them, lest any Indications of Jealousie should excite them to disturb his unsettled State. The Scots he despised, because they appear'd not as Enemies, but as Robbers. The Neighbouring Princes he endeavour'd to satisfy, by sending an Embassage to each of them, fully instructed with all such Arguments for his assuming the Regal Dignity, as rather made his Cause plausible, than justified it; and was so successful with all the Princes unconcern'd, that they seem'd to approve what he had done; unless it were the King of France, who resolved upon a War with England, to restore his Son-in-Law, King Richard, being instigated to it by many of his Nobles, but chiefly by Valerem, Earl of S. Paul, who had married King Richard's half Sister. The deposed King, who had been kept a Prisoner in the Tower of London, during the Session of Parliament, was removed to his Castle of Leeds in Kent, and a little after sent to Pomfret Castle in Yorkshire. The People of Guyenne and Aquitain King Henry pacified by sending over to them Tho. Piercy, Earl of Worcester, a Person faithful to his Interests, and very expert in managing Matters of that Nature, with a considerable Body of Men. He behaved himself with that Prudence and Moderation towards the wavering People, perswading the better Sort with fair Promises and good Arguments to continue their Subjection, and terrifying the common People with Threats and Arms, that he in a short time brought those Provinces to swear Fealty to King Richard, and yield as willing Obedience to him, as to any of the former Kings of England; yet he thought fit to plant some Garrisons among them, to secure their Allegiance, if they should be tempted to revolt, and so return'd Home again.

A. D. 1400. *W*hen things being thus settled, and tolerably composed for the present, the King was encouraged to keep his Christmas after the usual Manner at Wind-sor, in Feasting and Sports, as being secure from all Dangers, which were near at hand, or within his own Dominions at least, and having Time enough to prepare against his only open Enemy the King of France. But as Sores hastily cured seldom prove sound, so this sudden Settlement of Affairs, after so great a Change, soon appear'd to be weak: For, though the Nation generally approved and liked the King, yet there were many Malecontents, who either out of a true Principle of Loyalty, or out of Pity and Compassion to King Richard, or out of Discontent for their own Losses or Sufferings, desired and sought the Fall of the new erected Government. The first Attempt that was made towards it, was begun while the King was giving up himself to the Pleasures and Ease of Christmas; and that it might carry no Shew of the Mischief design'd, was contrived to be acted in a Sport that was usual at that time, Mumming, or Justing, after this manner. The Abbot of Westminster, who was a much better Politician than Divine, and upon that account had been in great Favour and Credit with King Richard, was upon the Deposition of his Master not only troubled for the Loss of the Honours and Greatness he enjoy'd under him; but by the Placing of the Duke of Lancaster on the Throne, was put in great Fears of losing what he still enjoy'd, because he had heard him often say, when he was a Subject, That the Revenues of the Church were too great, and the Estates of the Noblemen in England too little; which made him conclude, That being now King, he would certainly take away the Revenues of the Abbies, to enrich his Nobles, and so ingratiate himself with the Laity, as well as strengthen his Interest with the Great Men of the Nation. To prevent such a Mischief to the Church, as well as to himself, the Abbot invited several of the Nobility and Gentry, whom he knew to be disaffected to the present Constitution, to a Feast in his Monastery, viz. the Lords lately degraded by Parliament, Edward, Earl of Rutland, late Duke of Aumerle, Thomas and John Holland, the Earls of Huntington and Kent, late Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, John Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, and Hugh, Lord Spencer, late Earl of Gloucester, Thomas, Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Bernard Brocas, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Bennet Celey, and one Magdalen, a Priest, one of King Richard's Chaplains, in Person much resembling his Master; and after Dinner, withdrawing with them into a private Chamber, he propounded the Restitution of King Richard. The Earl of Holland, whose Mind was full of Revenge against King Henry for his late Disgrace, as well as of Desires of restoring King Richard, who was not only his Brother, but best Benefactor, greedily embraced the Proposal; and having urged it upon the whole Company, That they were in Conscience obliged to endeavour to set their lawful King on his Throne again, and depose the Usurper, tho' with Loss of their Lives; That they had no Reason to think it an unlawful Fact, since the Laws and Examples of all civilized Nations did not barely permit this Action, but rewarded and honoured the Actors, as the greatest Benefactors to a Commonwealth: So far prevailed, that they all promised their utmost Assistance to destroy and murder King Henry, and entered into an Indenture Sextipartite, to bind themselves each to other to be diligent and faithful in the Undertaking, swearing to keep their Design secret, and attend carefully upon the Execution.

The Manner of effecting and bringing about their intended Plot, was thus contrived: The Earls of Huntington and Salisbury appointed to celebrate a solemn Justes, with Twenty select Men of a Side, at Oxford, under a Pretence of diverting the King; and to that End, the Earl of Huntington went to Him, to desire his Presence, and that his Majesty would be pleased to be Judge, if any Controversie should arise in their Exercise. The King not suspecting any Deceit, promised that he would be there at the Time prefix'd, and the Earls made such Preparations as if they were in Earnest, resolving, that when the King was intent upon the Sport,

Reg. 1. The Plot went on smoothly and unsuspected till the Day drew near, and the Lords, having all Things in a Readiness, were preparing to set forward for Oxford. The Earl of Rutland, late Duke of Aumerle, who was one of the principal Conspirators, was as forward as any in the Design; but as he was passing to Oxford, left his direct Way to give his Father, the Duke of York, a Visit, and dine with him. The Earl had brought with him the Counterpart of the Indenture, in which he was bound to the Confederates, and having put it in his Bosom as he was eating, it was espied by his Father, who immediately ask'd him what Writing it was, and what was the Purport of it? The Earl, conscious of the Subject, and knowing how ungrateful such an Enterprize would be to his Father, submissively told him, That it was nothing that concern'd him, and humbly begg'd that he might be excused. But the Duke seeing his Son's Backwardness to shew him the Writing, accompanied with Fear and Surprise, was the more eager to know the Contents of it, and swearing by St. George, That he would see it, flew upon his Son, and by Force took it from him. When the Duke had read it, and saw the Treasonable Design carry'd on by it, he burst out into a great Passion at his Son, charging him not only with Treason to the King, but the most ungrateful Perfidiousness to himself, who being bound for his Allegiance in the last Parliament, was involved in the same Ruine and Destruction with him: And therefore told him, That since he had so little Regard to the Safety of a Father, that had been so tender of his Son's Preservation, as to lay down his Life as a Pledge for it, he would take Care to secure his own Life, tho' with an Hazard to his Son's; and thereupon order'd his Horses to be saddled, to go to Windsor, and discover the whole Matter to the King. The Earl of Rutland, affrighted with his present Danger, and having his Conscience, as well as his Father, for his Accuser, was in great Perplexity what he should do; and tho' he was unwilling to desert his Confederates, yet, now seeing nothing but unavoidable Ruine to attend the Prosecution of their Design, because the King would, by his Father's Discovery of it, have Time to avoid their Contrivance, and provide against them, he resolv'd to become the first Betrayer of the Plot himself, and therefore taking Horse as soon as his Father was gone, rode another Way to Windsor, and got to the King before him, Youth and Danger putting Spurs to his Horse. As soon as he arrived at the Castle, and had gain'd Admission, he pretended earnest Business with the King, and having caus'd the Gates to be lock'd, took the Keys with him. Being come into the King's Presence, he kneel'd down to him, and with a trembling Voice, and dejected Countenance, begg'd his Mercy and Pardon. The King wondring at his Petition, ask'd him, For what Offence? Then the Earl gave him a full Account of the Conspiracy, and Conspirators, with the Manner and Design of the Execution of it. The King, neither rashly credulous, nor imprudently careless of his own Safety, entertain'd the Discovery kindly, and told the Earl, That if his Relation were true, he would pardon him, but if he sought to impose upon him, it should be at his own Peril. These Things had hardly passed between the King and Earl, but the Duke of York arriv'd, who by delivering the Indenture to the King, gave him a sufficient Demonstration of the intended Treason and Plot against his Life: So that after he had read and perused it, there was no Room left to doubt of the Confession he had receiv'd from the Earl of Rutland; wherefore, making some Reflections upon the Baseness and Ingratitude of his Enemies, whom he spared, contrary to the Desire of the People, in thus seeking his Ruine, he turn'd his Thoughts to more necessary Considerations, how he should secure himself, and defeat the Designs of his Enemies, for his Intention of going to Oxford sunk of it self. And for that End he wrote his Letters to the Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, and such of his Friends as he had in other Countries, to provide what Forces they could raise with all Speed, and come to him to London, whither he posted as fast as he could, for fear lest his Enemies should surprize him at Windsor; and (g) having acquainted the Major with his impending Danger, provided a Force in the City for his Defence, resolving to stay there till he could find what Course his Enemies would take against him.

The Lords, and the rest of the Conspirators at Oxford, who waited in Expectation of the Earl of Rutland, not hearing of his or the King's Approach, easily guess'd, that the Plot was betray'd, and therefore considering, that they had so lately been pardon'd, and could not hope again for Mercy, which they had so grossly abused, resolv'd to undertake by open Arms, what they had contriv'd to effect more privately: And that they might get as great a Party as was possible, they cloath'd Magdalen in Royal Robes, and gave it out, That King Richard had made his Escape from Pomfract-Castle, and was come among them to recover his Right, having their Pseudo-Richard ready to justify their Pretences to the Scrupulous and Inquisitive. And because they knew, that the King of France would be glad of an Opportunity of restoring his Son-in-Law K. Richard, they sent to him for his Assistance, and tho' it was not possible to have it presently, yet hoped, he might contribute something in the Spring to their Success. In the mean time, they sent out their Emissaries, to gather as great Numbers out of the Nation to restore King Richard, as they could, and wrought so far upon the People, who generally pity'd the hard Fate of the Captive King, that in a few Days they had gotten together 40000 Men, well arm'd. This prosperous Beginning seem'd an Omen of their good End; and, that they might effect their Desires as soon as possible, they march'd first towards Windsor against King Henry, whom if they could surprize, they hoped to make a speedy Conclusion of the Nation's Troubles; but the King was escap'd to London the Night before, and so they miss'd of their Prey. This Disappointment put them into great Doubts how to proceed effectually against him. Some advis'd to march forward to London, and set upon the King, while the City was unresolv'd, and in no Readiness to make any Resistance, which as it was the best Course they could take, so it shew'd a brave Courage in the Advisers: But the most part, who were more timorous and cautious, thought it better to release King Richard first, lest if

(g) He staid a Day or two at Windsor, but hearing the Conspirators had got 40000 Men together, he stole away in the Night to London; and a few Hours after he was gone, the Rebels came to Windsor. Sir J. Heyward's Hen. IV. it

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1. it should be discover'd, that he was still in Prison, all their Plot should be unravell'd. This Counsel, tho' the worst, was accepted, and in pursuit of it, they turn'd back to Colebrook, and so went to Sunnings, near Reading, where Queen Isabel's Palace was; to whom they gave this Account, That the King was gotten from his Imprisonment at Pomfract, and at the Head of an Army of 100000 Men. Which News was so pleasant to the Queen, that she immediately defaced King Henry's Arms, and pull'd off his Badge from her Servants, who were engaged to wear it, (b) and then departed with the Lords to meet King Richard; exhorting the People, as they pass'd along, to take Arms to vindicate their injured King, who was, and is, and should be their Sovereign. They pass'd through Wallingford, and Abbingdon, and at length came to (i) Cirencester; where having encamp'd their Army in the Fields, the Lords took up their Lodgings in the Town, the Earl of Kent, late Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Salisbury, in one Inn; and Earl of Huntington, late Duke of Exeter, and the Lord Spenser, late Earl of Gloucester, in another Inn. The Bailiff of the Town, who was a firm Friend to King Henry, observing the ill Conduct of this rebellious Rout, and knowing, that if the Heads of the Faction could be suppress'd, the misguided Multitude would melt away of it self, look'd upon the impolitic Separation of the Lords from the Body of the Army, to be a good Opportunity of suppressing the Rebellion, if he could get them into his Power, which seem'd no difficult Matter, because they lay in weak Inns, with no Guards, but a small Attendance of Servants: Wherefore, getting together about Eighty Archers, and such other Arms, as the Time would give leave, he beset the Inns; and, though the Duke of Exeter and Earl of Salisbury with their Men made as brave a Resistance as the Place and their Company would permit; yet they were at length all, but the Duke of Exeter and Sir John Shelly taken, and carried Prisoners to the Abbey. All Means was used by the Servants of the Lords, and their Retainers to further their Escape, for they set the Town on fire in several Places, hoping, that while the Townsmen were busied to save their Houses and Goods, their Masters might have Opportunity to get from them: Others fled to the Army to relate the Accident, and bring them to rescue their Captains and Leaders, but all proved in vain; for the Townsmen enraged by the mischievous Action, neglected their Houses, and bringing forth the Lords, whom they look'd upon as the Authors and Advisers of this cruel Act, beheaded Two of them in the Market-place, viz. The Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Salisbury. And the Army seeing the Fires in the Town, supposed that King Henry, who had gotten a good Army of Londoners, and others, and was pursuing them, had entred the Town; so every Man fled to save themselves.

King Henry was by this Time arriv'd at Oxford, with Intention to stop the Progress of the Rebels; but the Service of the Men of Cirencester had made his Arms useless, being met there with the good News of their Dispersion, and a strong Guard, with Sir Bennett Shelly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Bernard Brocas, and Twenty Eight Lords, Knights and Gentlemen more, who were the chief Leaders of the Rebellion, whom they had taken and sent to be disposed of at the King's Pleasure. These he immediately caused to be executed there. Some of the Lords, and others who were Chief in this Revolt, were fled, as the Duke of Exeter and Sir John Shelly, (k) who got into Essex, and attempted several Times to get over into France, but were driven back by contrary Winds; and so at length were taken at Prittlewell, and being carry'd to Pleshy, were executed in the very Place where the Duke had before arrested the Duke of Gloucester; a just Reward, as was then thought, of his Wickedness to that Nobleman. The Earl of Gloucester fled towards Wales, but being taken, was beheaded at Bristol, and Magdalene, the Counterfeit Richard, with one Fezby, another of King Richard's Chaplains, were apprehended in their Flight to Scotland, and being brought to the Tower of London, were hang'd and quarter'd. The Heads and Quarters of many of the Conspirators were set upon London-Bridge, and sent into other Parts of the Nation to be a Terror to the King's Subjects against such Attempts for the future, which, tho' a just Punishment, yet savour'd so much of Cruelty, that many grave Men were discontented at it, and spared not to say, That in a short time they should wish they still had had King Richard for their Governour, the Faults which proceeded from his Remissness and Mildness being more tolerable than the Cruelty of their new King. But yet, for the present, all Things seem'd quiet, and the Rebellion was perfectly allay'd, which, though it was a great Satisfaction to King Henry and his Friends, yet was born so heavily by the Abbot of Westminster, who was the Author of it, that, for mere Grief of the Disappointment, he fell suddenly into a Palsey, of which he shortly after died. The Bishop of Carlisle had the like Death about the same time; for being condemn'd for this Rebellion, he prevented his more shameful Execution by dying for Grief and Trouble in Prison. And thus most of King Richard's best Friends were taken off by this first Attempt.

But altho' this Conspiracy against King Henry's Life and Dignity was by a propitious Providence disappointed, and the Actors perish'd as suddenly and exemplarily as the King himself could have desired; yet so long as the Cause remain'd, and King Richard was alive, he thought he could never promise himself any Security, but, upon every small Discontent, the plausible Pretence of restoring King Richard to his Throne would be made use of to revenge themselves, and disturb his Quiet: He should be always look'd upon as an Usurper so long as King Richard, whose Right was confirm'd by 22 Years Possession, survived; and, notwithstanding the Rebellion was now appeas'd, yet what Respite could he hope from the like Attempts, so long as the Body of the Rebels still remain'd, wanting only Heads to lead them. These Arguments, grounded upon strong Fears and Presumptions, made him think King Richard's Death necessary first, and after put him upon Resolutions of destroying him. Our Historians differ much in the Manner of his Death, tho' most agree it was by Henry's Means: For that King Richard should voluntarily starve himself for Discontent at the ill Success of the late Rebellion, as some have related, seems very

Those that impute King Richard's Death to King Henry's Order or Encouragement, disagree in the Method of doing it. Some say, He was, by his Order, kept Fifteen Days together from Food, and so, by the Help of Cold, starv'd to Death. Others write, That he was every Day served with Plenty of Dishes fit for a King's Table, as was order'd by Parliament, but not permitted to touch any of them, and so died with Hunger: But both these Ways of destroying were so plain and barbarous, that most of our Modern Historians are of Opinion, That King Henry would not so notoriously contradict his Promise, which he had so lately made in Parliament, That King Richard's Life should not be touch'd. And therefore the general Current of our Writers follow the Relation of an Author (1) of those Times, who seems to have had very good Intelligence of his Death, and relates it thus: That K. Henry sitting at Table one Day very sad and melancholy, burst out into these Words, How miserable is my Condition! who live in continual Fears and Dangers from but one Cause, and yet have no Man so much my Friend as to free me from them. Sir Peirce de Exton hearing these Words, easily guess'd what the King meant, and though he knew them to be no Order or Command, yet he believ'd it would be the more acceptable Undertaking to execute his Desire without an express Command from him; and therefore immediately hasten'd, with Eight Ruffians, to Pomfract to execute his bloody Design. When he was arriv'd, he order'd the Gentleman, who usually was King Richard's Taster, to neglect his Service, and let him eat what he pleased, because he should not eat long. When his Dinner therefore was served in, the Taster omitting his Duty, King Richard demanded the Cause of it, who reply'd, That Sir Pierce de Exton, who was lately come from the King, had forbid him. At which Answer King Richard, being angry, catch'd up the Carving-Knife, and striking the Taster with it, said, The Devil take Harry of Lancaster, and thee together. As the King spoke these Words, came in Sir Peirce himself, and his Eight Attendants arm'd. Their Design was easily known by the Roughness of their Entrance, and King Richard was so far from being daunted at their Presence, that he wrung an Pole-Ax out of one of their Hands, and stood upon his Defence. The Ruffians and Sir Peirce undauntedly pursued their Intent, and assaulted the King, who so well defended himself, that he kill'd Four of them before they could master him. At length Sir Peirce himself coming behind him, struck him a Blow on the Head, and fell'd him, and so he died. The News of King Richard's Death, however it might inwardly please Henry, yet he openly received it with no small Signs of Sorrow for his untimely Fate, and as great Disgust to the Instruments of it; so that Sir Peirce, who expected a Reward for this Piece of Service, was quite put out of Favour, and forced to flee to escape the Punishment due to his Crime, which the King, to save his own Honour, seem'd zealous to execute, and died in Discontent, and

A. D. 1400. Reg. 1. Horrour of Conscience.

Thus did King Richard end his Life, after he had lived 33 Years, and reigned 22, some few Months after his Deposition. He was a Man of a very well-proportion'd Body and graceful Personage, of a very liberal and kind Disposition, which, for want of more Age and Experience, expos'd him to the Flatteries and crafty Insinuations of such as were about him, and humour'd his Genius to Pleasures and Pastimes, which he much lov'd and follow'd. He was by Nature every way qualified to have made an excellent King, neither wanting Understanding to rule, nor Courage to defend a Nation; but being corrupted in his Youth by Flattery, and misled by lewd Persons, he neither knew himself nor others, which was the only Cause of his Ruine; for had he dared to do as much at his last Arrival in Wales, as he did at his Death, or had he made better Choice of Friends, as he had Judgment enough to have done, he might have kept his Kingdom, perhaps, longer than he did. He was guilty certainly of many Faults in Government; but those, either really none of his own, or for want of Experience; which, had they happen'd in other Times, might have been born with, but meeting with Pride and Ambition in the Great Ones, and Discontents in the People, proved his Destruction.

King Henry, being thus rid of his Fears, took such Care of his Funeral, as shew'd, that he neither neglected him, nor would own him for a Rival in his Dignity. His Body being embalm'd, and wrapp'd in Sear-Cloaths, was cover'd with Lead all but the Face, and set in the Minster at Pomfract several Days to be seen of all Persons, who, either out of Curiosity or Pity, would behold him. From thence it was removed to London, and in most of the principal Towns as it was carry'd along, was shew'd to all Spectators. In its Passage thro' the City, the Corps was carried bare-faced, and being brought to St. Paul's, lay Three Days also open to all Beholders, in which time was kept a solemn Obsequies to the deceased Prince, both in that Cathedral, and at Westminster, King Henry himself being present at them, with all the Magistrates, and chief Men of the City. These sacred Offices being perform'd according to the Religion of those Times, the King commanded his Corps to be carried down to Langley-Abbey, in Buckinghamshire, and there buried in the Church of the Friars-Precursors, which was accordingly done by the Bishop of Chester, and the Abbots of Waltham, and St. Albans; none of the Nobles or Commoners being allow'd to attend it, nor any Dinner, or other Ceremony used at it, as was the Custom of those Times. But King Henry afterwards had his Body brought back again, and magnificently entombed at Westminster, by the Body of his Queen Ann, by this pious Deed endeavouring to expiate his Father's Injustice, and Cruelty done to that King.

Much about the Time of King Richard's Death, deceased also the Dutches of Gloucester, who being extremely grieved for the Loss of her Eldest Son Humphrey, who died of the Pestilence at Chester, sunk under the Load of her Sorrows, and departed this Life. Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, who, for his Accusation of the then Duke of Hereford, but now the King, was banish'd for his Life, died also in

Edmund, Duke of York, also yielded to Mortality about this Time, and left two Sons, Edward, late Duke of Aumerl, and then Earl of Rutland, who was Heir of his Honour and Estate; and Richard, Earl of Cambridge, who marrying Anna Mortimer, the Heiress of Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, and Daughter of Philippa, the only Child surviving of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, became afterward a Competitor for the Crown. He carry'd himself in his Nephew King Richard's Reign with such Prudence and Caution, that he neither incur'd the Odium of the Court or People, as almost all the rest of the Nobility did, but was trusted by the King, and yet loved by the Commons. Under King Henry he shew'd more Compliance to the Change of Government, than was thought agreeable to the Relation he had to the King; but there was so great a Necessity of submitting, where all Opposition had been fruitless, that even in this worst Action of his Life, he kept up his Reputation of Honesty and Prudence to the last, and died lamented and honour'd; his Moderation in all times gaining him both Praise and Safety.

King of France ready to invade England, desists from it upon the News of King Richard's Death. While these Things happen'd in England, Charles, King of France, who had resolved to revenge the Wrong done to King Richard by the English, was very active and busie to gather such an Army, as might be able to effect his Design; and by the Assistance of his Nobility, who readily concurr'd with him in so great a piece of Justice, had got all Things necessary for that Expedition ready against the Spring, and was come down with a mighty Army into Picardy; from whence he intended to sail over into England: But the News of the Death of King Richard being brought to the Army, chang'd their Resolutions; and now since they saw it impossible to restore him, the King and chief Men engag'd in that Enterprize thought it the best way to desist from the Invasion, which, though it had some shews of Advantage by plundering so rich a Country, for which End some desir'd it might go on, yet had so much evident Hazzard attending it, that most were willing and glad of the Opportunity of laying it aside, and so the Army was dismissed: And it was resolv'd, that a solemn Embassage should be sent over to Henry to demand, that Queen Isabell should be sent into France to her Father with her Dower, which was accordingly done; but King Henry would give them no other Answer than this, That he would shortly send his Commissioners to Callis to treat and conclude with their Master about that, and several other Affairs of Importance to both Realms, and then would do what was Just and Reasonable.

The Welsh rebel under Owen Glendour. This Summer the Welsh weary of Subjection to the English, and thinking this a fit Opportunity to revolt, when Subjection was grown a disputed Duty, set up Owen Glendour to be their Prince and Captain, and associating themselves in a firm League under him, resolv'd to recover their Ancient Liberty, and free themselves from the English Yoke. This Owen was of no great Parentage among his People nor Estate; but being a Gentleman of great Courage and Boldness in himself, and because he had been a Servant of King Richard's at Flint-Castle, was very forward to oppose and annoy King Henry's Dominions, partly to vindicate his Old Master, and partly his own private Wrongs. The latter he thought would be the more plausible Pretence for his Rebellion; and therefore having had a Quarrel with Reginald, Lord Gray of Ruthen, about a part of a Common which lay between their Estates, and had been enjoy'd by Owen some time in King Richard's Days, but was lately adjudg'd by Law to belong to the Lord Gray, to the great Discontent of Owen Glendour, who taking occasion from the rebellious Humour of his Country-men, invaded the Lord Gray's Estate, with a Body of Men, burns his Houses and Woods, tramples down his Corn, and barbarously murder'd his Servants and Tenants. The Lord Gray, with such Assistance as he could get among his Neighbours and Friends, stood up in his own Defence, and sought to subdue his Enemies: But being overpower'd by Owen Glendour and his Welsh Men, was taken Prisoner himself, and many of his Assistants kill'd. Owen, glad of this Advantage to raise his Family, treated the Lord very gently and civilly, and promised him Liberty upon Condition, that he would marry his Daughter: But the Lord at first scorn'd the Offer; yet at length considering that he was unable to discharge his Ransom without a greater Damage to his Estate accepted it, and was marry'd to her, which was not so grateful to Owen, as to oblige him to release him, because he look'd upon it as only a crafty Design, and therefore he as deceitfully dealt with him, and kept him Prisoner till his Death. The Success which the Welsh had against the Lord Gray, so encourag'd them, that they made another inroad into Herefordshire, and having spoil'd and harass'd the Country, return'd with much Riches and Prey. Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, who was retreated to his Mannor of Wigmore, in that County, being much griev'd for the Miseries of his Country, assembl'd all the Gentry of those Parts to oppose these Insolencies of their Neighbours, and engaging with them, maintain'd a bloody and long Battel; but by the good Conduct of Owen, who like a brave Commander encourag'd his Men to hold out, with the Glory of Victory, and Promises of Reward, they were overcome, above a Thousand of the English being slain, and the Earl of March himself taken Prisoner: The Welsh grew very Insolent by this Victory, and not only abused the Bodies of the Slain, but having loaden the Earl of March with Chains, put him into a nasty and irksom Dungeon, and ravag'd all the Countries on the West of Severn, burning and destroying the Towns and Villages with extreme Barbarity. King Henry was not insensible of these Mischiefs, but either looking upon them as the Effects of a private Quarrel between the Welsh and their Neighbours, or else being taken up with Matters of greater Moment, would not concern himself in them; and though he was solicited much by the Friends of the Earl of March to revenge his Quarrel, and redeem him from Captivity, yet he would not listen to their Desires, knowing his Title to the Crown, and his Liberty might be a Damage to him, but told them, The Earl had not engag'd in his Quarrel, and therefore he was under no Obligation to redeem him.

The Scots trouble England, and War is proclaim'd between the Two Nations. While these Things were done by the Welsh, the Scots were not idle in molesting England both by Land and Sea, though with no great Advantage to themselves, the English doing as much Damage to the Scots in the Isles of Orkney, as they had done in Northumberland, and taking the greatest part of their Fleet, which they had sent

A. D. 1400. Reg. 2. sent out, under the Command of Sir Robert Logan, to surprize the English Fishermen; yet so long as Damages were equal, the Peace was not actually broken, till King Henry was thought to give an Occasion to Robert, King of Scots, to proclaim open War upon this Account, and for this Reason: George Dunbarr, Earl of the Marches of Scotland, having betroth'd his Daughter to Prince David, the Eldest Son of Robert, King of Scots, had paid that King a great Sum of Money, in Consideration of the Marriage which was shortly to be celebrated; but being defeated in his Agreement by the Subtilty of Archibald, Earl of Douglas, who envying the Dignity of the Earl of March's Family, so prevail'd with the King, that he married his Son to his own Daughter Mariel. This Affront and Disappointment was a very great Vexation to the Earl of March, inso much that he could hardly restrain his Passions from breaking out into open Rebellion; but chusing first to make the Cause known, demanded of King Robert the Restitution of his Money, which he had paid him; but the King not able to spare it, tho' he could not refuse Payment, yet would neither promise it, nor pay it, but put him off with delusory Answers and Delays. The Earl being impatient at the injustice of Robert, sends Messengers to the King of England, to request of him a Permission for himself and Family to come into his Dominions, and Letters of safe Conduct for that End, complaining heavily of the Injury done him by his own King, and intending by the Assistance of the English to revenge his Wrongs and Loss. King Henry thinking that the Earl might be some Advantage to him, if there should happen any Wars between the Two Nations, gave him Liberty to come into his Kingdom; and he immediately fled out of Scotland with his Family to Henry, Earl of Northumberland, by whom he was receiv'd with a grateful Welcome, and by his Assistance and Advice, the Earl made many Incursions into Scotland with Success, burning their Towns, and returning with much Booty.

The King of Scots hearing that the Earl of March was gone, and turn'd his open Enemy, deprived him of his Honour, seiz'd upon all his Goods and Possessions in Scotland, and proclaim'd him an open Traitor, sending Messengers to King Henry, to tell him, That he must either deliver up to him the Earl of March, or banish him his Dominions, or else not expect that the Truce between the Two Nations should last long. King Henry knowing the uncertain Humour of the Scots, and considering their late Incursions, to the Prejudice of his Subjects, was resolv'd not to lose the Benefit of this Discontent between the King of Scots and Earl of March, and therefore return'd an Answer, That he was desirous of the Continuance of the Peace, but not fearful of the War, which he would rather run the Hazard of, than falsifie his Honour and Promise to the Earl of March, and his Company, who had come into his Nation by his Permission and Leave. This Answer being brought to the Scotch King, so incensed him, that he proclaim'd War against the King of England, and accordingly both Kings began their Preparations for it against the next Spring, when the Season would allow it.

The Greek Emperor comes into England.

The Grecian Emperor Immanuel Palaeologus, whose Dominions were in great Danger to be lost by the Incursions of the Turks, under Bazajet the Sixth, came into England to beg King Henry's Assistance against them. The King met him at Black-Heath, and conducted him with much Respect and Honour through the City of

London, and entertain'd him magnificently, bearing his Charges all the Time of his Abode in England, which was but short, because he receiv'd News, that the King of Leto had defeated the Bassa of Jerusalem, and taken that City, and he thought it might be some Advantage to his Affairs at Home: Wherefore, taking his Leave of King Henry, he departed, being dismiss'd by him with rich Gifts, and Promises of a larger Assistance, when he should by God's Providence have Peace settled among his Subjects.

In the Utis or Octaves of S. Hilary, Jan. 21. the Parliament met at Westminster, and made divers Acts for the Benefit both of Church and State. For the Good of the Church, it was made a Præmunire for any Person to purchase any Bull from the Pope, to exempt them from Payment of Tythes, for the Cistercian Monks, and other religious Orders then began to bring in such Exemptions, not only for their own Granges, but also for all their Farms and Lands belonging to their Monastries holden by Laymen, and so much lessen'd the Maintenance of the Secular Clergy, which further to prevent, the Parliament made this Act. But that which was then thought to be the best Act for the Support of the Church, was the Statute against the Lollards, or Hereticks of those Times, because Corruptions in Doctrines are more prejudicial to the Church, than the Loss of its Revenues. The Occasion of this Act, was this: One William Sawter, a Priest, but a Follower of Wickliff's Doctrine, having formerly recanted his Opinions before the Bishop of Norwich, grew more zealous upon his Repentance, and rise from this Fall; and that he might satisfy for his Lapse, by an Act of singular Courage and Charity, came into the Parliament House, and petition'd, That he might be allow'd to speak something for the inestimable Benefit and Advantage of the Nation, purposing to propound a general Reformation both of Doctrine and Discipline in the Church. The Bishops, who some of them knew the Man and his Conversation, and that though he were a Man of singular Piety and Vertue, yet worshipp'd God after the Way which they call'd Heresie, opposed his Request, and desired that he might be turn'd over to the Convocation to be examined; which being granted, he was there accused of holding Heterodox Opinions about the Worship of Saints and Angels, Pilgrimages to Tombs and Shrines, and the real Presence of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament. To which, being obliged to answer particularly, many Days were spent in his Examination, and Conviction. In the mean time the Clergy and their Friends, being excited by his Forwardness, to stand up for their Doctrine and Church, became earnest Suiters to the King, to provide a sufficient Remedy against so growing an Evil, and obtain'd a severe Act against all erroneous Opinions; because, in this unsettled Estate, he was willing to gratifie the Clergy, who had assisted him in his coming to the Throne, and being discontented, might much embroil his Affairs: Therefore he caused it to be enacted, 'That none should preach without License, except Persons priviledged: That none should preach any Doctrine contrary to the Catholick Faith, or the Determination of Holy Church; and, that none should favour or abet such Preachers, or their Doctrines, nor keep their Books, but deliver them to the Diocesan of the Place, within Forty Days after the Proclamation of this Statute: And, if Second Parliament, and its Acts.

The Act de Hæretico comburendo first made.

A. D. 1401. Reg. 2. if any Persons were defamed, or suspected of doing against this Ordinance, then the Ordinary might arrest them, and keep them in Prison till they were Canonically clear'd of the Articles laid to their Charge, or abjured them according to the Laws of the Church, provided that the Proceedings against them were publickly and judicially done, and ended within Three Months after the Arrest; and, if they were convicted, he might fine them, and keep them in Prison, as to him should seem fit: And if any being convicted did refuse to abjure, or after Abjuration did fall into Relapse, then they were to be left to the Secular Court: And the Mayors, Sheriffs, or Bailiffs being present at the Passing the Sentence, were to receive them after Sentence, and they before the People in an High-place to be burnt.

This Act was no sooner past, but the Clergy put it in Execution upon William Sauter, that it might be a Terror to all others; for being convicted of Heresie, and Relapse, the King issued out his Writ, Feb. 26. for his Execution, which was done accordingly, (m) and so the Act was sealed with Blood.

Other Laws also were made of great Use and Advantage to the State, viz. That no Provisions should be brought from Rome by any religious Person, to exempt him from Obedience to the Secular Power; and that all such Persons that shall bring any such Provisions into the Nation, shall incur a Premunure. That no Person shall carry any Gold or Silver in Coin, without the special License of the King, out of the Nation; and if any Person shall presume to do the Contrary, he shall forfeit all the said Coin to the King. That the Chirographer of the Common-Pleas, Clerk of the Crown of the King's-Bench, the Marshal of the Marshalsea of the King's House should take no greater Fees than what are prescribed and limited by the said Statutes.

By these Acts the due Subjection of the Clergy and People was preserved and secured to the King, the Traffick of the Nation promoted, and Courts of Justice made an Ease, and not an intolerable Grievance, as since they have been, to all such as seek their Rights. We do not find that the King had, or desired any Tax in this or the former Parliament, because, as he had no great Need of more than the Revenues of the Crown, so he was willing to get the Love of the People by easing them of Charge, and oppressing Taxes.

A Treaty between the English and French, and Queen Isabel sent into France. As soon as the Parliament was dismissed, the King sent his Ambassadors according to his Promise to Guisnes, to treat with the French about Queen Isabel's Restitution, and other Matters of Importance. The English Ambassadors were Edward, Duke of York; Henry, Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Henry, surnamed, Hotspur; the Lord Fitz-Warren, the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln; and the French were, the Duke of Bourbon, the Lords D'Albert, Hangeft, and Chastellonant, and the Bishops of Paris and Beauvais. The main Things insisted upon by the English were, that Queen Isabel might be given in Marriage to King Henry, (n) since the Marriage between her and King Richard was never consummated by actual Knowledge; and that the Truce which was made by King Richard for Thirty Years, might be continued for the Years that were unexpired. The French Ambassadors would by no Means consent to a Marriage, because it was not in their Instructions to treat about it, and their Master being in a Fit of his old Disease, the Frenzy, was not capable of treating with, about any such Proposition; and so they insisted upon it, That she should be restor'd, with her Dower. The English reply'd, That the Marriage not being compleated, she had no Dower, but she should be sent back with her Treasure and Jewels. Concerning the Truce, they came to a firm Agreement, That so much of the Truce as was unexpired should go on, till the Thirty Years were out: And so the Treaty ended, and Queen Isabel was soon after sent, under the Care of the Earl of Worcester, and several other Noblemen and Women, into France, and between Bulloigne and Calis was deliver'd to the Lord Valeran, Earl of St. Paul, Lieutenant in Picardy, who, with many French Lords and Ladies, convey'd her to Paris to her Father and Mother, by whom she was not long after given in Marriage to Charles, the eldest Son of Lewis, Duke of Orleans. The Earl of Northumberland protested her free from all Marriage-Bonds, and received a Testimonial of her safe Delivery to them, from the Earl of St. Paul.

King Henry, having gather'd a large Army to go against Scotland, thought it was the wisest Way not to wait for the Coming of the Scots, but to invade his Enemies Country, because by that means the Miseries of the War would fall wholly upon the Scots, and both Sides prey upon Scotland: Wherefore sending some of his Light Troops before, to bring a Terrour upon them, that they might not invade England before he could arrive with the whole Army, he entred Scotland at last with all his Forces, and burnt many of their Towns and Villages, took their Castles, and ruin'd the greatest part of Edinburgh and Leith, sparing nothing but Monastries and Churches. The Scots, terrified with the Greatness of his Army, which they represented much greater than it really was, fled before him, and made no Resistance; so that where-ever he came, the whole Country was left in his Power, and to the Will of his Soldiers.

In the End of September, the King besieged the Castle of Maidens in Edinburgh, which was maintain'd against him by David, Duke of Rothsay, Prince of the Realm, and Archibald, Earl of Douglas, who were the Causes of the War. While this Castle was besieged, Robert, Duke of Albany, was appointed Governour of the Realm, because the King of the Scots was very sick, and unable to govern. This Duke, being under an Obligation, as Vice-Roy, to rescue the Castle from being taken, sent to King Henry, desiring him to forbear an Assault upon it for Six Days only, and he would give him Battle, and either raise the Siege, or lose his Life. King Henry, being a very magnanimous and courageous Prince, who valued an Heroick Action above the Taking of an inconsiderable Fort, liberally rewarded the Herald that came with the Petition and Promise, giving him a Silk-Gown and a Gold-Chain; and assuring him on his Word, that he would tarry the Time desired: But it was evident, that the Duke of Albany was not so sincere in his De-

Reg. 3. fire, as Henry was in his Promise, because he never durst appear against King Henry, and, 'tis probable, had no other Design, but, by his Delays, to keep the King from Action, till Winter and Want should force him home, which the Time of the Year easily foretold were at Hand, as, indeed, it happen'd accordingly; for the King, out of Generosity, waiting longer than his Appointment, was forced to withdraw Home without any further Action, because of the Weather and the Want of Provision. The Scots, while King Henry remain'd in Scotland, having the Lords Wardens of the Marches with him, had made some Inroads into England, and did much Harm in Cumberland about Bamborough-Castle, but retreated when the People assembled against 'em: And when King Henry was gone, they again vex'd the Borders, under the Command of Sir Thomas Halibarton of Dirlston, and Sir Patrick Hepburn of Hales; and though they did little Harm, yet they shew'd, that though they had no Courage to fight their Enemies, they had Malice to revenge themselves upon them. And thus concluded the first Summer's War between the English and Scots.

K. Henry goes against the Welsh. While the King was thus busied in Scotland, Owen Glendour, and his Welsh, were (o) very active in annoying the Counties adjoining, doing all manner of Mischief, which either Malice or Cruelty could invent, burning, plundering and destroying as they pleased. The King being return'd, tho' he was not much concern'd to revenge the Earl of Marche's Quarrel, whose Captivity he did not much pity, because he would have been well pleased if a more severe Fate had befallen him; yet hearing of the Miseries of his Subjects in those Parts, he march'd, with his Army, against the Welsh, to punish them for their Cruelty. Omen, as unequal in Strength to the King as in Courage, withdrew himself and his Party, and fled into the Defarts and inaccessible Places about Snowdon Hills (p); so that the King could do no more, than plunder and waste the Country, which he did very severely, to show his Anger against those Rebels, and carried away a great Booty of Cattle with him.

Some Accidents of this Year. Several remarkable Things are said to have happen'd this Year. King Henry's Enemies, discouraged by the ill Success of their Plot the last Year, dared not to appear in any open and form'd Action, but they are supposed to have convey'd a Galthrap (q) into his Bed, which being so fram'd, That Three Iron Spikes, very sharp, stood upward, it was almost impossible for him to have escap'd Death, if he had chanced to have lain down upon it; but discovering it before he went into his Bed, he saved his Life. The Contrivers and Layers of it could never be found out. The usual Plenty of this Nation was so much abated, that Wheat is said to have been sold at Sixteen Shillings a Quarter, which not long before was at Four Shillings; and it had been much dearer, but that the Merchants brought much Rye and Rye-Flour out of Sprucia, (r) which serving for common Use, kept down the Price of Wheat. But tho' there was such a Judgment upon the Nation as Famine, yet the Natives were not humbled by it, but great Pride and Vanity in Cloathing were used, Masters and Servants wearing Gowns with Poke-sleeves down to the Ground, which were both vain and superfluous. The Conduit in Cornhill was built in a Place, where before had stood a Prison for Night-Walkers, call'd, The Tun, the Materials of which serv'd to raise the new Conduit.

The King having been at very great Charges by his Expeditions into Wales and Scotland, had a Subsidy granted him by the Laity, by way of voluntary Contribution, or Gift, without calling his Parliament; so ready are Subjects to assist the King with Monies, when they see them careful for the publick Welfare of the Nation.

About the Beginning of March appear'd a very terrible Blazing-star, sending forth its Fire Streams at first toward the North-East, and at length toward the North, where it seem'd to fix, which was after thought to portend the bloody Wars between the Scots and English, and the several Executions done this Year upon the Malecontents under the Government. These latter not only raised divers Reports, that King Richard was alive, and would shortly come to recover his Right with a puissant Army, but industriously dispersed them as Things certain thro' the whole Nation by their Books and Libels, in which they encouraged all Persons, by Hopes of great Rewards, to assist King Richard, and aspersed King Henry as an Usurper, and cruel Tyrant. The King had Knowledge of all these Things, and to deter these Disturbers of the Government from their Designs, he declar'd, That he would spare none that he could find instrumental in promoting these Reports, and would be at any Pains or Charge to discover them: But it seems this did not so affright them from their Attempts, but that several Persons were apprehended, and upon their Conviction executed. Sir Roger Claringdon, who was said to be the Bastard son of Edward the Black Prince, and Eight Fryars, were hanged and beheaded for reporting, That King Richard was alive. A Priest also was taken, who had a Catalogue of divers Gentlemen and others, who had avouch'd, that King Richard was alive, and had promised him their Assistance when he should arrive in England. Several of the Persons in the List were also taken and imprison'd: However, nothing being prov'd against them, and the Priest himself confessing, that he had never heard any such Thing from them, but had set down their Names either by the Report of others, or mere Conjecture, they were at length dismiss'd, after much Charge and Trouble, and only the Priest hang'd and quarter'd. Walter Baldocke, Prior of Laund, a small Monastery in Leicestershire, was also apprehended, and accused of being an Instrument in the above-mention'd Reports, but nothing could be prov'd against him; yet because in his Examination he confess'd, that he knew some that had been industrious in spreading such Treasonable Reports, and otherwise acting against the Peace and Government, he was condemn'd for Misprision of Treason, and hang'd. Richard Frisby also, a Doctor of Divi-

(s) These, with many others, suffer'd for these Reports and Libels, the King sparing none according to his Resolution; in which, tho' he may seem to have kept a good Conscience, and rid himself of his Enemies, yet he was esteem'd cruel, and over-severe for such an Act.

Owen Glendour and his Welsh having with Success made several Inroads upon the English Borders, to their great Enriching, began this Summer with fresh Assaults upon the Inhabitants, burning, plundering, and destroying all Places where-ever they came. The King desirous to relieve his oppressed and injured Subjects, assembled a great Army of his Nobles, Gentry, and Commons to reduce Wales to its due Obedience, who being all troubled at the sufferings of their Fellow-Subjects, went with full Resolutions of subduing it before they return'd: Nor did Owen Glendour himself seem to retain so much as Hopes of withstanding an Army of Men so well prepared for an Encounter, the Welsh being all struck with a panick Fear of their Destruction. The King with these full Hopes, arrived in Wales, but before he could enter upon any Action of moment, there happen'd such foul and tempestuous Weather, that the Army suffer'd much Damage, and the King was at length forced to return without doing any thing worthy his Reputation. These Storms falling out at a Season of the Year, when they were most unusual, were said to be raised by the Magical Skill of Owen Glendour, who was thought to be a Wizzard.

The Scots hearing of King Henry's Expedition into Wales with so numerous an Army, and accompany'd with many Nobles, supposed that the Northern Lords, who were their implacable Enemies, and the Guardians of their Country against them, were also gone along with the King, and therefore they could not have a fitter Opportunity to invade the English Borders. Sir Patrick Hebborn, (t) who had the Year before made some Incursions into England with Success, was chosen their Captain, and with a competent Army of the Men of Loughdean, or Lawden, enter'd Northumberland as far as New-Castle, taking many Prisoners, and loading themselves with Spoil and Prey, as if being out of Fear of Opposition, they came not to fight, but enrich themselves. But the Earl of Northumberland, and his Son, who were left behind upon Suspicion of the Scots Attempts, had News of these their Actions, and with a sufficient Strength, falls upon them at a Town called Nesby: The Scots receiv'd them courageously, and maintain'd the Battle stoutly a good while, but being in Confusion when they first joyn'd the Battle, they were not able to hold out against as strong, and a better order'd Army, so that they were forced to yield the Victory to the English. Sir Patrick perceiv'd the Advantage which the English had against them, and thought to patch up the Defects in their Order, by animating his Men to fight, and giving them an Example of Bravery, in encountering the Enemy at the Head of them, but all was to no Purpose. He was slain himself, and his Army absolutely vanquish'd, many of the Flower of Loughdean being slain, and some of the principal Commanders, as Sir John and William Cockburn, Sir William Basse, John and Thomas Habington, Esquires, and many of the common Soldiers being taken. Of the English few were kill'd, and those not of any Quality. This Fight happen'd upon June 22. The News of this ill Success was heavily taken in Scotland, and by none more than Archibald, Earl Douglas, who resolving to revenge this Loss upon the English, obtain'd a Commission at his own Charge to invade England; and having gather'd an Army of 20000 Men, enter'd the Kingdom like an enraged Enemy, destroying all before him. The Earl of Northumberland, and his Son Hotspur as zealous to keep the Victory they had gotten, as Earl Douglas was to recover it, being certified of the Scots Return, augmented their Forces proportionable to their Adversaries, and upon Holy-rood-day, tho' it was then Harvest, met the Scots at Hamildon, or Halidown, and with equal Courage and Fury engaged them. The Battle was very fierce and lasting, but the Scots not able to endure the violent Shot of the English Archers, were forced to give Ground, and betake themselves to flight with an incredible Loss; for there were slain not only some Men of Esteem, viz. Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gurdon, Sir John Levison, Sir Alexander Ramsay, and 23 Knights more, but also 10000 of the Commons; and many Prisoners were taken; of which the Chief were Mordack, Earl of Fife, (u) Earl Douglas's Son, who himself lost one of his Eyes in the Battle, the Earls of Angus, Murrey, Athol, and Monteith, with 500 Men of an inferior Degree.

The Earl of Northumberland being thus victorious, resolved to pursue the Advantage he had gotten over so restless and troublesome an Enemy; and therefore having disposed of his Prisoners into safe Custody, he invaded Scotland, and entering Tividale, he burnt and destroy'd the whole Country. Then he laid Siege to the Castle of Cocklaws, of which Sir John Greenlow was Captain; he, tho' he were a valiant Man, finding himself unable to withstand so great an Army, promised to resign the Castle to the Earl of Northumberland, if it were not reliev'd within Three Months; but before that was expired, the King call'd the Earl off to assist in another Enterprize, and so the Castle was saved, and they had Liberty to redeem their Prisoners.

Particular Accidents this Year were these: Particular Accidents. Tho. Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, died Apr. 8. The Lady Blaunch, the King's eldest Daughter, was marry'd to William, Duke of Bavaria, the eldest Son of Lewis Barbatus, the Emperor, at Cologne, in great Magnificence, being conducted by the Earl of Somerset, the Bishop of Worcester, Lord Clifford, and several others of the Nobility. The Devil is said also to have appear'd, in the Shape and Habit of a Gray Fryer, in Danbury Church, in Essex, where he behaved himself so outrageously, that he much affrighted the Inhabitants. At the same time arose so great a Tempest thereabout, that it blew down the Steeple, and carry'd away Half the Chancel. One Sir Lewis Clifford also, who had for a long time lean'd to the Doctrine of the Lollards, wholly deserted them, and dis-

Reg. 4. On the Morrow after the Feast of St. Michael a Parliament met at Westminster, and sat Seven Weeks, to dispatch several Matters for the Good and Advantage of the Realm. In this Parliament the King declaring, 'That he had in Remembrance the faithful Hearts and inward Affections that the Clergy of England had born to him, and also the great Charges they had sustain'd for his Honour and Profit, since the Time of his Coronation, and therefore was desirous to be unto them a gracious Lord; caused several Privileges of the Church and Clergy to be established and enacted: For, First, He confirm'd the several Statutes made by his Grand-father King Edward the Third, in his 25th Year, called, Statutes for the Clergy; as also, the Statute of 15 Rich. 2. 6. whereby it was provided, That in appropriating of Benefices to any Religious House, there should be a perpetual Vicar appointed, who should be allow'd conveniently, at the Discretion of the Ordinary, a sufficient Stipend, for saying Divine Service, and to inform the People, and keep Hospitality, and that no Religious or Monk shall be Vicar. It was also enacted, That the begging Fryers should admit none into their Order, without their Parents Consent, or under Fourteen Years of Age. Several other Acts relating to the Affairs of State were pass'd, but that which the Parliament was chiefly busied in, was to settle the Disorders in Wales; for which End they made Nine several Acts, prohibiting the Welsh to pass any Judicial Sentence upon an English Man, to have any publick Assemblies, to wear Arms, or buy any out of England, to raise any Forts or Castles, to bear any Office in Church or State, and commanding them to put all their Wall'd Towns into the Custody of English Men. All which Acts tended to subduing and humbling the Welsh, who at that Time were very troublesome to the King and Realm. In the End of this Session, the Parliament gave the King a Tenth and Half of the Clergy, and Fifteenth of the Laity, and a Tenth of all Boroughs, and particularly recommended the Scotch Earl of March to the King's Favour, because he had behaved himself with so much Fidelity to the Nation: And so were dismiss'd into their several Countries.

A. D. 1403. About Christmas, King Henry, who had the Year before made some Propositions of Marriage to Joan de Navarre, the Widow of John de Mountfort, late Duke of Brittain, and was come to an Agreement about it, sent several Persons of Honour into Brittain, to conduct her over into England, who accordingly, after Two Months Stay, brought her safely to Falmouth in Cornwall, Feb. 7. The King hearing of her Landing, went to meet her at Winchester, whither he had order'd her before to be convey'd, and there was marry'd to her in St. Swinthin's Church, on the 7th of February, by the Bishop of that See. From thence, within a few Days, he pass'd with her to London, where they were receiv'd magnificently by the Citizens; and on Feb. 26. the Queen was solemnly crown'd at Westminster by the Arch-bishop of Canterbury. She had Three Sons, but they were left in France under the Care and Guardianship of that King. Her Coronation was kept with great State and Splendor, and there appear'd an Universal Joy both at Court, and in the Kingdom for these Nuptials: But it was not in this King's Fate to enjoy Peace or Pleasure long, fresh Troubles, both at Home and Abroad springing up to disturb his Ease and Quiet.

The First Enemy that annoy'd his Dominions after them, were the French, under Valeran, Earl of St. Paul, who envying Henry's Power, because it was raised upon the Ruins of his own Interests, gather'd an Army of 16 or 1700 Men, invaded the Isle of Wight, and burnt Two small Villages, and a few separate Cottages. The Inhabitants of the Isle, who had formerly had the like Injuries done them by the French, and found that they loved Prey more than Fighting, and seldom would stand out against a faint Resistance, assembled in a considerable Body, and drew up against them to fight them. The French, tho' enough in Number to have conquer'd the Island, yet seeing the Courage of the People, withdrew to their Ships, and with little Prey, and less Honour, return'd Home. The Earl, that he might make this Expedition seem the more considerable, Knighted Four of his Captains, as he pretended, for their Bravery and Valour: But the more knowing Men of his Company repined at their speedy Return, being sensible, that the Charge of this Expedition was much greater than the Gain. At the same time that the Earl of St. Paul infested the English Coasts, John, Earl of Clermont, Son to the Duke of Bourbon, was sent with an Army against the Subjects of the King of England in Gascoigne, and won the Castles of S. Peter, S. Mary, and New-Castle from the English, and the Lord De la Bret at the same time got the Castle of Carlasfin; all which were a great Loss to the English. These Damages King Henry's Courage would not have patiently sustain'd without a sharp Revenge, had he enjoy'd a peaceable Kingdom at Home; but before he could make any Preparations for a Foreign Expedition, the Rebellion of his own Subjects broke out, and drew all his Designs and Endeavours to secure himself at Home. The Occasion of it was this:

King Henry not contented with the Peace, which the late Victories gotten by the Earl of Northumberland over the Scots had brought his Dominions, was very eager, and desirous to share in the Gains and Advantage of them; and to that End, required of the Earl his most gainful Prisoners, all the Lords, whose Redemption would raise great Sums. The Earl alledg'd, 'That as it was most just, that they who had undergone the Danger of the Battle, should have all the Advantages of Prey and Prisoners; so it had been the Custom of the Kings of England to allow the Lords of the North all the Advantage of the Scots Wars, to encourage them in defending his Dominions, and make up the Damages of the continual Depredations of that faithless People. The King was very angry at this Denial, tho' dutiful and submissive, and not only took the Prisoners he had demanded, but continued his Displeasure to the Earl, not suffering him to come into his Presence. This Severity the Earl, who had been so instrumental in raising King Henry to the Throne, resented not only as a great Piece of Injustice, but which was worse, very great Ingratitude; and therefore resolved to revenge his Wrong upon the King himself, whom as he had set up, so he thought he had Power enough to pull him down. He was, indeed, in very great Power in the North, and commanded in his Country as a Petty King. He had a near Relation to Edmund

Mor-

A. D. 1403. Mortimer, Earl of March, by the Marriage of Eleanor his Aunt, Mortimer being Heir of the Crown had no small Interest in the Nation, and therefore he might well pretend some Obligation to restore him to his Right, or at least to his Liberty. These Two Interests he thought sufficient to effect his Design, especially since the Earl of March was upon fair Terms with Owen Glendour, and it would be no hard Matter to unite the Welsh with himself in dethroning King Henry. The Earl having laid a sure Train for Rebellion, that he might render his future Actions more plausible, and make his Party more firm to him, he by the Advice of his Cousin Tho. Peirce, Earl of Worcester, goes to the King, and demands the Redemption of the Earl of March his Kinsman, who had long lain in his foul and miserable Imprisonment, among the King's Enemies. But the King answer'd, 'That he had no Reason to redeem, or relieve the Earl of March, nor would, because he was not taken for his Cause, nor in his Service, but had suffer'd himself to fall in to the Hands of Owen Glendour and the Welsh, being not willing to resist them. The Earl having receiv'd this Answer, pretended to be angry, and blaz'd abroad the Cruelty of the King, who would not redeem a Person so nearly related to him, and his Son Henry, surnam'd Hotspur, said openly, 'Behold, the Heir of the Realm is robb'd of his Right, and the Robber will not redeem him with a Part of his own. Hereupon the Earl and his Son, meeting in the Arch-Deacon of Bangor's House, (x) with the Earl of March and Owen Glendour, by an Indenture Tripartite oblig'd themselves mutually and firmly to depose King Henry, and, after his Deposition, it was further agreed to, and among them, 'That Owen Glendour should have Wales, and all the Lands beyond the Severn, to rule over them as their King and Supreme Lord: 'That the Earl of Northumberland should govern all the Countries on the North Side of the River Trent, and the Earl of March should enjoy all the Residue of England in his Right, as Supreme Lord. This Agreement being made, they all employ'd the utmost Interests they had to raise an Army sufficient for their Design. The Earl of Northumberland, besides the Forces he raised among his Northern Neighbours, procur'd an Augmentation of his Forces out of Scotland, partly by releasing the Captives, which he had in his Keeping, and partly by Promises of several Lordships and Seignories in these Parts adjoining to their Country, by which Means they raised a large and well appointed Army. All Things being thus prepar'd, they put out their Declaration, 'That King Henry giving Encouragement to Flatterers and Calumniators, their Enemies, had entertain'd such an Aversion to them, that they dare not come into his Presence, but by the Mediation of the Bishops: 'That though he was raised to the Throne, for the Good of the Nation, yet he had play'd the Tyrant, and abus'd his Trust, converting the Money given by Parliament, for the publick Defence, to his own private Interests: Wherefore, that they might secure their own Persons, and reform the Government, they had raised such Force, as might be sufficient to reduce Things into a better Course, both for themselves and the whole Nation. They also gave out a Report, to further their Design, That King Richard was yet alive in the Castle of Chester, ready to join with Owen Glendour to recover his Right; and so march'd to Shrewsbury, intending to make that City the Rendezvous of their Army. The King had no Suspicion of these Treasonable Contrivances and Actions, because they carried them on with very great Secrecie; yet, having no visible Enemy but the Welsh, he raised a powerful Army to reduce them to their Allegiance; so that when the Earl of Northumberland's Forces appear'd, he was in a very good Condition to oppose them. But considering, that a Civil War would bring great Damages to his Subjects, he chose to allay the Discontents of the Seditious Party by answering their Declaration, alledging, That he never had denied the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Peirce his Son, or any of the Lords of their Party, any Access to him; but allow'd them to come into his Presence at any Time, without all Danger or Damage to their Persons; and that the Monies which had been given by the Parliament for the Defence of the Nation, were paid to the Earl of Northumberland himself for that End, as he could prove by his Receipts; so that their Complaints were ill grounded and slanderous. The King himself was inclined to wait for the Effect of this Answer; but the Earl of March, a Scot, telling the King, That Delays would strengthen his Enemies, put him upon hastening to them, to give them Battle, which proved of some Advantage to the King: For the Earl of Northumberland, being somewhat indisposed, was not come up to his Son at Shrewsbury, and the King's sudden Arrival put the Army there into a Consternation, so that they were unfit to engage him. The King being ready to join his Enemies in Fight, was very loth to spill his People's Blood, and therefore sent the Abbot of Shrewsbury, and one of the Clerks of his Privy-Seal, to offer them Pardon upon such reasonable Terms as they should desire. The Lord Peirce was so far wrought upon by their Persuasions, that he was willing to accept of the King's Mercy, and sent his Uncle, the Earl of Worcester, to represent their Grievances, and having procur'd a Reformation to submit to the King. The King is said to have condescended beneath himself to heal the Breach; but the Earl of Worcester, a Man that sought to foment the Quarrel, represented Things so ill to the Lord Peirce, at his Return, that his Nephew was more incensed than before, and forthwith blew the Trumpet for Battle. The King was ready to receive him, and the Signs being given on both sides, St. George by the King, and Esperance Peirce by the Lord Peirce, the Fight began. The Scots behav'd themselves with great Resolution, and so fiercely fell upon the King's Van-Guard, that they forced them to give Ground, and had almost broke in upon his Main Body, and being seconded by the Welsh, who reserv'd themselves for an advantageous Onset, put the King upon his last Refuge, to call in his Reserve to reinforce his Army, by which means he recover'd his Ground, and, after a fresh Rencontre, got the better of the K. Henry's Mercy to the Rebels.

His Fight with, and Victory over them.

(x) How could the Earl and his Son meet Glendour and March in Wales, the Welsh being at open War with the English? Holinshed saith, They did it by their Deputies in the House of the Arch-Deacon of Bangor. And 'tis not likely, the Peircies would venture to treat in Person with the Rebel Glendour, before they were provided to publish their Rebellion to the King and Kingdom; for such an Interview would have given too much Umbrage to both, and ruin'd their Plot.

A. D. 1403. Reg. 4. Rebels. The Lord Peircy, and Earl Donaglass General of the Scots, despairing of Victory, boldly attempted to slay the King, and overthrow his Standard, and to that end forcing their Way thro' the King's Party, they at length got to the King's Standard, which they overthrew, killing Sir Walter Blunt, the Standard-Bearer, and the Earl of Stafford, with many others that stood to guard it. The King was retreated from the Standard, by the Advice of the Earl of March, the Scot, who observing their Design, timely warn'd the King of his Danger, and caused him to avoid it. But the King neglected not this Opportunity to assault his Enemies in the Absence of their Captains, and crying, St. George, made such an impetuous Onset upon the Rebels, that he broke their Order, and put them to Flight, and obtain'd a compleat Victory. In this Battle, which lasted Three Hours, the King himself was once dismounted, and the Prince, fighting in Defence of his Father, was wounded in the Face, yet would not leave the Army till the Fight was ended, lest he should discourage the Soldiers. Ten Knights and 1600 Soldiers were kill'd, and 4000 wounded, on the King's Side; but with much greater Loss to the Rebels, for they had 200 Knights and 5000 Soldiers slain, besides the Lord Peircy himself. The Earl of Worcester, the Baron of Kinderton, and Sir Richard Vernon were taken, and, being condemn'd, were beheaded Two Days after the Battle, on the 23d of July. The Earl's Head was sent up to London, to be set on the Bridge. The Lord Peircy's Body was permitted to be buried, but upon after Thoughts the King command'd it to be taken up again, and being beheaded and quarter'd, dispos'd of it into several Parts of the Kingdom. The Earl of Northumberland, who had been kept from uniting with his Brother and Son by some Indisposition of Body, soon after the Fight, set out towards Shrewsbury, with a considerable Recruit, to assist his Son and Brother, but being met with in his Passage by the Earl of Westmorland and Sir Robert Waterton, with a strong Detachment from the King's Army, he retreated to Warkworth Castle, and there fortified himself. The King having settled the Countries about Shrewsbury, went to York, and there sent his Commands to the Earl of Northumberland to dismiss his Forces, and come to him upon Assurances of Mercy. The Earl, seeing no Possibility of standing out against the King's Power, obey'd his Summons, and dismissing his Forces, attended upon the King at York upon the Morrow after St. Lawrence's Day, Aug. 11. The King, according to his Promise, pardon'd him his Life, but kept (y) him in Prison sometime, till the Ferment of his Trouble was a little over, and then restor'd him to his Liberty, but deprived him of his Estate and Honour for the present, yet afterwards gave him that also, hoping by his Kindness to oblige him to be more faithful and firm to him for the future.

K Henry sends the Prince against the Welsh.

The King having thus settled the Disgusts of the North, kept his Army about him, which being encouraged by their late Success, was most likely to effect his Designs against the Welsh, and took up some Resolutions to go on, and Endeavours to subdue that People: But wanting Money to pay his Soldiers, and furnish himself out for his Expedition, he became wavering in that Resolve. Some Persons about him, who were more zealous for the King's Service, and desirous to please him, than to chuse out fit Ways for it, advis'd him to seize upon the Bishops Treasure and Lands; but Archbishop Arundell boldly told them, That none of his Province should be spoil'd by them, unless with Opposition. Though the King was not forward to meddle with the Church-men, yet this Advice put him in mind of the Riches and Plenty of the Clergy, which being bestow'd on Persons, whose best Character it is to be Dispersers of the World, might best be spared at this Juncture, and thereupon, though he would use no Force, yet he dealt with the Archbishop to procure him a Supply in this Exigency, and so prevail'd with him, that calling a Synod of the Clergy, he obtain'd a Tenth of them for him, and the King sent the Prince, with his Army, into Wales.

In the latter end of this Summer, the Brit-tains, under the Conduct of the Lord Cassilis, came to the English Coasts, and having burnt and plunder'd Plymouth, return'd Home safe, laden with rich Spoils. This Insolence was not long unrevenged, for the Western Parts being incensed by the Loss, did, by the King's Leave and Permission, man out a Fleet, to recover their Damage, and sent it to ravage the Coasts of Brittain, under the Command of William Wilford, Esq; who being both a skilful Captain, and a Person very zealous for his Country-mens Injuries, faithfully discharged his Trust; for he took Forty Sail of Merchant-Ships, laden with Oil and Soap, and a Thousand Tun of Rochel Wine; and, not contented with this Prey, though sufficient to compensate for the Spoils of the English, he landed in the Country of Pennarch, and, for Six Miles together, burnt and destroy'd the Towns and Villages, as far as the Town of St. Mathew, which also he left in Flames, and returning to his Ships, set several empty Vessels on Fire, which lay in the Harbour, and so departed, well satisfied with the Retaliation of their Wrongs upon the Britains.

About the Feast of All-Saints a Parliament was called at Coventry, and sat till St. Andrew's Day, when they were prorogued, and order'd to meet again at Westminster upon the Octaves of Epiphany. The Shortness of this Session was caused by the Inconvenience of the Place, there being neither suitable Accommodations for Provision or Lodging. Nothing was done by this Parliament of Moment, their Debates being interrupted by their sudden Adjournment, only the King proclaim'd and granted a Pardon to all such Persons, as had been engaged in the Rebellion of the Peircys, and all other Offenders against the King's Crown and Dignity, those only excepted, who had contrived to deliver up Callis to the French, whom the King sent over to suffer the Punishment of their Perfidiousness in that City.

A little before Christmas a Party of French landed in the Isle of Wight, and with their usual Confidence told the Inhabitants, That they were come to keep their Christmas with them. They demand'd a Tax of them for King Richard and Queen Isabel, and began to drive off their Cattle to their Ships. The People of the Island deriding their Pretensions and Confidence, gather'd together in a Body, and challenged them to fight, but the French Men not loving dry Blows, fled to their Ships, and departed without their Prey, to their great Shame.

(y) Hall writes, that he suffer'd him to depart Home at their first meeting.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 5. The Parliament according to Appointment met at Westminster, and sat Twelve Weeks to settle many Abuses and Irregularities of the Nation, as well as constitute several Things for the Good of it. The most remarkable were, against such as procured Pardons for those Persons that had been once guilty of notorious Felonies, but relapsed into the like Crimes again; That those who procured their Pardon for such reiterated Felonies should forfeit 100 l. to the King's Use: That Watches should be constantly kept upon the Sea-Coast, to prevent the Damages done by the French Rovers: That Merchants-Aliens, who brought Goods into the Nation, and sold them, should lay out the Money upon other saleable Commodities, and not carry out the Coin of the Kingdom into Foreign Parts: That Constables of Castles should not imprison any Man in their own Castles; and that all Vessels that were Gilt, or Silver'd over, should have a Place in the Foot, or elsewhere, to discover their base Metal. In this Parliament, the Earl of Northumberland was restored to his Lands and Honours, excepting only the Isle of Man, which the King had bestow'd on him (2) at the Beginning of his Reign, to hold of the Crown by the Tenure of carrying the Lancaster's Sword at the Coronation, and now took away from him, to shew that he was undeserving of his Favour. By this Parliament, the King had so great a Tax granted him, that the Houses desired there might be no particular Record of it left to Posterity, viz. Twenty Shillings for every Knight's Fee, and Twenty Pence for every Twenty Pounds a Year, and One Shilling in the Pound for Goods: So cautious was the Parliament of oppressing the People with heavy Taxes, and where Necessity requir'd it, not to leave a Precedent to their Successors of over-loading the People. The Clergy also, being met in their Convocation, give the King a Tenth.

Duke of Orleans challenges K. Henry. In the Time of this Session of Parliament, the Duke of Orleans, Brother to the French King, a Person courageous, but of more than equal Pride, sent a Challenge to King Henry to meet him at Bordeaux, with 100 Men, well arm'd, and expert Warriours, and fight the same Number of English, and every Victor to have his Prisoner. The King, tho' sensible of the Presumption of that Peer, gravely answer'd the Messengers: 1. 'That he could not but wonder at the Imprudence of the Duke, who sought to break the Peace between the Two Nations, by such idle Pretences of Feats of Arms. 2. That if this could not be objected, yet it was against the Custom of Nations, for any Crown'd and Anointed King to accept a Challenge from any Person, but such as is of equal Dignity, which he could not pretend to be; but yet, that he might satisfy his courageous Desire, he promised, upon the Word of a Prince, to go soon into Gascoigne, with a convenient Number of Men; and there, either as he had propounded, or by single Combate, for the avoiding of the Effusion of Christian Blood, to enter the Lists with him. The Duke of Orleans reply'd to this Answer, and the King retorted with so much Sharpness, that the Duke burst out into Arms, and raising 6000 Men, invaded Guienne, and besieged the Town of Vergi. Sir Robert Arisfield, a valiant Captain, was the Governour of it, and had a Garrison of 3000 English, who defended the Town so bravely, that the Duke was forced to leave it, after Three Months Siege.

In the Spring, the Britains, under the Lord Cassils, being desirous to revenge the Losses they had sustain'd from the English the last Year, came with 30 Ships, mann'd with 1200 Men of Arms, to the English Coasts, and took Two or Three English Ships, laden with Wines, and not being satisfied with so small a Prey, landed about Dartmouth; but were driven from the Place by the Inhabitants, who had arm'd themselves in Expectation of their Coming, with no small Loss; and after being met by the English Fleet in Black-Pool, were engaged with so much Success, that the Lord Cassils was kill'd, with 400 more of the Common Soldiers, and 200 taken, of whom the Lord Baqueruil, the Marshal of Britain, was one. The Country People, pleased not more with the Success, than that they had an Opportunity to approve their Courage, and Fidelity to the King, presented him with their Prisoners, who graciously accepted their Service and Gift, and gave them Plenty of Gold for their Pains; which, though not of equal Value with their Ransoms, yet was more acceptable to the People, with his Approbation, than greater Sums would have been without it: Yet, some of lower Degree they kept, and had their Ransoms.

This Summer Owen Glendour, with more than usual Cruelty, infested the English Borders, plundering and burning their Towns, and carrying away many Prisoners and great Booty; and intending to take the Country into his Dominions, possess'd himself of divers Castles, which he fortified, and mann'd to defend it. This Success, whether through the Neglect of the King, or because other more important Affairs of State took up his Care, was thought an Approbation of his Cause; and so far prevail'd with John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, that he fled to him, and took his Part against K. Henry. With these Calamities by the Welsh, concurr'd other Damages done by the Britains and Flemings, who cruizing upon the English Coasts, took several English Ships, laden with rich Merchandize, and hanging the Mariners, carry'd the Goods Home with them. But these Misfortunes did not so much disturb the King, as a Rumour which was dispersed up and down the Nation at this Time, That King Richard was in Scotland, at the Head of an Army of French and Scots of 100000, and would shortly come to recover his Crown. This Rumour was built upon the Letters of one Serlow, a Gentleman of King Richard's Bed-Chamber, who having heard of the like Report in France, went into Scotland, and found, indeed, a Gentleman very like King Richard, but not the Person, as he very well knew; yet, in Hatred to King Henry, he sent Letters to several of King Richard's Friends in England, seal'd with his Privy-Seal, That King Richard was, indeed, alive, and would shortly appear, to the Comfort of his Friends, and Confusion of all his Enemies. The Countess of Oxford, Mother to Robert de Vere, late Duke of Ireland, eagerly laid hold upon this false News, and employ'd her Agents to publish it in all Parts of Essex; and to confirm such as seem'd most zealous to espouse King Richard's Interest, she caused a great Number of Hearts of Gold and Silver to be made, and given to them, as Badges of King Richard's Favour,

A seditious Rumour about King Richard.

(2) It fell to the Crown by the Attainder of the Earl of Salisbury, in the Beginning of his Reign, and was granted to the Earl of Northumberland for his Service to King Henry.

A. D. 1404. Reg. 5. because that King was wont to give such Tokens of his Kindness to his Friends. King Henry, who was very jealous of his Crown, knowing the Tendency of such Reports might prove fatal to him, tho' false, was very watchful upon the Instruments and Authors of them, and finding them entertain'd by many, seiz'd upon the Countess of Oxford, and committed her to Prison, and confiscated her Goods and Estate. Her Secretary, who both by Letters and Report had spread abroad the false News, he hang'd and quarter'd. This Severity against some of the principal Actors struck Terror into the rest, and made others Ambitious to gain King Henry's Favour by apprehending such as had been guilty of the like Crime. For Sir William Clifford, Governour of Berwick, who had incurred King Henry's Displeasure in holding out of the Castle of Berwick against him, apprehended Serlow and presented him to him, who thereupon pardoned his own Treason. Serlow being before known to have been one of the Persons that murder'd the Duke of Gloucester, was immediately examined about that, and being found guilty of both, was Condemn'd at Pontefract, and Executed at London, confessing his wicked Actions, and Purposes so fully and freely, that many pity'd him, and promised to hire the Priests to say Masses for his Soul. The King had heard, that the Earl of Northumberland had been engaged in this Conspiracy, and sent for him to come to him at Pontefract to clear himself; but the Earl bringing his Two Nephews to be Pledges of his Fidelity, gave him such Satisfaction, that the King declar'd him innocent of this Attempt.

Reg. 6. On St. Faith's Day, October the 6th, a Parliament met at Coventry, which because it consisted of such Persons as were unskilful in the Laws of the Nation, and illiterate, according to the particular Orders given by the King to the Sheriffs of Counties, and Mayors of Corporations, that none but such Persons should be chosen, was called Parliamentum indoctum, or the Lack-learning Parliament. The chief Business of this Parliament was to raise a Tax for the King's present Supply, and therefore little else was done, save that the Lord Stephen Scroop of Masham, and the Lord Fitz-bugh were admitted to sit among the Peers, and two or three Acts were made. First, To prohibit the Clergy from paying to the Court of Rome more for the First-Fruits of any Benefice, Dignity, or Bishoprick, than was usually paid before, under the Penalty of a double Forfeiture of the same to the King. Secondly, To prevent the Deceits of Sheriffs, Escheators and Customers in giving up their Accompts. And Lastly, To provide, that Merchants-Strangers should not carry their Goods out of the Nation, which they have once brought in. These Statutes being settled, they proceeded to Debates about the Tax, and it was concluded by the Commons, That the King standing in need of very great Sums of Money to defend the Nation from so many Enemies, as then appeared against it, viz. the Welsh, Scots, Britains, Flemings and French, could not be supplied by the Laity, but that it was necessary, that he should seize upon the Temporalties of the Clergy; which being one full third Part of the Nation did little Service to the Publick, and did the Clergy themselves no good, making them careless of their Duty, negligent in their Studies, and abominably corrupt in their Morals. And this they judged the more reasonable, because the Laity served the King in his

A. D. 1404. Reg. 6. Wars both with their Persons and Estates, but the Clergy were exempted in their Persons, and therefore their Estates ought to bear a greater part of the Charge. These Votes much provoked the Clergy, and the Arch-Bishop in a Passion replied; That the Clergy had always as well in this, as former Kings Reigns given as large Sums to support the publick Charge, as the Laity: And though they did not serve the King in Person in his Wars, they sent their Tenants to assist him, and contributed as much to his Success by their Prayers, as the Laity did by their Weapons. Sir John Cheyny, the Speaker of the Commons, a Person who was very forward to make the Clergy's Revenues a prey to the King's Necessities, replied to the Arch-Bishop; That they did not value the Clergy's Prayers, their Lands would do the King and Nation more good. This Answer more stirr'd the Arch-Bishop's Choler, and he told him plainly; That that King and Kingdom could not expect to thrive, where the Prayers and Suffrages of the Clergy were undervalued; but yet if they feared not their Religion, they should find their Power and Interests were not so inconsiderable, but that they should have hot Work of it to take away their just Rights and Possessions from them, though under the specious pretence of a Law. And he declared, That so long as he was Arch-Bishop of Canterbury no Man should meddle with any Lands belonging to his See, but he would oppose them with all his Interest and Might. The King was present at this Contest between the Arch-Bishop and Commons, and shewed so little Concern for the Clergy, that he seemed to favour the Design of the Commons. Whereupon the Arch-Bishop in some fear of it turn'd to the King, and kneeling down besought him, That he would consider, that God had given him the Kingdom, that he should be the Protector of his Church, and to that End he had sworn at his Coronation to preserve the Church, and her Ministers in their Liberties; which Oath he could not break without a great Prejudice to his own Conscience, and Offence to God, as well as Injustice to Men, and therefore implored him to fear the God by whom he Reign'd, and his own Conscience. The King seeing the Bishop's Earnestness and Zeal, answer'd him; That though he could not condemn his Piety, yet his Fears were Groundless as to him, for he might assure himself, that he would leave the Church in as good, if not a better, Estate than he found it. The Arch-Bishop being encouraged with this Promise, told the Commons, That their wicked Advice was intended more for their own, than the King's Advantage; for as it happen'd to the King's Predecessors, who seized upon the Lands and Goods of the Friar's Aliens, which were worth many thousand Pounds; the Courtiers begg'd them, and left not the King ten Groats of them: So if you could obtain your wicked Designs to have our Temporalties seized, you would find such ways to gratifie your Covetousness by them, that the King would not in a Twelve-month be one Farthing the Richer. The Commons made no Reply, but prosecuted their Design so vigorously, that had not the Arch-Bishop gotten a strong Party against it in the House of Lords, the Commons had carry'd it; but by his Courage and Diligence they were driven from their Purpose, and so fell into the old Current of Taxing: For the Laity were to pay Two Fifteens, and the Clergy a Tenth and a Half, but upon

A. D. 1404. upon Condition, that it should be put into the Hands of the Lord Furnivall to be imploy'd for the King's Wars, and so the Parliament broke up.

A great Inundation. About the End of this Parliament happen'd a great Inundation of the Sea in Kent, which overflowed many of the Arch-Bishop's Grounds, and others, and drown'd much Cattel: The like Damages did the Waters do also in Flanders, Holland, and Zealand. But the greatest Loss which England sustained at this Time was by the Death of William of Wickham, Bishop of Winchester, one of the greatest Benefactors, to the Publick that ever England had: For though he was but of mean Parentage, being the Son of John Long, (a) Parish-Clerk of Wickham, in the County of Southampton; yet having obtained great Riches by the Preferments which were heaped upon him by King Edward the 3d, and King Richard the 2d, for his Deserts, he employ'd them wholly in Works of publick Charity, and for the Encouragement of Piety and Learning: For he built a Chappel at Tytchfield for a Priest to pray for the Souls of his Father, Mother and Sister; a Chauntrey at Southwick, in the County of Southampton for five Priests; New-College in Oxford endowing it with sufficient Revenues to maintain one Warden, seventy Students, twelve Chaplains, three Clerks, sixteen Choristers, an Organist, and other Officers; A publick School in the South-Suburbs of Winchester, to be a Nurfery for his College; in which are sustained one Warden, ten Fellows, two Masters, seventy Schollars, three Chaplains, three Clerks, an Organist, sixteen Choristers, and other Statutable Officers and Servants, by the Revenues of it; the West part of the Cathedral from the Quire, and several other Buildings of less Note. He expended also twenty thousand Marks in repairing the Manor-Houses and Farms belonging to his Bishoprick; added two hundred Marks per Annum to the See, repaired all the High-ways from Winchester to London, and released all the Prisoners in his Diocese, who were in Goal for Debts under twenty Pounds. Other Acts of Charity and Piety he did in so great Numbers, that as none equall'd him in his Beneficence while he lived, so none died so much loved or desired. He was eighty years Old when he deceased, and still lives in the Hearts of many grateful Men in this World, but most happily in the Presence of God, the Rewarder of all good Actions. (b)

A. D. 1405. About St. Valentine's Day the Earl of March's Children, which the King had taken and kept in Windsor-Castle Prisoners, that he might bring their Father to Submission, least by his Attempts against King Henry, he should provoke him to put them to Death, were taken from their Imprisonment, and convey'd away to be carry'd to their Father in Wales. The King was much concerned at their Escape, and used all speedy Means, not only to take them again, but to find out the Instrument of their Release, in which the Persons employ'd were so Successful, that they soon discovered and apprehended them both: The Children were remanded to their Prison, and put into more safe Custody, and the Smith who made the Keys to open the Goal, had his Hands first cut off, and then was beheaded. The Duke of Tork was accused by his own Sister, the Lady Spencer (c), to be the Head of the Conspiracy, and was imprisoned upon it in Pemsey-Castle till the Parliament met, but was then discharged, either for want of fuller Proof, or because the King was willing to drop the Prosecution of so inconsiderable a Fact, especially he having already suffered Imprisonment for it.

Very early in the Spring the King, who had been making Preparations against the Welsh all the Winter, sent his Son the Prince of Wales into the adjoining Parts with a very good Army, and well furnished with all Necessaries; by which he had reduced himself to such Streights, that he was forced to call a Council of his Nobility at London, to get a Supply of Money of them for his present Wants; but the Peers having lately paid their Two Fifteens, were not willing, or not able to spare any more, and so were dismissed with some disgust. Then the King summoned the Clergy to St. Albans to desire a Contribution of them: But they guided by the Precedent of the Lords, would not grant him any thing; whereupon they also were sent Home on Palm-Sunday, under the King's Displeasure. But the Prince of Wales had better Success in the Camp, than his Father in the Council; for he being as Active as Courageous soon after his Arrival engaged the Welsh-Men at a Town called Huake, on March the 15th, and after a sharp Battel obtain'd a signal Victory, slaying fifteen hundred Welsh-Men, and taking Owen Glendour's Son Prisoner. Owen Glendour being troubled for the loss of his Son, resolved to try the Fate of another Battel, in hopes, that if Fortune should favour him, he might recover his Son, and accordingly encountred the English on St. Dunstan's Day, May the 14th, but not with the Success desired; for the English had much the better in this Fight also, and slaying many of his Men, took Owen's Chancellor Prisoner, who being sent up with the rest of the Prisoners, was safely kept in the Tower with his Master's Son.

While the English Arms were thus employ'd against the Welsh, Valeran, Earl of St. Paul, who sought all Advantages to disturb King Henry's Peace and Dominions, and was encouraged in all his Attempts that way by his Master the French King, laid Siege to the Castle of St. Marke, which was three Leagues from Callis, with five hundred Men of Arms, five hundred Genoese Cross-Bows, and a thousand Flemish-Foot. Sir Philip Hall was Governour of it, a very violent Man, who though he had but

(b) The Reward of good Actions is to be expected according to the Sincerity of the Heart. An Ostentation of Charity, and the Merit of Alms in those Days put People on wicked Courses to shew their Beneficence to the Church and Church-men. This William of Wickham was hated by the Black-Prince for his Mismanagement in the publick Offices he enjoy'd; he was banish'd afterwards, and lived abroad all the Time of King Edward's Reign, from that of his Exile; nor durst he come into England in the Reign of Richard the Second till he had procured a Pardon for his past Offences. He was first Chaplain to King Edward the Third. Preacher at St. Martins, London, and Arch-Deacon of Buckingham. Then Surveyor of the King's Works and Forts; for the Clergy in those Days easily reconciled the Ecclesiastical and Military Functions. After this he was advanced to be Keeper of the Privy-Seal, Master of the Wards, Overseer of the Forrests, Treasurer of the King's Dominions in France, Bishop of Winchester, and at last Lord-Chancellor: No wonder he raised such a mighty Estate in his Ministry, considering he lived in so loose a Government as that of King Richard the Second.

(c) She was Widow to the Lord Thomas Spencer, beheaded at Bristol.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6. eighty Archers, and twenty four Soldiers, yet defended it so manfully, that the Earl could not gain it at the First Assault, and at the Second took only the outward Court, with a considerable Booty of Cattle. The Garrison at Callis in the mean time having Intelligence of this Action of the French against St. Mark, sent out two hundred Men of Arms, two hundred Archers, and three hundred Foot, with twelve Waggon of Provisions and Artillery, under the Command of Sir Richard Aston, to relieve it. The French, who fearing this Descent of the English upon them, had fortified the Town, kept themselves close in it: However, the English poured in their Arrows so thick, that the French could not stand the Brunt, but having lost some of their Number betook themselves to flight, and were pursu'd so closely by the English, that near Fourscore of them were taken, and among them some of Note, viz. the Lord Dampier, Seneschall of Ponthieu, the Lord de Rambures, Monsieur de Weriners, and other Gentlemen, and sixty slain, of whom the Lord of Queray, the Lord Courbet, Sir Robert Berengueville, and some others were the Chief. The English laden with the Spoils of the Earl's Camp, and having gotten a good Number of Prisoners returned to Callis. This Success encouraged them so, that within five Days five hundred issued out by Night, and assaulted the Castle of Arde, but it was so well defended by Sir Monfred de Bois, and the Lord Kigine, that the English were forced to return to Callis with the Loss of forty of their Men. These Inroads of the English and French one upon another made way for greater Designs; for as King Henry thought it convenient to strengthen his Garrison at Callis, not only to defend it self, but make Invasions upon the French Countries, by sending a thousand fresh Men thither; so the French King made effectual Provisions against them, furnishing Graveling, and other Fortresses with plenty of Soldiers for their Defence; but because all they could do was not enough to secure themselves against so potent an Enemy as the Callisians then were; therefore the Duke of Burgundy was sent by the French King to besiege Callis with six thousand Men of Arms, fifteen hundred Cross-Bows, and twelve thousand Foot. The King of England disturbed with the News of this Siege, sent a Navy with three thousand Land-Men, under the Command of his Son the Duke of Lancaster, and the Earl of Kent, to raise the Siege by plundering and burning the adjoining Countries, which they did for thirty Miles together in Normandy: Though this did not draw off the Duke from Callis, till the King of France, as was thought, by the Advice of the Duke of Orleans, who envy'd him the Glory of gaining so important a Fortress, commanded him to withdraw, and come Home, which caused a Cessation of Arms between the Two Nations for a little Time.

Callis besieged.

After the Departure of the Prince of Wales from the Welsh, that People being enraged by their Losses, became more Troublesome and Mischievous Neighbours to the bordering English than ever, of which when the King had News, he resolved to undertake another Expedition against them to reduce them: But before he could get all Things ready, a strong Conspiracy of his Nobles to depose him was discovered, and so he was obliged to stay to secure himself in his Throne. The Conspiracy was begun and carried on in this Manner. It seems, that King Henry having received a peremptory Denial from his Lords, that they would give him no Money at London, dismiss'd them with some angry Words, and sharp Menaces, which meeting with Discontents in some of his Nobles, and more especially in Richard Scroop, Arch-Bishop of York, and the Earl of Northumberland so enrag'd them, that they formed a strong Conspiracy against him to depose him. These two Peers having consulted with, and engaged several other great Men in their Design, viz. Thomas Mowbrey (d), Earl-Marshal, the Lords, Hastings, Falconbridge, Burdolf, and others, and appointed a Meeting of all the Forces they could get together upon Torkwolds, compos'd certain Articles containing such Things as the Nobles and Commons found themselves aggrieved with, that by divulging them among the People, and shewing them their Friends, they might raise a Strength sufficient for their Design. The Piety of the Arch-Bishop, who had engaged in this Conspiracy, drew such great Multitudes of the Gentry and Commons to join in his Quarrel, that almost every one that could bear Arms in the Countries adjacent followed him. The Arch-Bishop seeing this Success, encouraged them to proceed in their good Enterprize, and immediately caused the Articles of their Grievances to be set upon the Doors of the Monastries, and in the Streets of York, that all Men might understand the Cause that moved them to take Arms against the King. The Articles were to this Effect.

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6. The Rebellion of Arch Bp. Scroop and the Cause of it in several Articles.

ARTICLES of the Wrongs and Injuries done by King Henry to the Royal Dignity, and People of England.

Imprimis. 'That King Henry at his coming into England out of his Exile

'had vountarily sworn, that he came only to Challenge and Recover his Own and Wife's Inheritance, and not to intermeddle with the King's Crown or Authority, but after finding himself strong enough to fulfil his Ambitious Desires, had wickedly broke his Oath, and without any Right or Reason caused himself to be made and proclaimed King.

Secondly, 'That as an Arch-Traitor he had not only imprison'd his Sovereign Lord King Richard, and by Threats and Terrors had forced him to resign his Crown and Dignity upon Promises of Life, but had barbarously caused him to be Murdered in Prison, that he might enjoy his Crown and Kingdom with less Trouble and Molestation.

Thirdly, 'That ever since the Death of King Richard, he had unjustly kept the Kingdom, and the Crown from his Kinsman Edward Mortimer, who was the Son and Heir apparent of Philippa, the Daughter and Heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, the Father of the Now Usurping King.

Fourthly, 'That he had unjustly put to Death several of the Nobles of this Nation, for endeavouring to promote the Publick Good, and had contrary to the Law of the Land caused several Bishops to be Arrested, and Imprisoned.

(d) Son to that Duke of Norfolk, who was banish'd with this King, when he was Duke of Hereford.

Fifthly,

A. D. 1405. Reg. 6. Fifthly, 'That he had willingly ratified, allowed, and approved in his Parliament at Winchester a most wicked Statute made against the Church of Rome, the Powers and Pricipality thereof given by our Lord Jesus Christ to Blessed St. Peter and his Successors the Bishops of Rome, and so hath been the Cause of much Simony, Perjury, and other Disorders among the Clergy, and Gentry of the Nation, who sell their Vacant Benefices to unworthy and unfit Persons, to the great Discouragement of Learning in the Universities, and Diligence in the Ministry.

Sixthly, 'That he hath usurped a Tyrannical Government, and so grievously oppressed the Nation by his continual Exactions of Needless Taxes and Subsidies, when there was no reasonable Cause or Occasion for them, that the People are miserably impoverished, and dare not complain, because of his Menaces and Threats.

Seventhly, 'That no Justice could be expected from him, because, that contrary to his Coronation Oath, he had hindered the Free Election of Parliaments by sending his Letters into the Shires and Borroughs of the Kingdom, whereby he procured, that such Persons only should be chosen Knights and Burgesses, as would not fail to serve his Turn in their Votes and Acts, as Occasion was offered.

Eighthly, 'That whereas in Honour and Respect to his Affinity, he ought to have ransomed and redeemed his Cousin the Earl of March from his loathsome Imprisonment, (and the more especially, because he was often solicited to it by the Lords of his Council) he not only deny'd to grant the same Request, but falsly and untruely Published and Declared, That the Earl made himself a Prisoner to the Welsh voluntarily, that he might have a more colourable Pretence to join with Traitors and Rebels to conspire and plot against him, and disturb his Peace and Government.

Lastly, 'That the Premisses being very destructive to the Nation, and calling for a speedy Redress, they had taken Arms with no other Intention, than to exalt unto the Kingdom the true and lawful Heir, and to crown him with the Royal Diadem of England, to bring the Welsh, Irish, and other Enemies of the Kingdom to a perpetual Peace; and lastly, to free the Nation from all those Exactions, Extortions, and unjust Payments, which ruined the People: And therefore as they defied King Henry, as an Usurping Tyrant, and pronounced him Perjured and Excommunicate; so they threatned the Curse of God, and his Holy Church upon all those that should assist him against them, and not join with them against him.

These Articles being seen and read, were very well approved by the Generality of People, and brought a mighty Concourse to the Assistance of the Arch-Bishop; insomuch, that they had no reason in the least to doubt of Success. The King having Intelligence of these Things, gave over all Thoughts of his Expedition into Wales, and resolved to turn his Forces against them: But Ralph Nevill, Earl of Westmoreland, and his Son John, Duke of Lancaster (e) with several other Great Persons, who were at that Time marching towards Scotland to defend the Borders with a considerable Force, thought it necessary to stop the Growth of the Rebellion, by opposing it in the Beginning; and being not far from their Camp, presented themselves with all the Strength they could get to give them Battel. The Arch-Bishop's Party was much the Stronger, being twenty thousand Men, but yet were not forward to set upon them, which the Earl of Westmoreland perceiving, and not daring to assault them, he contrived to supplant them by this Stratagem. He sent certain Messengers to the Arch-Bishop to know the Cause, why a Person of his Character for Wisdom and Piety, who should by his Place endeavour all he could to promote Peace and Quietness in the Nation, should appear in Arms, and disturb the Government. The Arch-Bishop reply'd, 'That he attempted nothing against the King's Peace; but all that he intended was, to advance the Good of the Commonwealth, by redressing the Abuses and Corruptions of the Government, contained in certain Articles, which he gave them a Copy of, and desired them to carry to the Earl to consider upon, not doubting but he would agree with him, that his Purpose was Good and Profitable, as well for the King himself, as for the whole Realm. The Earl having received this Answer, and the Paper which they brought with them, from the Messenger's Hands, read the Articles contained in it; and immediately sent the Bishop Word again; 'That having well considered of the Articles sent to him, he highly approved the Holy Intention and Purpose of the Arch-Bishop, and was ready to concur with him to his utmost in establishing the same, desiring to meet the Arch-Bishop in some convenient Place, and with an equal Number of Men, to confer farther about the more effectual carrying on of their Design. The Prelate having received this Message did not suspect the Deceit lurking in it, but rejoiced much at the Earl's Proposals, appointing a Place to meet him, as he desired. The Earl-Marshal was afraid of the Trick, but the Arch-Bishop giving Credit to the Earl's Words, perswaded him to attend him to the Conference, where the Earl of Westmoreland again solemnly declared, 'That he and his would do their Best, that a Reformation should be made according to the forementioned Articles: And then desiring that their Soldiers might be dismissed to their Camps, they shook Hands, and sat down to drink together, as perfect Friends; which when the Soldiers saw they departed with Joy, and left them; but one of the Troops wheeling about by the Earl of Westmoreland's Order, came suddenly upon them as they were sitting, and took the Arch-Bishop, Earl-Marshal, and several other Prisoners. This Perfidiousness the Arch-Bishop too late upbraided the Earl of Westmoreland with, and that with some Smartness; but the Earl pacified him by repeated Promises of his Safety, and of them that were with him. The Earl of Westmoreland soon after hearing, that the King himself was come to Pomfrait, went thither with his Prisoners, and presented them to the King; but whether he forgot to tell the King of his Promise, or whether the King would not perform it, certain it is, that they were both Executed. Bishop

A. D. Bishop suffered with great Constancy, and was so much admired as well as pitied after his Death, that the People worship'd him for a Martyr, till the King forbade them. From Pomfrait the King marched with his Army of 37000 Men to York, where he fined the Citizens at his Pleasure for their Rebellion, and so furnished himself with Money and Provision for his further Progress in pursuit of the Earl of Northumberland: But that Earl, with the Lord Burdolf escaped into Scotland, and was received by David, Lord Flemming. The King in his way took the Lord Hastings and Falconbridge, Sir John Colvill, and Sir John Griffith, and beheaded them at Durham. Then he assaulted Berwick, Warkworth, Alnewick, and several other Castles which belonged to the Earl of Northumberland, and took them, and so put an end to the Rebellion at present.

K. Henry's Expedition on against the Welsh. While the King was thus employ'd against his own Subjects, the Welsh under Owen Glendour were very solicitous to strengthen themselves against King Henry's Arms, whose Intentions (as they knew) were not laid aside wholly, but deferred, and therefore they might expect him as soon as Things were quiet at Home. They thereupon sent to the King of France for his Assistance, and obtained 12000 Men, which were sent over in 140 Ships, under the Command of the Marshal Montmerancy. In their Passage they lost all their Horses for want of fresh Water; and just after their Landing, the Lord Barkley, and Mr. Henry Pay, burnt and took near Thirty of their Ships: But these Losses they soon recovered upon the English; for joining with Owen Glendour, they besieged Carmarden, Worcester, and several other Places, from whence they took store of Spoil and Plunder. King Henry hearing of these Troubles from the Welsh, hastened against them; but as if an ill Fate had pursued him, he lost all his Carriages with a violent Tempest, in his Passage thither; and being arrived, could effect nothing against them; for the Welsh after their usual manner retreating into their Mountains, the King for want of Money and Forrage was forced to return Home without any Action worthy of Mention, losing some of his Carriages in his Retreat. The French also returned with little gain by their tedious Journey, having lost more than they had gotten.

Reg. 7. In the beginning of this Year the Lady Philip, King Henry's younger Daughter, was married to Erice, King of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, and not long after proclaimed Queen of those Countries on the Conception of our Lady, December 8. in the Presence of the Embassadors, who had celebrated the Marriage before. On the Translation of St. Martin, the Town of Roylton was set on Fire, and almost burnt down to the Ground. The Earl of Arundell also about the same time married the King of Portugal's natural Daughter, and the King and Queen were at the Marriage.

A. D. On the First of March a Parliament met at Westminster. The main Design of their Meeting was to grant the King a Subsidy for his present Supply; but that he might more easily gain his Ends upon them, the King passed several Acts at their Request, about the more regular and orderly Election of Knights of the Shires, and Burgesses for Parliament; against Bulls to be discharged of Tythes, Provisions, Licenses and Pardons for Benefices, held by Incumbents, purchased of the Pope, and brought into the Nation, to the great Prejudice of the Church, and Disturbance of the Order of the Nation; as also for the Confirmation of the ancient Liberties, and Preservation of the Peace, with several other Statutes; by which Readiness and Facility he thought to oblige them to be more liberal to him in granting him Money: But when the King's Necessities and Wants came to be propounded, the House was generally averse to it, and deny'd to grant any Tax at present. The King had no way to force them to it, but by prolonging their Session, which would not only be chargeable to the Nation, but prejudicial to all their private Interests, in neglecting their Summer-Business; and therefore, when they had long waited for their Dissolution with Impatience, and found the King's Design, they at length granted him a Fifteenth of the Commons; which was so much the more heavy, because the length of the Session had been very Expensive: And the Clergy to ease the Seculars, who had been much impoverished with paying so many Tenths, imposed a new Subsidy upon Stipendiary Priests, Mendicant-Friers, and Chantry-Priests, viz. three and four Pence a Head, which was paid by them with much Murmuring and Repining, because of the Poverty of those inferior Priests and Monks and the Novelty of it. By this Parliament the Succession was entailed a-new upon the Posterity of King Henry, and a Pardon given to all those Persons that had been instrumental in suppressing the late Rebellion, and such riotous Meetings as were Precedent, or Consequential to it.

The King while the Parliament sat, considering how Turbulent the Earl of Northumberland had been to his Government; that he had been the chief Cause and Instrument of Two Rebellions, and that he could never hope for any Security so long as he was alive; for though he was fled into Scotland, yet being so near his Friends in the North, and among his Enemies the Scots, who if not out of Love to the Earl, yet out of Hatred to himself and the English, would lay hold of any Opportunity to assault his Dominions, and disturb his Peace; contrived to prevent the Earl's Designs, by getting him into his Hands, and to that End agreed with several of the Scotch Nobles to restore certain Great Men of their Kingdom, whom he kept Prisoners, if they would resign the Earl of Northumberland, and Lord Bardolf into his Hands. The Scots readily assented to the King's Proposals, thinking it unreasonable to value the Safety of Two Rebels, before the Liberty of many of their very good Friends, and accordingly conspired to take them and deliver them to him: But the Lord Flemming, who had entertained them, having Intelligence of the Design, and being loath to violate the Sacred Rules of Hospitality, gave them Notice of it, and advised them to provide for their Safety elsewhere, since he could no longer protect them; whereupon the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf fled into Wales. The Scotch Lords being thus disappointed of their Aim, turned their Anger upon the Lord Flemming, and slew him, but with no less Trouble to the Nation than Cruelty in themselves: For the Children and Relations of the said Lord, being excited by the Barbarousness of the Fact, resolved to revenge it, and being in so just a Cause, obtained Assistance easily to effect it. This begat a Civil War in Scotland, and raised such dangerous Quarrels in several parts of the Nation, that the King not thinking it safe to keep Prince James his Son and Heir at Home, sent him under the Care of the Earl of

In their Passage, as they sailed by the English Coast, about Cley in Norfolk, they were taken by certain English Ships belonging to those Parts, and sent to the King at Windsor; who though they presented to him the King of Scots Letters, containing a Request of his Favour to his Son, if he should land in any part of his Dominions, yet he imprisoned them all in the Tower of London; saying, He would teach the Young Prince to speak the French Tongue, and so they need go no further. The Bishop remained not long in Custody, but either through Cunning or Connivence escaped; and though a Truce was made a little after between the two Kings of England and Scotland, yet the Prince was kept a Prisoner, either as a Pledge of his Father's Fidelity, or to make him expel the English Rebels out of his Dominions, whom he entertained to the King's great Displeasure.

Divers Accidents. In the End of this Summer the Britains, who served the Queen, were banished the Nation, and two of her Daughters sent along with them by Order of the Parliament. The Lady Philippa also was sent over into Denmark to her Husband, being attended by Henry Bowet, Bishop of Bath, and the Lord Richard, Brother to the Duke of York, with a great Train, and was soon after her Arrival married to the said King with great Magnificence. At the same time solemn Jufts were held at London between the Earl of Kent, Sir John Cornwall, and the Lord Beaumont and Three Scots, the Earl of Marre, and Two Scottish Knights; but the Honour of the Victory fell to the English. This Year also the Mayor of London caused all the Wears or Banks, as far as Gravesend, which had been made into the Thames to catch the Fish, to be beaten down and demolished, because they were found too destructive to the Fishery. The Earl of Arundel, and some other of the Nobility opposed the Mayor in it, but he prevailed through some Concessions given the City of London by their Charter. Sir Robert Knolles finished Rochester Bridge, and the Chappel adjoining to it. The Pope made Thomas Langley, Bishop of Durham, in the Place of Walter Skirlow, lately deceased. The French also sent a further Aid to the Welsh in thirty eight Ships, but lost eight in their Passage, and the rest hardly escaping the English, got ashore in much Fear and Danger.

Reg. 8. Earl of Kent's Marriage. The King, who greatly favoured Edmund Holland, Earl of Kent, and for that Reason had raised him to very great Honour and Offices about him, preferred him to the Lady Lucy, the Eldest Daughter, and one of the Heiresses of Barnabas, Duke of Milan; which Match he had obtained for him by great Interest, and large Expences. She was married to him January the 24th, in the Church of St. Mary Overies, in Southwark, and the Duke on the Day of her Marriage paid him by the Hands of Don Alfonso de Caimuola 100000 Ducats.

A. D. 1407. Reg. Walden's Death. About this Time died Roger Walden, Doctor of Divinity, and so at length came to his Haven of Peace and Quiet, after a Life of infinite Changes and Troubles; for of all Men living he was the greatest Instance of the Mutability and Inconstancy of Fortune. He was originally of mean Parentage, and born to a small Estate; but being educated in Learning, and of a pregnant Wit, he raised himself by degrees to the highest Offices both in Church and State; for he was first made Lord High-Treasurer, and a little after by the Deposition of Thomas Arundel, he was made Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and so continued during King Richard's Reign. From these Pinacles of Grandeur he was cast down by the coming of King Henry to the Throne, who restored Thomas Arundel to his See. Several Years he remained in a private Station, and at length was again raised to Episcopal Dignity, being made Bishop of London: But, as though Fortune raised him only to shew her Power to cast down, he was again removed from that See in less than the space of a Year, and Nicholas Hobwith put in his Place; dying if not in as poor, yet in almost as mean a Condition as he was Born: So uncertain is worldly Greatness.

The Duke of Orleans early in the Spring having gathered a mighty Army, beleaguered the Towns of Burges and Blay in Gascoigne, not doubting, but that with his Army he might easily win the said Towns: But, as if Providence had fought against him, and disapproved the Action; there happened such continual Tempests of Rain, mixt with Hail and Snow, every Day for six Weeks together, that he was not able to attempt any Thing; but lost by the Violence of the Weather (as was reported) six thousand of his Men; so that he was forced to break up the Siege and depart with Disgrace. The English not insensible of this Danger, in the mean time annoy'd the French Coasts; and with fifteen Ships under the Command of Henry Pay, Esq; and some others belonging to the Cinque-Ports took a hundred and twenty Prizes on the British Coasts, laden with Iron, Salt, Oyl, and Rochel-Wines; so that the French sustained many Damages by Sea and Land.

Some Seeds of Rebellion began to spring this Year, tho' being nipped in the Bud, they came to nothing: For some Persons desirous to stir up the People to Sedition, set up Bills in several Places of the City of London, and upon the Doors of St. Paul's Church; declaring, that King Richard was still alive, and would shortly come with great Power and State to recover his Kingdom. But the Chief Actor in this Business was by the King's Vigilance soon found out, and punished according to his Desert, that the Terror of his Sufferings might make others to avoid the like false Attempts.

The City of London was so much infected this Summer with the Plague, that it is said thirty thousand died of it; and the Country was proportionably afflicted with it, for many whole families died of it. The King not daring to venture himself in the City, passed his Time in the Country, till the Infection should cease; where having kept his Court some time at his Castle of Leeds in Kent, he pass'd into Essex to reside a while at Pleshey. He took Ship at Queensburgh, in the Isle of Sheepy, to sail to Leigh in Essex: But in his way certain French Pirates, who lay at the Thames Mouth, watching for Prey, fell in among his Ships, having Information of his crossing, and took four Ships which were next to the King's, missing of the Ship he was in, which they intended to take; but carrying away Sir Thomas Rampstone his Vice-chamberlain, with his Furniture and Apparel; the King himself escaping only through the Swiftnefs of his Ship. The Lord Camois, had undertaken with certain Men of War, to convey the King over safely; but either thro' the Sluggishness of his Ship or cross Winds, not being at hand to guard the King from this Danger, was thought to have practised with the French to deliver the King into their Hands; and

The King opposes the Pope's Provisions. Robert Halome, Chancellour of Oxford being at Rome with the Pope, obtained a Provision of him for the Arch-Bishoprick of York, when it should become Vacant by the Death of the present Bishop. Richard Scroope being beheaded for his Rebellion, Robert possessed himself of the See: But the King was so offended with him for this Intrusion, that he was afraid to keep it; and therefore submitted the Disposal of it to the King's Pleasure, who thereupon made Henry Bower, from Bishop of Bath, Arch-Bishop, and put Robert Halome into the See of Salisbury, then vacant by the Translation of Henry Chicheley to St. Davids. (f) The Prince of Wales much about the same Time won the Castle of Aberystwith (g) in Wales, forcing the Belieged to resign it to him upon certain Conditions; but the Prince was no sooner departed from those Parts, but Owen Glendour by a subtle Stratagem got Possession of it again; and putting out the Keepers, whom he charged with Treason for resigning the Castle without his Consent, put in others more faithful to defend it for his Use.

Sir Robert Knolles's Death and his Acts of Charity and Piety. About the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin, Aug. 15. deceased that most Warlike Knight, and Brave English Hero, Sir Robert Knolles, at his Manor of Sconethorp in Norfolk; and being carried up to London, was honourably Interred in the Church of the White-Fryars in Fleet-Street, by the Lady Constance his Wife; which Church he had a little before re-edified. He was of mean Parentage, but by his Courage and Valour raised himself to be the Commander of Armies, and Governour of Provinces; in which Places he behaved himself so well, that he not only enriched himself, but was a Terror to all the Enemies of the Nation, especially the French and Britains. In his old Age he resigned his Government of the Province of Aquitain, to Sir Thomas Belfort, and gave himself to Acts of Piety and Charity; in which he was as eminent, as in Heroick Achievements: For he built the large Bridge at Rocheſter over the Medway, with a Chappel at the Foot of it; in which is a Table of all the Benefactors to the Bridge, who have given Land or Money to the upholding of it. The Coping hath been added since by John Warner, a Merchant of Rocheſter, and the Iron Bars and Spikes by Arch-Bishop Warham. He also founded a College of secular Priests at Pontefract for six Priests, thirteen poor Men and Women, and endued it with a hundred and eighty Pounds a Year in Lands, with many other Acts of Charity, to his great Honour and the eternal Commendation of his Memory.

Reg. 9. Sir Thomas Rampſtone, Constable of the Tower of London, passing from Court to the Tower by Water, was drown'd in shooting the Bridge. Sir Richard Whittington the Famous Benefactor to the City of London, was this Year made Mayor, and held that Place three Years. With the beginning of this Year a Parliament met at Glouceſter, but was removed in November to Westminster for mere Convenience. In this Session little was enacted of publick Advantage, besides the Confirmation of the Ancient Liberties, Laws and Customs of the Realm, but only some Irregularities about the Payment of Taxes by Strangers, sealing Cloths, and the like were removed. In respect to the Church several Things of Importance were moved, and some enacted, viz. It was moved by Petition to the King, That forasmuch, as divers Provisors of Benefices in the Church of England, thro' Covetousness have devised to destroy the Present Incumbents, by suing Processes in the Court of Rome, and without any Citations given them within the Realm have deprived them of their Benefices; It would please the King to consider the Mischief of such Proceedings, and to ordain, That all such Persons, as shall procure or sue in the Court of Rome any Process touching any Benefice or Collation in his Majesty's Dominions, and obtain any Presentation thereupon, shall not be admitted by any Ordinary into such Benefices, but shall incur the Penalty of the Statute of Provisors made 13 Rich. 2. with all their Counsellors and Fautors: To which the King answered, That he would take effectual Care, that the Statutes before-mentioned should be observed. Another Petition was also put up to the King, begging, 'That since many Benefices of the Realm were held and enjoy'd by Foreigners and others, who took no care of the People, he would be pleased to seize upon all Benefices, where the Parsons were not Resident, and take one half of the said Benefices to his own Use. But to this the King answered, 'That he would cause the Ordinaries to do their Duties; which if they would not do, he would take care to prevent Pluralities. These favourable Answers encouraged the Commons to pass several Bills in reference to them, which the King enacted, viz. 'That no Monies should be carried out of the Nation to the Court of Rome; and that if any of the Pope's Collectors should levy any Money within the Realm for the First-Fruits of any Ecclesiastical Dignity, he should incur the Penalty of the Statute of Provisors: That the Elections and Presentations to Benefices should be free, and no Patrons should be interrupted in their Right, either by the King or Pope: That all Statutes against Provisors, and Translations of Bishopricks and Arch-Bishopricks, shall be strictly observed and executed upon all Offenders against them, and that no Clergy-man shall sue for any Benefice but in the King's Court. These Acts were so pleasing to the Parliament, that they granted the King a general Subsidy thro' the whole Nation, and so it was dismissed.

Eight Parliament's Acts & Taxes.

A. D. 1408. A little before Christmas, began a Frost of that Violence and long Continuance, that the like was scarce ever heard of in England. It lasted fifteen Weeks; and being accompany'd with an abundance of Snow, it was so destructive to the Birds especially, that almost all the smaller Birds died with Cold and Hunger.

Early in this Spring the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, who from their Escape out of Scotland, had spent a whole Year to gather an Army in Wales, France and Flanders to invade England, returned again into Scotland, and entred into England. The King, who had no Suspicion of this Attempt, was at London, consulting with his Nobles and Peers about the

(f) The Translation of Dr. Chicheley from the Bishoprick of Salisbury to St. David's, shews us that there must be a vast Alteration in the Revenues of the See of St. Davids, from what they were formerly: That of Salisbury being now valued in the King's Books at 1367 l. 11 s. 8 d. and that of St. Davids but at 426 l. 5 s. 8 d. and yet as low as the Priests are now, the Value of it in the said Books amounts to much more, than that of the other Three Welsh Bishopricks put together.

A. D. 1408. Reg. 9. Affairs of the Realm, and was in no Readiness to make any Opposition; so that the Earl had time to gain several of his Castles with ease, before the King could get his Army together, though he endeavour'd it with all speed. These prosperous Beginnings encourag'd the Earl to go on, and invade Yorkshire; where being at Thresh, he put out a Proclamation, assuring the People, 'That he came to relieve the English Nation from their many and unjust Oppressions; and requiring all Persons that loved the Liberty of their Country to resort to him immediately with their Weapons and Armour to assist him; by which fair Pretences great Numbers of People resorted to him. The King being certified of these Things, hastened towards them with a great Army; but not being able to get there time enough to secure those Countries from their Ravage and Spoil, Sir Thomas Rockley or Rokesby, High-Sheriff of the County, a Person of signal Courage and Loyalty, assembled the Forces of the County together, if not to fight them, yet to stop their Progress, which without any Signs of Opposition would prove of greater Damage. The Earl and his Party advanced forward, and the Sheriff as resolutely marched against them, and meeting them at Braham-moor near Haselwood, resolved to give them Battel, though with a far less Number than the Earl had. The Rebels chose their Ground, and were ready to receive them; which Advantage the Sheriff so little regarded, that he fell immediately upon them perhaps more boldly than wisely; but Fortune seconds the Adventurous. The Earl and his Men encountered him with equal Resolution and Bravery. However in the Issue he was forced to resign the Victory to the Sheriff; many were slain on both sides, but the Rebels lost far the most. The Lord Bardolf was taken, and so much wounded, that he died soon after of his Wounds. The Earl of Northumberland was slain, but his Head being cut off was sent up with the Lord Bardolf's to London, and there set upon a Pole on the Bridge. His Death was much lamented by the People, by reason of his Valour and Honour. The Bishop of Bangor, who had gone over to Owen Glendour was taken; but because he was not in Arms, the King pardon'd him, more in respect to his Order than Merit. But the Abbot of Hailes found not that Mercy from the King; for being taken in Armour, he was hang'd. The King was on his March towards the Rebels, when the News of this Victory was brought to him; but judging it necessary to proceed in his Course to settle those Countries, and purge 'em from the Dregs of Rebellion, he went to York, where he punish'd many that were accused for succouring and assisting the Earl of Northumberland, some with Death, others with great Fines, and so brought those Parts in a small time into good Order.

This Summer the English Seas being much pestered with French Rovers, which did much Damage, both to the Coasts and Merchants, the King sent out a well-mann'd Fleet, under the Command of Edmund Holland, Earl of Kent, to scour the Narrow-Seas of them. The Pirates having Intelligence of the King's Design, withdrew themselves into their Ports, so that the Earl, when he came to Sea, though he sought carefully for them, could find none of them; but at length getting Intelligence that they were gotten into Brittain, he pursued 'em, resolving to revenge on them the Injuries they had done to the English; and because he could not bring them to a Sea-fight, he landed his Men, and besieged the City of Briak which harbour'd them, and sent them out. The Inhabitants stoutly defended themselves, endeavouring to drive the English back, by casting Arrows and Stones upon them, and were so lucky as to wound the Earl himself mortally on the Head, of which hurt he died within five Days. This might have proved Fortunate to the Besieged, had their Enemies been Men of common Tempers; but the Loss of their Captain so much enraged the Soldiers, that they became more desperate in the Assault, and within a few Days took the Town by force, and slew all that had made Resistance, but staid not to secure it, being satisfied with the Prey and Prisoners. The Countess of Kent had no Issue, and therefore the King desired her in Marriage for his Bastard-Brother the Earl of Dorset, an old and decrepit Man; (b) but she chose rather to please her self, and married a young Gentleman, Henry Mortimer, by whom she had One Daughter, named Ann; afterwards married to Sir John Arbemond.

The Schism between the Popes, which had lasted several Years past, was now grown very wearisome to the whole Church, having cost so many Lives to maintain it, and being such an open Breach of Unity and Christian Love, the two main Pillars of the Church. The two last Antipopes, Gregory XII, and Benedict XIII, had been sworn at their Election to call a Council, and submit to the Decision of it, that by that most effectual way Peace might be restored to the Church; but their Behaviour afterwards in choosing new Cardinals to strengthen their Parties, was an evident Sign they intended to perpetuate the Schism, as much as in them lay, not valuing the Oath they had taken to the contrary. This Action offended the more moderate Cardinals, and gave distaste to particular Churches, insomuch, that they began to take other Methods to bring the Popes to Terms of Agreement.

In France the King having taken Advice of the Learned Men of his Universities of Paris, (i) Bolonia, Orleans, Tholouse and Montpelier, how he might avoid the Danger of Schism; determined to submit to neither of these Schismatical Popes, until Peace were restored to Christ's Church. In England also the Doctors of both Universities met in a Council at London, with the rest of the Clergy to debate, whether they should withdraw from the Pope their usual Payments of Monies, and their accustomed Obedience; considering, that contrary to his Word and Promise, confirmed by his Oath, he had hindered the Agreement and Concord of the Church: But they came to no Resolution, because the King was willing to try more gentle Methods first, especially since the Council of Pisa was appointed to meet to determine the Controversie the next Summer: And therefore the mean while, that he might dispose Pope Gregory and his Cardinals to submit to their Decision, he wrote a Letter to each of them, to this effect. 'To the Pope he represented

(b) It could not be the Earl of Dorset, for the King did not confer that Title till four Years afterwards on his younger Brother, Thomas Beaufort. Hol. The Author must mean John, Earl of Somerset, the eldest of Esquire Sui-ford's Sons, by the Duke of Lancaster; and he being several Years Younger than the King, who was not now above one and forty Years of Age, deserved not the Character of Old and Decrepid.

A. D. 1409. Reg. 10. the Miseries of Christendom by this Schism, and how much Blood-shed it had been the Cause of; that 200000 Men had been slain in several parts of the Christian World in this Antipapal Quarrel; and lately in the Contention for the Bishoprick of Leige between the Two Competitors, set up by each Pope 30000 Men had been slain: And then added, That if his Holiness would seriously consider these Things, he could not but be much troubled at it, and for Conscience sake rather relinquish his Papal Authority and Grandure, than be a further Cause of such detestable Murders; imitating the Example of the True Mother, who pleading her Cause before Solomon, chose rather to part with her own Child, than see it cut asunder: And though by his late Creation of Nine Cardinals he had given some Suspicion, that he intended not the End of the Schism; yet he hoped, that he abhorred to be guilty of so great Inconstancy. To the Cardinals he gives only an Exhortation to behave themselves with that Candour and Impartiality at the Council of Pisa, that God may be pleased, and the Pope himself obliged to thank them. These Letters to the Pope and Cardinals the King sent to Rome by Sir John Colvil, Knight, and Mr. Nicholas Rixton, Clerk. Soon after their Departure the Arch-bishop of Canterbury summon'd the Clergy of his Province to a Convocation in St. Paul's Church, to choose sufficient Persons to go to the General Council appointed to be held at Pisa; and they unanimously fixed upon Robert Halome, Bishop of Salisbury, Henry Chicheley, Bishop of St. Davids, and Thomas Chillingden, Prior of Christ-Church in Canterbury.

This Summer, notwithstanding the Burning of William Sawter, and other Severities used against the Lollards in this King's Reign; it was found, that several Learned Men of the University of Oxford, and in other parts of the Nation were inclinable to the Doctrines of John Wickliff, and did publickly in their Sermons and other Discourses, deliver Opinions and Conclusions tending that way. The Bishop and chief of the Clergy were much troubled at it; and the Lord-Chancellor, by his special Mandate, ordered a Convocation of the Heads and Body of the University, to meet and examine the Doctrines of Wickliff; who accordingly on June 26. assembling in great Multitudes, viz. both Regents and Non-regents, reprov'd and condemn'd with one Consent the Books of John Wickliff, D. D. Entituled, De Sermone in monte, Triologorum de Simonia, De perfectione Statuum, De ordine Christiano, & de gradibus Cleri Ecclesie. As also his Treatise of Logick or Sophistry: Prohibiting under the Penalty of the Great Curse and Deprivation of all Scholastick Degrees, that none from thence-forward should affirm, teach, or preach by any manner of means or ways any of the Opinions or Doctrines contained and set forth in the same Heretical Books.

Several Accidents. About the same time was a famous Play acted at Skinner's Well, near Clarkenwell, London, representing the chief Matters of the World from the Creation: It lasted Eight Days, and most part of the Nobility and Gentry of England were present at it. From hence they went to Royal Jufts in Smithfield, between the Marshal of Henault and certain Hanovers, Challenggers; and the Earl of Somerset, and an equal Number of English-men Defendants. The Victory was on the English-men's side; for the Earl overcame, and all the English but one. Owen Glendour also the famous Welsh Rebel died. He had behaved himself with Valour enough; but not being able to effect what he had promised his Country-men, viz. an absolute Sovereignty among themselves, and a Freedom from the English Yoke; but instead of these having engaged them upon insupportable Expences, and an endless War, they deserted him; and he being forsaken, partly through fear of being delivered up to King Henry, and partly thro' discontent and trouble of Mind, fled into the Mountains and Deserts; where being destitute of all Comfort and Succour, he ended his miserable Life. The Council of Pisa after a long Deliberation about the State of the Church thro' the Schism of the Antipopes, at last determined against both, and created Alexander V. Pope in their Room, and so put an end to the Schism which had vexed the Christian Churches so long.

The King made Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Surrey (k) Lord-Chancellor, and the Lord Scroop, Treasurer; and after Christmas met his Parliament at Westminster, Jan. 28. In this Parliament it was enacted. That Sheriffs making false Returns of Knights of Shires elected for Parliament, shall forfeit a hundred Pound to the King: That Records shall not be amended or corrupted after Judgment enrolled, and that Jurors shall be returned into Westminster-hall by the Sheriffs. But that which was most amazing in this Parliament was a Petition of the Commons delivered to the King, purporting, That the Temporal Possessions, Lands and Revenues of the Clergy were lewally spent, consumed and wasted by the Bishops, Abbots and Priors of the Realm, which if they were well managed, would maintain 150 Earls, 1500 Knights, 6200 Esquires, and 100 Hospitals more than are now at present; by which means the Safety of the Nations would be better provided for, the Poor better maintained, and the Clergy would be more Humble and Pious; and therefore they humbly besought him to take them into his own Hands, and order them accordingly. In their Bill they alledged, That the Temporalities of the said Bishops and Religious Persons amounted to above 322000 Mark; which at the Allowance of 3000 Marks to an Earl, a 100 Marks to each Knight, 40 Marks to an Esquire, and an 100 Marks to each Alms-house yearly, would be sufficient for the said Number. But it is said, that the King was displeased at this Motion, which having before been made, he commanded them for the future never to meddle with any such Matters. The Commons also petitioned, That the Statute which pass'd in the Second Year of the King against the Lollards might be revoked or qualified with some Restrictions and Mitigations: But the King so much favoured the Clergy, that he plainly

(k) This was Thomas Beaufort, younger Son of John of Gaunt, and not Suinford, whom Walsingham erroneously stild Earl of Surrey, and the Modern Historians have erred, copying after him. Thomas Beaufort was created Earl of Dorset two Years after; and this Remark may also correct an Error in Holinshed, who says, that Thomas Beaufort, (Camb. Brit. Tit. Surrey.) the Chancellor died this Year 1411. pag. 536. And the very next Page he relates, That Thomas Beaufort, the King's Brother was created Earl of Dorset, Anno 1412. Now there was no other Thomas Beaufort, besides he who was the Son of that Suinford, that we read of in History, and he had the Fortune to be Duke of Exeter, Protector of the Realm, and to be a chief Man in the Government to his Death, which happened in the Year 1446. Holinshed, pag. 1079.

D. A. told them, 'That he was so far from dis-

Reg. 11. would have it made more vigorous and sharp for the Punishment of such erroneous Persons.
 Then they further desired, 'That Clerks convicted should not be delivered to the Bishop's Prison, because they escaped the Punishment of their Crimes by that means:
 But they could not obtain their Requests.
 These Denials so sharpened the Commons against the King, that when he desired that he might have annually a Fifteenth of the Laity, and a Tenth of the Clergy, though the Parliament did not sit, they would not agree to it;
 nor had he gained a present Supply, were it not, that he tired them with a long Session, keeping them till Mid-May, and forcing them to purchase their Dismission with the Gift of a Fifteenth of the Commons, though with much Discontent.

 In the Time of this Parliament was one John Bodby, a Taylor, of the Diocese of Worcester, convicted before Thomas, Arch-bishop of Can- terbury of Heresie, and obstinately persisting in the same, because he had been convened before his Diocesan, and being admonish'd to leave his Erroneous Opinions, neither did, nor as yet would forsake them, and therefore was carried to Smithfield, and there burnt in a Pipe or Tun to Ashes. Henry, the Prince of Wales, was present at this Execution, and much compassionating his Sufferings, was very desirous to have saved him, offering him a Pardon if he would recant his Errors before the Fire was kindled;
 but he refusing, was tied to the Stake, and the Fire made about him. As soon as he felt the Flames he cried out most hedecously; which when the Prince heard, he caused the Fire to be put out, and then exhorted him again to renounce his Errors, and he should be saved;
 and since the Fire had made him Impotent, he promised him Three Pence a Day out of the King's Treasury, as long as he lived; but the Holy Man recovering his Spirits, deny'd the Prince's Offers; and being put into the Fire again, was burnt to Ashes: With miraculous Constancy, sealing the Doctrines he had resolutely maintained with his Death.

 The Duke of Burgundy intending to make a second and more effectual Attempt to take Cal- lis for his Master the French King, (1) had brought down to St. Omers many Engines and Provisions for that End. The English Garrison at Callis were so much the more fearful of this Siege, because the Duke was enraged for his last ill Success against it; and had now resolved, either to take it, or utterly demolish it;
 for which Purpose he had brought thither many strange Engines newly invented, and laid them up in the Abby there, till all things were ready for the Siege. The Callisians had a watchful Eye upon the Duke's Motions; and their Fears suggested Methods to avoid the Danger, and disappoint his cruel Purpose: For hiring a young Man, who was both subtle and desperate, with a large Sum of Money to enter the Town of St. Omers and set it on fire; he did it so privately, that he escaped himself unsuspected, and burnt down, not only the Abby
 wherein the Duke's Provision and Ammunition lay, but the greatest part of the Town perished in the Flames, and so the Duke's Charge, as well as Aim was lost, and the Callisians preserv'd.

Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Surrey died. The A. D.
1410. Citizens fell under the King's Displeasure for Reg. 11. quarrelling with the Prince's servants, attending their Master at a Feast in Eastcheap, and the Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen were sent for; but it appearing, that the Mayor had done his Duty in suppressing the Disorder, and punishing the Offenders, the King pardon'd them, and so dismissed them. This Year also he laid the Foundation of a College at Battle-field in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Peirce, surnamed Hotspur, and his Uncle, in grateful thanks to God for that Victory, it being by far the strongest Rebellion that was raised against him all his Reign; and through the Courage and Conduct of the Leaders most likely to succeed, which was the Motive to the King of building this College of Praise to God.

Robert Humphreyle, Knight, Vice-Admiral Reg. 12. of England being employ'd against the Scots with Ten able Ships of War, much infested the Coasts of that Nation; and entering the Forth, or Frith of Edinburgh he lay there fourteen Days, and landing every Day on one side of the River or other, took great Spoils, and many Prisoners; notwithstanding the Duke of Albany, and Earl Douglas lay with a considerable Body of Men upon the Shore to prevent their IncurSIONS. At his Departure he burnt the Galliot of Scotland, a Vessel of great Account with them, and many other Vessels, and brought away with him fourteen good Ships laden with Prizes of Cloath, both Woollen and Linnen, Pitch, Tar, Woad, Flower, Rye, and Wheat Meal, with which he so well fur-nish'd our Markets at home with Plenty, that Corn grew much cheaper, and the Poor much loved and admired him, giving him the Name of Robert Mend-market, in token of the Good he had done them, and with a Desire that it should be an eternal Honour to his Name, That whereas others made it their Business to raise Markets, he had in Charity to them beat them down. And thus he was called Mend-market in both Kingdoms; for in Scotland he had got himself that Name, by falling upon the Town of Peebles on the Market-day, and selling the Cloaths he had taken from the Traders at cheap Rates by their Bows for a Measure to the Country People, and then burning the Town.
 Shortly after his Return from Sea, he made an Inroad into Scotland by Land, with his Nephew,
Gilbert Hunsfrevile, Earl of Angus, and burnt
Jedworth, with the greatest part of Trivdale.
 This Year died 14000 of the Bloody-flux at Burdeaux, and a proportionable Number in the Provinces of Gascoigne and Guienne, whereby the Country was so much dispeopled, that there wanted Men to dress their Vines, and press

 Care and Diligence, that in a little time no Pirate dared to appear, nor any Merchant feared any Danger. But this Success which brought so much Safety and Gain to others, proved a Misfortune to themselves; for their Enemies envying the Honour and Favour which they had deservedly merited, accused them as the

1412. This Year the Guild-Hall in the City of London, which was but a mean Cottage before, was made a stately Building by the Mayor and Aldermen at the Charge of the City. And the Company of Grocers laid the Foundation of their Hall upon a piece of Ground, which they purchased for three hundred and twenty Mark in Cumhope-Lane. Also Rice ap Dee an Esquire of Wales, who had joined with Owen Glendour in Rebellion against the King, was brought up to London, and there drawn, hang'd and quartered for his Crime.

The cruel War between the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy in France. This Summer broke out the furious Factions of the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy in France, by which the whole Kingdom was involved in the Troubles of a Civil-War: The Occasion is said to be this. The Duke of Orleans, a Prince not only of great Courage, but of an equal Ambition, seeing the present King his Brother to be a Person unfit for Government, because of the Fits of Frenzy to which he was subject, and often fell into, was desirous to have gotten the Throne for himself; and having contrived with the Queen to remove the Dauphin, and convey him into Germany to her Brother the Duke of Bavaria, intended to persuade the Pope, who in the Schism sat at Avignon, Benedict XIII., to depose the present King, as Pope Zachary did King Chilperick. The Duke of Burgundy, the King's Uncle, who had married his Daughter to the Dauphin, was not insensible of the Duke of Orleans's ambitious Aims; and as he kept the Dauphin out of the Snares, so he laboured by all means to countermine his other Practices; but fearing least at length through his great Interests and Policy he might prevail, he hired certain Persons to murder him, which was soon after done in Paris, near the Barbet-Gate. This Cruelty being committed in the Night, the Actors were not known, but the Duke of Burgundy was vehemently suspected, and when after his Burial inquiry was made about the Murderers, the Duke fled, and confirmed all the Suspicions concerning him. He remained some Months about Antwerp; yet being again reconciled to the King, and invited to the Court, he became as much in Favour as ever: But still retaining his

A. D. 1412. Reg. 12. Enmity to the Duke of Orleans's Family, he much discountenanced all his Friends, and put some of them out of their Places, and others to Death. Charles, Duke of Orleans, Son of the murdered Duke Lewis, being daily burdened with the Miseries and Complaints of his Party, began to harbour angry and malicious Resentments against the Duke; and as it often happens, that new Discontents revive the Memory of old Injuries, he became very hot and zealous to revenge the Death of his Father upon the Duke of Burgundy, which would seem to all the World a just and reasonable Cause of making War upon him, since he had not only escaped Justice, but as if it had been a meritorious Act, was in as great Favour as ever. Before he would appear in Arms he consulted with his Friends, and great Relations, the Dukes of Berry, Burbon and Alençon, Kings of Navarre and Aragon, and the Earls of Albert, Richemont, Armeniac, and divers other Nobles and great Persons, who approving his Design, and promising him their Assistance, encouraged him to go on in the Attempt. The Duke of Burgundy saw the Storm growing over his Head, and though he had the King and Dauphin on his side, yet he despaired of being able to withstand the contrary Faction, and therefore begged the Assistance of King Henry. There had been a Motion a little before made in the Court of France, for a Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the French King's Daughter, (m) which was an Encouragement to the Duke to address himself to King Henry, hoping by the Promises of the Marriage, and other large Proffers to engage him to his Assistance; and for that End he sent an Embassy into England. King Henry received the Embassadors honourably, but told them, 'That the Duke of Orleans did only prosecute a just Revenge for his Father's Blood, and therefore was not to be fought with, but appeased, and therefore he thought it reasonable, that he should be tendered all suitable Satisfaction, which yet if he refused to accept, then he would lend him all convenient Assistance; and so dismissed them to their Master with hopes of Aid, but with an Obligation to try all Methods of making a peaceable Conclusion of the Quarrel.

King Henry after their Departure considering, that this Civil Dissention in France might prove of good Advantage to him; and tho' it would not look well in him to encourage a Murderer openly, yet it would be impolitic to neglect his own Interests; sent into France twelve hundred Archers and Spearmen, under the Command of the Earl of Arundel, Gilbert Hunnfreville, Earl of Angus, and Sir Robert Hunnfreville his Uncle, Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, Sir John Grey, and William Porter to join with the Duke of Burgundy, if they saw occasion. They took Ship at Dover, and landed at Sluis, from whence by easie and careless marches they came to Arras, where the Duke of Burgundy lay with fifteen thousand Flemmings and Picards. The coming of the English was as welcome as unexpected; and the Duke having by many Kindnesses and Courtships oblig'd them to join with him, marched with them to Paris, where they arrived October the 23d, in the Evening. The Duke of Orleans with the main Body of his Army lay at St. Dennis, and with a small part of it kept the Town of St. Clou, which held Communication with the Grand

A.D. 1412. Reg. 13. Army by a Bridge over the Saine. The English soon after their Arrival, not willing to lie still, undertook the Siege of St. Clou, and on November the 9th, by a sharp Fight won it, slaying and drowning nine hundred Men of their Enemies, which were set to keep the Bridge, and taking 400 Prisoners, besides 1200 Horses, and great Spoil, which they found in the Town. The Duke of Burgundy partly to encourage the English, but chiefly to gratifie his revengeful Temper, purchased the Captives of the English, and among them Sir Manserd de Bos, a valiant Captain: The English glad of the Money sold all their Prisoners, not suspecting the Duke's Design; but when they saw, that contrary to the Law of Arms which secures the Lives of Prisoners, and permits their Ransom, he put many of the Chief to Death, they were much troubled, and repented of the Deed in selling them; and though they could not then help it, yet afterward they took this occasion to shew their Repentments of it to the Duke, and how ungenerous and unmanlike an Action it was: Within a few Days the Armies of the two Dukes had a Skirmish, and the English having again the upper-hand got a great many Prisoners, which the Duke of Burgundy, not having Money or Will to redeem, endeavoured to perswade the English to put them to Death, as Enemies to their Country: But the Earl of August and the English Men boldly replied. That they would not be guilty of such a breach of the Law of Arms, as he had been, and would rather die themselves, than any of their Prisoners should, but they would keep them for Ransome, and so they were secured from the Duke of Burgundy's Cruelty. After this Engagement the Duke of Orleans's Party finding themselves too weak for the Burgundians, withdrew themselves into the mountainous Parts of the Country, and dar'd not for the present appear openly against the Enemy; whereupon the Duke of Burgundy supposing himself able to keep them down, and to have no further need of the English, sent them home with large Rewards, and equal Thanks for their help.

Tenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

While these Things were transacting in France, King Henry assembled his Parliament on All-Saints-Day at Westminster: In it the two Principal Matters that were enacted, were, 1. About the Coin of the Nation, which being much embased by foreign Money, or other base Pieces was grown scrupulous and not current; whereupon a Law was made to forbid a certain bad Coin, called then, Gally-half-pence, which were still used, notwithstanding they had been prohibited in a former Act in the Eleventh Year of this King, and all foreign Money, as well of Scotland as of other Nations. 2. About Riots, and other seditious Assemblies. It seems, that King Richard's Ghost haunted this King to his dying Day. The People were never thoroughly satisfied, but Tumults threatened his Peace very often: Wherefore it was enacted, That all Justices of Peace should have a very strict Eye upon his Subjects, to prevent all riotous Meetings, and Sheriffs be as watchful to suppress them; which if they neglected, they should each of them forfeit a Hundred Pound to the King for every Neglect, or Offence in this Kind. There was no Tax given this Parliament; but the King so well managed the Business of the Coin, which needed Reformation, and was encouraged by Act of Parliament, that he raised as good a Fund by it; for partly by seizing the Forfeited Money, and partly by coining new Nobles, which he made a Groat lighter than formerly they had been, he much enriched his own Treasury; and so as he had no Tax, so he wanted none. Soon after the rising of this Parliament, the King made his Sons, the Lord Thomas of Lancaster, who was Lord Steward of England, and Earl of Aumerl, Duke of Clarence, John, Duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and his Brother, Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorset.

A.D. 1412. Reg. 13. Some new Creations of Noble Men.

John, Duke of Burgundy being now free from the Opposition of the Party of the Duke of Orleans, governed all at Court at his Pleasure; and having possessed the King, that it was not his own Cause, but the Crown, that was in Dispute, for all that he had done to the Duke of Orleans was only to secure the Kingdom against his ambitious Aims, was allowed to prosecute the Duke of Orleans and his Complices with the utmost Malice and Rigour, than which nothing was more agreeable to his Temper, as it was for his Interests, and he did not spare to act what he judged would be grateful to either. The Party of the Duke of Orleans being thus heavily oppressed, had no other Refuge left for their Relief but the King of England, who tho' he had been engaged for the Duke of Burgundy, yet his Army being sent Home, and that not very fairly, though with a French Civility, they hoped, that as he was free from all Obligations to assist the Duke of Burgundy, so by fair and advantageous Proposals they might win him over to them, and by that means rescue themselves from their Enemy's Hands. With this Confidence they dispatched over into England, Albert Aubemont, a Man of great Wit, Learning and Courage, and some other Persons as their lawful Procurators, who might in the Name of all the Confederates, of whom the Chief were, John, Duke of Berry, Charles, Duke of Orleans, Valois, Earl of Blois, Beaumont, Lord of Coucy and Ach, John, Duke of Bourbon, John, Duke of Alençon, Bernard, Earl of Arminiack, and others, tender these following Articles and Covenants, viz. 'That if the King of England, as Lord of Guien would defend and succour them against all Men, which as their Sovereign (n) Lord he ought to do, especially, until they had executed Justice upon the Duke of Burgundy for the Death of the Duke of Orleans, recovered the Goods which the said Duke and his Fautors had taken from them, had due Satisfaction for all Damages done by them to their Friends, Vassals or Subjects, and a firm Peace, so far as was possible, were concluded and established between both the Realms of England and France, then they promised, covenanted and agreed, That they would serve the King of England, his Heirs and Successors, with their Bodies, Lands and Finances, Castles, Towns, Treasures and Goods, in all Just Causes and Actions, without Impeachment to their Allegiance, which they knew he desired not; That he should and might bestow their Sons and Daughters, Nephews and Nieces, and all other their Kindred in Marriage as he pleased; That their Friends, Allies and Well-wishers, which were the greatest part of the

The Duke of Orleans and his Party solicited the King's Aid.

(n) The Dukes of Berry and Orleans, and the Count D'Armagnac, had by other Articles engaged to hold the Counties, Pombieu, Angoleme, Perigori, and some other Places by Homage and Fealty of King Richard, and to have them for Life only.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13. Nobles of France, Church-men, and chief Citizens should be always at his Service; That they would put him in Possession of the Dukedom of Guien, which they were ready to protest, did now as truly belong to the King of England, with all its Liberties and Franchises, as had done to any of his Majesty's Predecessors; and would recognise their Lands in that Dutchy to hold of him, and do all the usual Homages and Services to him for them: That as much as in them lay, they would deliver to him all the Towns and Castles which were in their Hands, and did anciently belong to the Kings of England, and assist him to recover the rest out of the Hands of their Enemies, only desiring, that the Duke of Berry might hold the County of Ponthieu during his Life, and the Duke of Orleans the County of Angoulesme for Life, and County of Perigord for ever, and the Earl of Arminiack four Castles upon such Conditions and Sureties, as should be agreed on between them.

K. Henry's Answer to the D. of Orleans's Messengers. King Henry having received these Proposals, gave the Messengers a kind and civil Entertainment; and consulting with his Privy-Council about their Message, who unanimously resolved, that it would be both for his Honour and Profit to assist these Lords, and so to uphold the Faction, which otherwise would soon be subdued, he gave them this Answer; 'That being their natural Sovereign he was sensible of his Obligation to protect and defend them his Vassals and Subjects; and to this he was the more inclined, not only because he had found the Duke of Burgundy a false and deceitful Man, who was forward to entice Men by fair Promises to his Friendship, but never performed more than was to serve his own turn; but chiefly because it was the Office of a King to help such as cried unto him for Justice, which they could not otherwise have, as he looked upon this Occasion chiefly to be; for he evidently saw, that the shameful Murder of the Duke of Orleans (which he could never think on without the deepest Horror and Detestation) could never be revenged, but by such Methods as they now were taking: And therefore they might assure the Lords, that he would not be defective in the Duty of a Prince, but would send them speedily such a Force, as should be able to defend them against all Men, and so sent them Home with Satisfaction to their Masters.

The Siege of Bourges. These Things were not so secretly acted between the King of England, and Duke of Orleans's Party, but that it was known in the French Court; and to prevent any Assistance that might come to the Lords that way, the Earl of St. Paul was sent down into Picardy with fifteen hundred Horse-Men, and a great Number of Foot to prevent the landing of the English; or if that could not be, to detain them in raising the Siege of Guisnes, which they sat down before, and the Duke of Burgundy in the mean time pursued the Party of the Duke of Orleans, called Arminiack; and having won many Towns, at last drove them into Bourges in Berry, and there closely besieged them. In the City were the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon, the Earl of Auxerre, Arch-Bishop of Sens and Bourges, Bishops of Paris and Chartres, with other great Men, and fifteen hundred Soldiers well armed, and four hundred Archers: Among the Besiegers were the King himself, the Dauphin, Dukes of Burgundy and Barr, with many other Nobles: The Duke of Berry was very desirous of a Peace, because his Country was wasted, and the Besieged declared, That they had no Quarrel with the King or Dauphin, but were Enemies only to the Duke of Burgundy's Ambition and Cruelty; and therefore in their Sallies cried out, God save the King: The Dauphin, who was next Heir to the Crown, knowing his Father was unable through his Frenzical Disease to judge of the Miseries of his Country, was much disturbed at Affairs, and told the Duke of Burgundy, Things should not be long so; The Nation should not be Sacrificed to his Passions or Humour: And therefore resolved immediately to make Peace. These Words no sooner dropped from the Dauphin, but they were eagerly caught up by Two considerable Men in the French King's Camp, viz. Philip de Lignac, Lord great Master of Rhodes, and the Marshal of the Duke of Savoy, who was sent by his Master with some others to labour a Peace between both Parties. These Men knew very well from the Duke of Berry, how well the Besieged were disposed to Peace, and immediately upon the Dauphin's Words began to negotiate a Treaty between them, which was soon brought about; and though the Duke of Burgundy much feared, that what was a Peace to others, would be a War to him, yet he appeared as forward as any to make up the Breach, which in a little time was concluded, and was called from the Place, The Peace of Bourges. It was sealed July the 15th, and the King entered the City the same Day. While these Things passed at Bourges, the English under the Command of the Duke of Clarence, Edward, Duke of York, and Thomas, Earl of Dorset, which were sent by King Henry to assist the Duke of Orleans, being eight thousand Knights and Men of Arms, and a thousand Archers, arrived in Normandy. The Earl of St. Paul was not present to oppose their landing, being beaten from Guisnes, and withdrawn to St. Quintins. The Duke of Orleans had promised to meet them at their Arrival, but neglecting it, they fell to plundering the Country for their Sustenance and Pay, till the Duke of Orleans came down and made an Agreement with them, and so they withdrew into Aquitaine; the Duke of Clarence taking of him his Brother John, Duke of Angoulesme as a Pledge for the 200000 Francks, which were further to be paid to the King towards the Charges of this Expedition.

But as War was the Disturbance of the French Court, so Peace seems a little to have corrupted the English; for Prince Henry being eased from the Employment of the Welsh Wars, and being a Person of an active and brisk Spirit, who could do nothing moderately, fell as eagerly upon the Sports and Pleasures, which usually debase the Minds of Youth in times of Ease and Leisure, as he had been bold and adventurous in warlike Attempts. He kept a Court different from his Father, being of Man's Years, and able to move in a Sphere of such Greatness, as might become the Heir of a Crown, in which Station he maintained a Princely Port and Magnificence; but being a little over-indulgent turned them into vicious Excesses: So that his Court was counted a Paradise for Voluptuaries, where was an uncontrollable Enjoyment of all carnal Pleasures; and Venus and Ceres had routed out Mars and Bellona. His Palace was like a Camp, for multitudes of Persons that flocked thither, either to please

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13. please the Prince's Genius, or gratifie their own, and as if he had put off the Nature of a Hero, which he once seemed to affect, he like a second Sardanapalus delighted in the Company of effeminate Persons; and pleased himself more in Dancings and Musick, Revellings, and mad Maskings, than he had ever done in the Manlike Feats of Arms. This Change in a Prince of such promising Hopes was very amusing to the Considerate, who silently lamented the Eclipse of such Virtues, as aimed so bright lately in him, and did not pare to say, That they must expect no great Happiness under such a corrupted Prince. But though the Prince's irregular Behaviour was manifest enough to others, yet it seems either not known to the King himself, or else to be winked at by him: For though he affronted his Chief Justice on the Bench, by striking him on the Face, because he had condemned One of his Companions for breaking the Peace, and abusing a grave Citizen, for which the Judge committed him to Prison; yet he so pleased his Father by his Submission to the law, that he rejoiced equally that he had in Impartial Judge, and an Obedient Son: So that he looked upon this Action, rather as a youthful Prank, or an effect of his Passion, than as prejudicial to himself or Realm; till some, who were about him, and being the Prince's Enemies, by their frequent Discourses of the Prince and his course of Life, buzzed clear different Thoughts concerning him into the King's Head: For having a Desire to ingratiate themselves into the King's Favour, by misrepresenting the Prince's Behaviour, they not only complained to the King of his Lewdness and Excesses, but insinuated into him, that though he drew such a Multitude about him under a shew of Sports and Pastimes, yet he carried on a secret Design of deposing his Father, and extorting his Scepter out of his Hand. These Suggestions easily found Entertainment in the King's Breast, to whom Jealousie was now become natural, being frequently frightened with Fears of losing his Crown, and he did not conceal his Resentments; for he did not only shew an aversion to the Prince in his Carriage, but removed him from being President of his Council, and put his Brother John into his Place. The Prince not having received the Cause of this Change from his Father's Mouth, seemed to bear it with an even Mind, as being always contented to submit to his Royal Pleasure, and went on without any Concern in his usual Sports and Pastimes, as not conscious of any real Guilt, though he was sensible enough what he was accused of; but in the meantime he expostulated by Letter with his Accusers, convincing them how slanderous their Accusations of him were, and how vast a wrong he had suffered by their injurious Abuses of him to his Father, whose Favour as he valued more than his Kingdom, so he could never enjoy an Happiness in the midst of the most flourishing State without it. This way of clearing himself, though it rectified the Opinions of the Generality, yet so long as his Accusers had his Father's Ear, did him no Service, as to Recovery of his Father's Favour; and therefore to do that, he made use of an unusual Stratagem, which was this: Having provided himself with a rich Sattin Suit of Cloaths, which he caused to be made full of Eylet-holes of black Silk, the Needle hanging at every Hole, he put it on, and on his Arm he wore an Hound's Collar set full of SS of Gold, with Tyrets of the same Mettal: Being thus apparelled, he with a mighty train of Nobles and Gentry went to his Father's Palace at Westminster; where having entered the Hall, and given a strict Command to all that attended him, not to go further than the Fire-place, he desired to be admitted into his Father's Presence, which was without delay granted him; and though the King at that time was Ill, he caused himself to be set in his Chair, and carried into the Presence-Chamber to receive him. When the Prince was come before his Father, he was commanded to declare the Cause of his coming, and especially in that strange Garb. Then the Prince kneeling down said, 'Most dread Sovereign, and dear Father, I am at this time come into your Presence to declare my self your Dutiful Subject and Son, in all things obedient to your Commands; which though I have ever been careful in my Behaviour never to render suspected, yet since by the false Suggestions of bad Men and crafty Flatterers, your Majesty hath been induced to suspect my Affections toward you, and to fear, that my Heart is not rightly disposed towards your Highness, I am come to rectify your Misapprehensions concerning me, and give you a convincing Proof of my Loyalty to you. My natural Relation to your Highness obliges me so strictly to take care of your Happiness and Safety, that if I knew any one Person in your Kingdom, whose Obedience were justly suspected, and of whom you deservedly stood in fear I should use my utmost Endeavours to have him punished, and as much as is possible remove those Fears and Jealousies from your Mind, which render your Life very uncomfortable and uneasy: Now then, since I have been so unfortunate, as through my imprudent Carriage, though not designedly, yet foolishly and ungratefully to raise some Suspicions in your Mind, that you are in eminent danger of your Life and Crown from me and my Practices, I here tender my Life as forfeited to your Majesty for giving you Cause to suspect me of Disloyalty, and do beseech you to take such Revenge of my Person, as may remove all Jealousie of me from your Heart, and restore you again to the Quiet and Ease of an undisturbed Mind. I have this Day by the Christian Preparation of an humble Confession, and receiving the Sacrament, fitted my self to suffer Death, and be made a just sacrifice to your Wrath; and I humbly beg of your Majesty, that you would make this Dagger (which I now give you) an Instrument of easing my Grief and your Fears, by thrusting it into my Heart; for it is as little Comfort to me to enjoy Life, while I remain under your Displeasure, and am the Cause of your Fears and Troubles, as it can be to you to have such an undutiful Son, as you are jealous of. I am, ever was, and will be your dutiful Servant and Vassal, and desire not Life longer than I am thought so by your Majesty; and if you can't entertain such Thoughts concerning me as I deserve, I desire you to rid me of that Life which must ever be a burthen to me, while I remain in those unhappy Circumstances: And if you shall vouchsafe to do it, I do here in the Presence of your Nobility, fully and freely forgive you, and will in the Presence of God and all his Angels, at the last Judgment acquit you

Prince Henry accused of Disloyalty to his Father, and his Stratagem to clear himself.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 13. you of the Guilt of my Blood. The King hearing these Words was much moved with Affection towards his Son; and was so fully convinced of the Prince's Loyalty, that he blamed his own Credulity, not his Behaviour, confessing, that he had indeed entertained Suspitions of him, but (as he now saw) without Cause, and therefore promised him upon his Honour never to harbour any Jealousies for the future concerning him. The Prince having thus escaped the Danger he was in, desired that his Accusers might be obliged to answer their false Calumnies against him, and be punished for their Faults, though not so fully as their Crime deserved: But the King replied, 'That he must stay till the Parliament met, and then they should be judged by their Peers: Which as it satisfied the Prince, so it served to put off the Discovery of them, for being delay'd it was forgotten.

K. Henry's Acts of Piety, and Expedition to the Holy-Land. King Henry being perfectly reconciled to his Son lived in great Satisfaction and Ease of Mind, having Peace both at Home and Abroad, and spent his Time in Acts of Charity and Piety, and in providing for the Safety and Welfare of his People. He built a College at Fotheringhay in Northamptonshire, which his Son Henry afterwards endowed with certain Lands which he took from the Friar's Aliens: And because the Nation was much annoyed with Pirates, he sent Sir John Pen-dergrace with thirty Ships to scour the Seas, who by his Courage and Diligence did great Service to the Commons, not only by causing a free Commerce, but by taking many Prizes of Wine and Corn, by the Sale of which he brought great Plenty into the Nation. But the greatest piece of Piety of those Days was accounted to rescue Jerusalem out of the Hands of the Infidels; who being Enemies to Christ, contemptuously treated the Sepulcher of our Saviour, and grievously abused the Christians and Churches of that Holy City. It much troubled the King, that the Christian Princes whose Arms might have better been employed against the Turks and Infidels, were at War among themselves; and because it was foretold him, that he should die at Jerusalem, he hoped that he might be an Instrument of freeing it from the Oppression of the Turks, and was very desirous to try his Fate against them, and for this end he called a great Council at London to get all things ready for that Expedition, and by it it was ordered, that several Ships and Gallies should be built, and other necessary Things got ready.

Reg. 14. The English Forces which remained still in Aquitain after the Agreement made between the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, spent their Time in spoiling and plundering the Frontiers of the French Dominions, from whence they took much Prey and Prisoners, which they carried into Burdeaux. The French being angry at these Depredations and Inroads of the English, sent the Lord Helie, one of the Marshals of France with an Army of four thousand Men to besiege one of the Fortresses of Guien, which Sir John Blunt being Governor of, kept with three hundred Men only, who behaved themselves with such Bravery and Courage, that they drove them from the Town, took twelve Noble Men, one hundred and twenty Gentlemen, and several other Prisoners. The Marshal himself was taken and sent over into England to the King, who imprisoned him at Wisbich; but he escaped from thence a little after, and got into France, where he served the Duke of Orleans at the Battel of Agincourt, and was slain there.

A. D. 1412. Reg. 14. The King kept his Christmas this Year at Eltham, being very sick of a kind of Apopleck Distemper, in which by Fits he was thought to be dead; but it pleased God that he a little recovered, and passed the latter part of the Christmas in some Pleasure till Candemas, when according to his Summons the Parliament met at Westminster. The Design of this Session seems to have been no other, but to furnish him with Money for his Voyage into the Holy Land, which he intended to begin at the Rise of the Spring, all things being ready for it. But God prevented his Design by a Relapse into his former Distemper: For being worshipping at St. Edward's Shrine to take his leave in order to his Journey, he was so violently seized with another Fit of his Apoplexy, that all the Standards by thought he would have died presently; but being removed into a Chamber belonging to the House of the Abbot of Westminster, and laid in a Pallat before the Fire, by the Warmth of that, and the Application of proper Remedies, he at length recovered his Senses and Speech again. After he had lain some time he enquired where he was, because he perceived himself to be in a strange Place, and was told he was in a Chamber of the Abbots of Westminster. He then asked them whether the Chamber had any particular Name, and they said, It was called the Jerusalem; whereupon he said, 'That then he should die there, because he was long since told, that he should die in Jerusalem, and accordingly he made suitable Preparations for his Death. And first calling for the Prince, he had several Discourses with him, as his Sicknes would give him leave. He said to him, 'That he had great Fears, that after his Death his Brother the Duke of Clarence would contend with him for the Crown, because he is a Man of an ambitious Spirit, and daring Courage, and would reach at the highest Dignity, by which the Nation would fall into great Miseries, and when I think of this I repent me, that I ever meddled with the Kingdom. The Prince answered to these Words, 'That it was his earnest Prayers to God, that his Majesty might long continue with them to rule them both; but if God hath so ordered, that he should succeed him in the Government of this Realm, he would honour and love his Brethren above all Men, so long as they continued true and faithful Subjects; but if any of them should conspire or rebel against him, he would execute Justice upon them with as much Severity, as upon any of his other Subjects. The King hearing this Answer rejoiced greatly at his Son's Resolution and Courage, and not doubting, but that it would establish him in his Throne, he proceeded to give him certain Admonitions to be observed by him in his Regal Dignity, and said, 'My Son, when it shall please God to call me out of this World to go the way of all Flesh, to thee as my Son and Heir I shall leave my Crown and Realm, and I advise thee not to take it as an Honour to puff up thy Mind with Pride, but as a Burthen and Charge to provide for the Good and Safety of all Persons in

A.D. 1413. Reg. 14. 'in the Realm: For as the Heart in the midst 'of the Body administers Heat and Nourish'ment to the whole, so must a King in his 'Realm provide for the Good and Safety of 'all. Let it then be thy continual Care to 'administer all Things well for the encourage'ment of Virtue and Diligence, and the Pu'nishment of Vice and Sin, and then thy Peo'ple will be obedient to thee, and ready at 'all times to assist thee: Go before thy Peo'ple in true Piety and Devotion, and what
'thou wouldest have thy Subjects be, be thou
'first thy self, for thy Example will make thy
'Subjects count it an Honour to be Good.
'Fear God, and dread him above all Things.
'Be zealous for his Worship, and discounte-
'nance all Atheism and Profaneness. Ascribe
'all thy Fortunate Actions to him, and let 'him have the Praise of whatever Good be'falls thee, as Victory over thy Enemies, the 'Fidelity of thy Friends, Obedience of thy 'Subject, Greatness of thy Power, Riches and 'Honour, and Number of thy Children. Think
'not thy own Desert, but God's Goodness
'the Cause of all these Things to thee. But 'above all things, administer Justice equally
'and impartially; for the Wealth of thy Body
'and Soul and of thy Kingdom depends upon
'the due Execution of it. Defer not to do 'Justice till to Morrow, if thou canst do it
'to Day, least God for thy unjust Delays do
'Justice on thee in the mean time, and take
'thine Authority from thee. Punish Bribery
'severely, relieve the Oppressed, zealously vin'dicate the Wronged, protect the Religious,
'and love the Virtuous: So shalt thou obtain
'the Favour of God, and Love of thy Sub'jects, and have a flourishing and prosperous
'Reign here upon Earth, and an everlasting
'Reward in Heaven. The King having given his Son this Advice dismissed him with his Blessing; and not long after finding himself to grow every Moment almost Weaker, he caused the Crown to be set upon his Pillow, at his Bed's Head, that when he died, his Son
the Prince might have it, as his right Heir.
His Fits at length followed him very close;
and that so severely, that he was often thought to be dead, and in one of them the Prince came and took the Crown from his Pillow to secure it: But he recovered again, and as he was accustomed in every interval to look for his Crown, so he again called for it, and asked who had got it? When the Prince was said to have taken it, he commanded him to come before him, and with some Smartness said to him, 'Son, why dost
'thou thus misuse me? To whom the Prince replied with an undaunted Boldness; 'Sir,
'to me, and all Men present you seemed dead
'in this World; wherefore I as your next
'Heir Apparent took it as my own, and 'not as yours; but since I claim no Right to
'it, but from and after your Decease, there'fore I restore it to you again, and God
'Almighty give you many Days to enjoy it.
Then the King replied. 'Well fare you with 'it, my Son, and sighing added: 'What right
'I had to it God knoweth. 'Well, said the 'Prince, if you die King, I will inherit the 'Crown, and trust I shall keep it with the 'Sword against all my Enemies, as you have 'done. Then said the King, I commit all to God, and advise you to do well: And so turning to the Wall, he shortly after gave up the Ghost on St. Cuthbert's Day, March the 20th, A.D. 1413. Reg. 14. in the Forty Six Year of his Age, when he had reigned Thirteen Years Five Months and One and Twenty Days; and being carried by Water to Faversham, his Corps was magnificently Entombed at Canterbury.

He was a Person of a middle Stature, but well Proportioned and Compact, and had much greater Endowments of Mind than Body; for he was very Wise and Politick, exceeding Bold and Courageous, and yet withal very Merciful and Pitiful, choosing rather by saving the Lives of his Enemies to make them his Friends, than by destroying them, to rid himself of his Fears. He was forced to execute several Persons, and that of Note, for their rebellious Attempts against him; but his Mercy to the Earl of Northumberland is a sufficient Demonstration, that not Cruelty, but Necessity obliged him to punish his mutinous Subjects; and if they would have ever amended, he would have forgiven them. He indeed was never loved, though he was really a very good Prince; because the Occasions of State required great Taxes, and People never love to buy even their own Happiness dear: Besides, the badness of his Title to the Crown was never forgotten; and though Mortimer was not much regarded, yet all his Kindness could never patch up that Breach, so much as to make him be loved, as he really deserved. In fine, in him we have an evident Proof of the People's Inconstancy, whose Affections are fierce, but never lasting. He came in with their Applause, because he saved them from the Miseries of the former Reign; but he could never keep their Love, because his Troubles created them much Charge, though they were no other than the necessary Consequences of yielding to their Desires; yet Fortune so attended all his Undertakings, that he died a Victor over all his Enemies Abroad and at Home, and laid the Foundation of his Son's Greatness, in whose Reign the English Power was got to its highest Pitch and Greatness.

He left a numerous Issue, viz. four Sons and two Daughters, but all by his first Wife the Lady Mary, the Daughter and Co-heir of Humphrey Bohun, Earl of Hereford, who died before her Husband came to the Crown; for he had no Issue by his second Wife, Joanna de Navar, the Widow of John de Mountfort, Duke of Brittain.

His eldest Son Henry, whom in his Lifetime he made Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester, was appointed his Successor in the Throne, and accordingly reigned after him, and proved the Glory of our English Kings,
as in his Life will appear.

His second Son Thomas Plantagenet, he made and left him Duke of Clarence. He married
Margaret, the Daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, and Widow of John Beaufort, Earl of Pomfrait. He was slain at Bosny-Bridge in France by the Duke of Orleans, and died without Children. (o)

His third Son John he made Duke of Bedford, Earl of Richmond, and Lord of Kendal.
He had two Wives, viz. Ann, the Daughter of John, Duke of Burgundy, and Joqueline, the Daughter of Peter, Earl of St. Paul, who outlived him, and was afterwards married to Richard Woodville, Earl of Rivers, by whom she had one Daughter Elizabeth married afterwards to King Edward the Fourth, but he

(o) He had a natural Son, called John, the Bastard of Clarence.

A. D. 1413. had no Issue by either of them. He shewed great Valour in the French Wars, and dying at Paris was buried at Roan.
Reg. 14.

His fourth Son Humphrey, he created Duke of Gloucester. He was in very great Honour in his Nephew Henry the Sixth's Days, styling himself, Humphrey, by the Grace of God, Son, Brother and Uncle to Kings, Duke of Gloucester, Hennalt, Holland, Zealand, and Earl of Pembroke, Lord of Freezeland, Great Chamberlain of England, Protector of the Realm, and Defender of the Church of England. He had two Wives, but was unhappy in both of them, the one being divorced for a Pre-contract, and the other being Infamous for Sorcery and Poisoning, but was so far fortunate as to have no Issue by them. He was found murdered in his Bed at St. Edmunds-Bury in Suffolk, and was buried at St. Albans in Hertfordshire. (p)

His two Daughters, Blanch and Philippa, he married to Foreign Princes in his Life-time, viz. Blanch to the Duke of Bavaria, and Philippa to the King of Denmark, but both died without Issue.

(p) Neither the Duke of Bedford, nor the Duke of Gloucester were made Dukes by their Father, but by their Brother Henry the Fifth, in the Parliament at Licester, Anno 1414. Godw. Hen. 5. p. 41.

Reign of Henry the Fourth,

Are interwoven by

The Author in the Thread of the History : So there is nothing to be added to it in this Place, but some Account of the Illustrious Men, and the Men of Learning of his Time.

THE most Famous Warriors were Prince Henry, the Earl of Northumberland, Henry, Lord Percy surnamed Hotspur, his Son the Earl of Westmoreland, the Earl of Worcester, the Earl of Salisbury a Favourer of Wickliff's Doctrine, Sir Thomas Rokesby of York-shire, Sir Robert Umfreville Vice-Admiral, and Sir John Pendergrace.

Among the Men of Learning, the Chief, and he to whom the English-Tongue was more oblig'd than to all the Writers before him is, Jeoffrey Chaucer, a Man of Quality, Wit and Learning. He married Alice, Daughter to Thomas Chaucer, Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons in the Second Year of King Henry the Fifth. The Daughter of this Thomas married the Duke of Suffolk, and by this Match as well as her Father's Descent, the Family of Chaucer became ally'd to the Greatest Houses in England. He was the Father of the English Poësie. And the next is John Gower, of the Family of the Gowers of Sittenham in York-shire. He was Chaucer's Friend and Companion, and joined with him in his Endeavours to refine our Language, and give a Turn and Harmony to the English Verse, which were unknown to their Fore-fathers. The Learned before their Time used to write always in Latin or French; but they had made the English Tongue so Musical, and it was of its self so Significant, that it became common afterwards, and most Authors communicated their Thoughts in their Native Language, which wanted nothing of the Force, and as these Two Great Poets had Polish'd it, little of the Grace of the best of the Modern Languages. Besides these there flourished in other Professions,

Hugh Legate of Hertfordshire, he wrote Reflections on Boetius's Treatise de Consolatione.

Roger Allington, Chancellor of Oxford, a violent Enemy of the Wickliffs.

Nicholas Gorham, a Logician, the French King's Confessor.

Dr. Walter Disse, Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster, and to his Dutcheß Constance.

Thomas of Malden.

John Eclo of Herefordshire, a Franciscan Fryer.

Dr. Nicholas Halkingham of Norfolk, an Excellent Divine and Philosopher, Provincial of the Gray-Fryers.

Laurence Holbeck, who wrote a Hebrew Dictionary.

John Colton, Arch-Bishop of Armagh.

John of Marrie in Yorkshire, a Carmelite of Doncaster.

Richard Chefer of Norfolk, a Divine and an Augustine-Fryer.

John Lathbury, a Monk of Reading.

Nicholas Pontz.

Dr. Richard Scroop, Arch-Bishop of York. He wrote a Libel against King Henry, and was beheaded for Treason.

John Wrotham, Warden of the Carmelites in Calis.

John Colebie, a Monk of Norwich.

William Scroop, a zealous Wickliffist, he died in Prison. He was a Man of singular Piety and Learning.

Reginald Langham, a Monk of Norwich.

Altonus Dominicanus.

Thomas Palmer, Warden of the Black-Fryers in London.

Boston of Burry, who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church.

Thomas Peverell, Bishop of Worcester.

William Holm, a Monk and a Phylician.

John Botterel, a Logician.

Dr. Nicholas Baiard, Professor of Divinity at Oxford.

John Price, of Lilleshull in the West of England.

William Norton, a Franciscan Fryer of Coventry.

Nicholas Riston, who lamenting the Schism in the Church, occasion'd by the Antipopes, wrote a Treatise on that Subject, called, De tollendo Schismate.

John Walter, an Excellent Mathematician. He was bred at Winchester-School.

Thomas of New-market, Bishop of Carlisle.

William Angur, a Franciscan Fryer of Bridgewater.

Peter Russell, Provincial of the Gray-Fryers.

John Langton, a Carmelite-Fryer.

Robert Wantham, a Monk of Cernly in Dorsetshire. He wrote a Book in Verse of the Original and Signification of Words.

Richard Falshamb, a Monk of Norwich.

William Norton, a Fryer of Coventry.

Hugh Suth, a Black-Fryer, and a great Preacher.

Robert Wimbledein, a Famous Preacher.

In this King's Reign, the French Historian, John Froissard lived, and we have given him a Place here, because he resided sometime in England, and is very Particular in some Parts of our English History.

HENRY, surnamed of Monmouth, the Chief Town of the Shire of the same Name in Wales, and standing on the Banks of the River Wye, because he was born there, when his Father was Duke of Hereford, and resided in those Parts, entred upon the Throne of England after his Father King Henry the Fourth's Death, as his lawful Heir, and so by the Ancient Custome of the Nation, his Successor to his Crown and Dignity, the same Day that he died, viz. March 20. and was the next Day proclaim'd King by the Name of Henry V. He had given evident Proofs of his Love and Respect to Virtue and Learning, while he was at Oxford, under the Tuition of his Uncle, Cardinal Beaufort, then Chancellor of that University, in shewing a particular Favour to those that appear'd most Eminent for both, of whom he afterwards made Thomas Rudburn, Bishop of St. Davids, and John Carpenter, Bishop of Worcester, and of his unparallel'd Courage and Conduct in the Battel of Shrewsbury, and in the War which he maintain'd against Owen Glendour the Famous Welsh Rebel, whom he so often routed that he durst not shew himself against him, but lurking in Mountains and Woods perish'd with Hunger, for which he was receiv'd into the Regal Authority with an universal Joy and Desire, and like the Roman Emperor Titus, as the Delight of all Mankind. The Liberties which a little before his Father's Death, in times of Peace, he had allow'd himself, had brought no small Blemish upon his former good Inclinations and brave Actions, the Extravagancies of himself and Companions being an Indication to some, that he was wholly degenerated into Lewdness and Effeminacy; but as if all Men had foreseen, what after indeed came to pass, that the Change of his Condition would work as great an Alteration in the Manners of so Noble and Generous a Mind, and being become their King would be a New Man, they welcom'd him to the Throne with full Consent and Liking, interpreting his former Looseness, as nothing else but such a piece of Experience as Solomon thought fit to make of the Pleasures of the World, which he indulged himself in for a small time, that he might with the greater Aversion subscribe them with this Motto, Vanity and Vexation of Spirit, as he did indeed, and much sooner than that wiser Man.

The Nation's Submission to K. Henry and his Coronation.

The Nation being thus furnish'd with a King of such mighty Hopes, and though they had lost a good Father, yet believing themselves happier under his braver Son, began to give him more than usual Testimonies of their hearty Submission and Respect to him within three Days after he was made King; for the Nobles and Commons by an unpresidented Zeal came to pay him their Homage and swear Allegiance to him, which was before neither required nor payed till after the Coronation. The King gave them his hearty Thanks for their Good-will towards him, and exhorted them to continue their forward Endeavours for the Publick Prosperity, but would by no means accept of their Tenders till he was Crown'd, and had taken upon himself as serious Obligations to be a good King, as he could lawfully desire should be laid upon them to be Loyal Subjects: Saying, That he earnestly prayed that God would not suffer him to be Crowned, or admit him to the Government of the Nation, but as he should rule well for his Glory, and the Good and Prosperity of his Subjects; which if God did foresee that he should not do, he desired he would rather take him to his Mercy, than permit him to live and reign. This generous and virtuous Answer much raised their Admiration of their New King, and was a greater Obligation of their Love and Loyalty, than the most solemn Oaths could be, while they saw him more æmulous to be a good King, than to have them good Subjects: And that he might give his People all the Assurances of his real Intentions of ruling well he hasten'd his Coronation, which was celebrated with all the usual Solemnities upon Apr. 9. by Thomas Arundel, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and immediately after it he began such a Reformation both of himself and Court, as would be the surest Foundation of an happy Reign; for first summoning his old Companions and Servants together, who had been both his Associates and the Promoters of his former irregular Courses, he gave them such Rewards as was due for their former Services: Telling them, That if they would reform their Manners, as he had begun, and was resolved to hold on, they might continue in their Places, and should upon that Account be the more in his Favour, but if any of them would still persist in their Evil Actions, he forbade them his Court, and charged them upon pain of Death not to come within Ten Miles of any Place where he resided. (a) Having thus freed himself of his Vices, he provided himself of all things that might become a Virtuous King and Good Governour. He chose himself a Council of all the Gravest and Wisest Men of his Nobility, and made such Lawyers his Judges, as were as Eminent for their Integrity, as Knowledge. He sent out his Injuncti-

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1. ons to the Clergy, commanding them as they tender'd his Displeasure, not only to preach the Word of God diligently and sincerely to the People, but to be Examples of Piety and Holiness themselves, and into such Preferments as were in his Disposal at that Time, he put such Persons as were recommended to him by their Merit. The inferiour Magistrates he selected with great Care, as being the main Instruments of a Regular Government; employing such only as he knew to be Men of Loyal Principles, competent Knowledge in the Laws and Customs of the Realm, and of great Probity and Sobriety, who might be a Curb and Restraint to the People in the Commission of those Crimes which were too much practised in those Times, and threatned God's Judgments upon the Nation, viz. Common Swearing, Whoredom, Drunkenness and Perjury which he was resolved, as much as in him lay to root out, but was sensible, that nothing but good Magistrates could do it; for the best Laws will never be well executed, when the Officers, whose Place it is to see it done, are themselves the Notorious Violaters of them.

His Piety to King Richard's Body, and Charity to his Soul.

The King having thus provided for the Happiness of the Nation, began to shew his Disposition to Piety by a signal Act of Charity, as it was esteem'd in those Days to the Body of King Richard, to which it is said, he looked upon himself to be obliged upon this Account. His Father King Henry the Fourth, being in his Sickness touched in Conscience for the Sins he had been guilty of in deposing King Richard and consenting to his Death, had sent a solemn Embassy to the Pope to be pardoned for them, and in order to Absolution had been enjoyn'd this Penance. That since he had deprived King Richard of his bodily Life and earthly Honour, he should by the continual Prayers of the Church cause his Soul to live for ever in heavenly Glory. This easie purchase of Pardon for two such great Sins his Father would certainly have made, had he not been prevented by Death; but leaving it unperform'd, this King made all possible haste to execute it, supposing, that his Father's Soul could not be at rest till the Penance enjoyn'd was finish'd. Wherefore soon after Easter he caused the Body of King Richard to be removed from its more ignoble Interment in the Church of the Fryer's Preachers at Langley in Hertfordshire, and being brought up to London, buried it by his Beloved Queen Ann, in the Abbey-Church of Westminster with very great Solemnity and Expence, where he founded a frequent Memorial for him, providing that every Week a Dirige should be sung for his Soul, and the next Day a Requiem; which being ended, he order'd Eleven Shillings to be given to the Poor in Pence, and further appointed, that upon his Anniversary after the Mass of Requiem twenty Pounds should be distributed to the Poor in Pence; for which, and the Maintenance of Four Wax Tapers to burn upon his Tomb, Day and Night, he gave a certain Portion of Land to perpetuate them for ever: And that the Guilt of these his Father's Sins might not cleave to him, he is said to have undergone a strict Penance himself, and founded Three Religious Houses, viz. 1. Of Cistercian Monks at Shene. 2. Of Nuns of St. Bridget, which he called Sion, and, 3. An House of Observants, which he called Bethlehem, both at Richmond.

Three Weeks after Easter, (b) the King assembled his Parliament at Westminster, and several good Laws of common Concern were then made, viz. concerning the Elections of Burgesses and Knights for the Parliament. Against such as forged or published false Deeds. Against Irish Beggars. About the Measures, that the King's Purveyors should buy Corn by, with other Things of less Importance. But the Convocation of the Clergy, which according to the usual Custome of those Times always sat with the Parliament, being conven'd in St. Paul's Church was more Active. The Arch-Bishop, Thomas Arundel, being sensible how zealous the King was for the Church, thought this the fittest Opportunity to root out those Heretical Doctrines which had been indeed often attempted, but to so little purpose, that they still spread and got Ground, because that his Youth and Natural Courage concurring with his Religious Inclination would more earnestly engage him in a Work by which he might merit at once both the Favour of God and his People. Wherefore the Arch-Bishop having, by Twelve Inquisitors sent out the Year before, made a full Collection of the Principal Doctrines and Opinions maintain'd by the Lollards, which he reduced into (c) two hundred, forty six Heads; and having discover'd who were the Chief Maintainers and Upholders of them, and by which means the said Opinions had been lately so much propagated in many parts of the Nation, and more especially in the Diocesses of London, Rochester and Hereford, represented the same to the Convocation, and desiring their serious Consultation by what Methods the said Doctrines and their Fauters might be suppressed; he put them upon many Debates about it, and at length drew them to these Resolutions and Decrees, viz. 'That it would not be possible to extirpate the Doctrines of Wickliff, unless certain Great Men, who were the professed Abettors and Maintainers of them were remov'd out of the Way. That Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, being the Chief of them, and the Person who had sent several Preachers into the Diocesses of London, Rochester and Hereford to propagate the said Heretical Doctrines, should be first dealt withal, and accordingly it was concluded: That without delay Process should be issued out against him as a most pernicious Heretick. But because the said Lord was in Favour with the King for his Conduct and Valour, it was advis'd, That the King himself should be acquainted with their Designs, and the Just Occasion of it, that having obtain'd his Leave their Proceedings might be more Successful and Inoffensive. This Counsel was approv'd, and order'd to be follow'd, and then the Convocation after it had ordain'd St. George's Day to be celebrated and kept as of the manner of keeping such a Feast. See Mr. Fox's Acts and Monuments, pag. 513. Duplex Festum Majus, i. e. A greater double Feast broke up. The Arch-Bishop endeavour'd to have rais'd St. Dunstan's Day to an equal Holiness, but could not obtain it.

The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who had appear'd particularly Zealous in the Convocation against the Hereticks of those Times, did not abate his Heat when it was ended, but immediately went to the King with heavy Complaints against the Lord Cobham, as an Arch-Heretick and Enemy of the Church, and desir'd his Per-

A. D. 1413. Reg. 1. mission to proceed against him according to the late Decree made by his Clergy, and according to the Laws of the Land against Hereticks. The King observing the Arch-Bishop's Fury, and being cooler himself reply'd, 'That tho' he had a particular Desire to uphold and maintain the Church both in its Doctrine and Order, and was sensible that Unity was the Life of Christianity, because it keeps up that Love which is the fulfilling of the Law; yet he thought that the most prudent Course to reduce the Erroneous, was by mild Perswasions and convincing Arguments; for if the Truth were on their Side, it would prevail by its own Strength in the End, which if it could be done, it would be much better than to make use of those Engines, which have been for the most part used to subdue and destroy the Truth, and seldom do any Service to the Church further than to work dissembled Union and Conversion: And therefore advised the Arch-Bishop to use all gentle Methods to reform and reduce him, promising, that he would himself treat with the Lord Cobham about his Opinions, and if he could not reclaim him, would leave him to the Church and Law. The Arch-Bishop departed with this Answer, and the King sent soon after for the Lord Cobham, and having related to him the Charge of Heresy, which the Arch-Bishop had brought against him, admonish'd him forthwith to renounce his Opinions and submit himself to the Church and Obedience of the Arch-Bishop. The Lord Cobham thank'd him for his Kindness and Favour, but return'd him an Answer. 'That by the Law of God he owed Obedience to no Person on Earth but himself, who was his natural Prince, and God's Vice-gerent, and to his lawful Commands he would readily submit at all Times, but as for the Pope and his Hierarchy he owed them neither Sute nor Service, and therefore would pay them none, because he knew him to be the Antichrist, and Them the Abomination standing in the Holy Place, by the Description given them in Scripture. This resolute Reply something offend'd the King, so that he dismiss'd him without any further Discourse or Perswasion, and the Lord Cobham departed to his Castle of Cooling in Kent, which having obtained by the Marriage of an Heiress of the Lord Cobham's, he became a Baron, and had upon that Account his usual Residence there. The Arch-Bishop having waited some time for the Effect of the King's Promise, went again to Court to receive the Account of it, and finding the King displeased at the ill Success of his treating with the Lord Cobham, had full Authority given him to cite, examine and punish him according to the Canons of the Church, which he did not defer to put immediately in Execution: For having assembl'd a Council of his Clergy, and fram'd divers Articles of Heresy against him, he sent his Somner to cite him to answer personally before him to such Accusations as should be proved against him. The Somner not daring to deliver his Summons to the Lord, because he was reputed a Person of great Fierceness and Courage, returned again without doing his Message, and the Arch-Bishop was forced to hire (d) one Butler to set up a Peremptory Citation upon the Doors of Rochester Church, (e) strictly charging him to appear before him, on September the 11th following at Leeds. The Lord Cobham was not at all careful to obey his Summons; but fearing lest the Arch-Bishop should engage the King against him, and draw him to join his Power to gratify their Malice and Fury, which otherwise he valued not, he drew up the Sum of his Faith in Writing under several Heads, according to the Sense of the Apostle's Creed, and presented 'em to the King, hoping by satisfying him in the Orthodox Declaration of his Opinion to obtain his Protection and Favour: But contrary to his Expectation he found him so much prepossessed by the Arch-Bishop, that he would not look upon it, but deliver'd it to the Arch-Bishop, and his other Accusers, causing him to be again cited to answer his Charge before them; and because he would not swear to submit himself in all things to the Church, the King order'd him to be Arrested in his Presence, and commanded that he should be kept a close Prisoner in the Tower of London, till he should acquit himself of the Crimes laid against him, or be otherwise released by order of Law. The Lord Cobham used all means to deliver himself, alledging, that the Arch-Bishop was his avow'd Enemy, and therefore in Reason and Equity ought not to be his Judge, that he had appeal'd to the Pope for Justice, and shew'd his Appeal ready drawn up with all due Reverence to the King: But this incensing the King much more, he protested, That he was willing to undergo any Punishment that could by the Law of God be inflicted on him, but could not be contented to have his cruel Enemies his Judges; yet if the King saw fit he would justify himself by Combat, either personally against any Man living, Christian or Heathen, the King and his Council only excepted, or with an hundred Knights or Esquires on each side, that his Faith is Sound and Orthodox. But all these Offers nothing avail'd, the King would have him appear before the Arch-Bishop at a Day and Place then appointed, and so he was kept in Prison in the mean time. The Day being come for the Lord Cobham's Answer, which was September the 23d, Sir Rob. Morley, Lieutenant of the Tower brought him to St. Paul's Church, where the Arch-Bishop with Richard Clifford, Bishop of London, and Henry Bullingbrook, Bishop of Winchester, sat in a Consistory in the Chapter-house to examine him, and there left him to them: But little was done at this Time, because he deliver'd in to them a short Paper of his Opinion about the Holy Sacrament, Images, Penance and Pilgrimages, which tho' not Satisfactory to them, yet he would then give no other Answer upon those Points, and so he had further Time given him for a more distinct Answer, which was till September the 25th. On that Day he was examined again in the Hall of the Black-Fryers within Ludgate; and because he asserted, That in the Sacrament of the Altar there was, after Consecration both the Body of Christ and Bread, after the same manner as in the Person of Christ the Divinity was united with the Humanity. That the Pope and his Prelates are Antichrist, and not the true Church of God. That Saints are not to be Worshipped, nor to be sought to by Pilgrimages. That Images cannot be an Object of Worship; and would not be induced to alter or change his Opinion in these Points, he was condemn'd as an obstinate Heretick by the Arch-Bishop, who having Excommunicated him, deliver'd him over to the Secular Power to be

(e) Butler went to him and Summon'd him personally to appear before the Arch-Bishop. Sir John answered, He owed the Priests no Submission, and would not seem to approve of their Practices by obeying his Summons. The Arch-Bishop afterwards proceeded another way, by affixing the Citation on several Church Doors. Ibid.

Normich burnt. About this Time a very terrible Fire happen'd in the City of Normich, which burnt down a great part of that City, and the House of the Fryers-Preachers, with others two Fryers being consumed in the Flames.

A. D. The King kept his Christmas at his Mannor of Eltham in Kent, about seven Miles distant from London; and while he was in the midst of his Plenty and Delights on Twelfth-Day, an information was brought him of a Conspiracy laid by Sir John Oldcastle Lord Cobham and his Party, who assembling in St. Giles's-Fields to the Number of 20 or 25000 Men, intending to surprize his Person and kill him with his Brothers, that they might secure the open Profession of their Religion, which he was so Zealous to destroy. The King, tho' if he had allowed himself time to consider might easily have seen the Forgery; because if the Lord Cobham had been indeed resolved to revenge himself upon the King and Clergy for the late Wrongs done to him (which it was evident his Conscience would not suffer him to do) yet he being an Expert Commander would not have chosen St. Giles's-Fields for a Rendezvous for his Army, which was then a Thicket overgrown with Trees and Bushes, and so most unfit for that Business; but being amused with the sudden News believed the Truth of it; and having sent an Order to the Mayor of London Sir William Cromer to keep the City-Gates close shut, and let no Persons go out but such as he was well assured of their Loyalty to him, and to seize all suspected Persons, which the Mayor carefully did, and apprehended Seven Persons in one Burgal a Carpenter's House in Bishops-gate-street, who being sent to the King at Eltham, either by Perswasion or through Fear confessed that they had conspired with Sir John Oldcastle to fight against him and his Lords in St. Giles's-Fields in Holborn: Then the King went himself at Midnight, with a considerable Force which he had gathered out of Westminster and the adjoining Parts, into St. Giles's-Fields, and there finding a certain Number of Men met, viz. about 80, he fell upon them, and having slain some of them without Resistance he took about 60 Prisoners, of whom the Chief were Sir Roger Aston, Kt. a Person of no great account for Wealth or Power, one (f) John Beverly a Preacher, John Brown an Esquire, and one Murby a rich Maltster. This Meeting seems to have been nothing else but a Religious Assembly for the Worship of God; which because the Lollards could no where safely enjoy for fear of their Adversaries, who were grown very Watchful and Insulting by reason of the King's Favour, they were forced like the first Christians in Persecution to celebrate in the Night in Woods and Thickets; but the Clergy having got Information of their Intendment improv'd it into a Plot, which was easily made credible, because the Party was numerous about London, and met in great Numbers, and that many times armed, not to create any Disturbance, but to defend themselves against the Injuries of the Papists: In which Posture the King taking them looked upon them as a rebellious Assembly, and because some of them confessed they came to meet the Lord Cobham (tho' tis certain he was not there) he dealt with the Chief of them as Rebels; for being tried at Westminster and condemn'd for High Treason thirty of them were hang'd, and seven burnt and hang'd in St. Giles's-Fields, January 12. following: John Beverly the Priest, Burgal the Carpenter, and two others were hang'd, Jan. 19. and Sir Roger Aston was hang'd, Feb. 10. and buried under the Gallows he was executed on: And so this imaginary Plot was suppressed.

Thomas Arundel, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, a strenuous Champion for the Papal Church, and a bitter Enemy of the supposed Hereticks died Feb. 20. It is said, that as he was pronouncing the Sentence of Excommunication and Condemnation upon the Lord Cobham, he was stricken with a forenefs in his Throat and at the Roots of his Tongue, which notwithstanding all Medicines that could be used so inflamed those Parts that he could swallow neither Meat nor Drink, and so he was starved to Death. This lamentable End was then thought a just Judgment upon him, not only for his Severity to the Lollards, many of whom, being generally accounted a well-meaning and good People, he condemn'd, and caused to be burnt for Heresie; but because he had made a Canon the Year before in a Synod held at Rocheſter against the Lord Cobham, forbidding the Translation of the Scripture into the English Tongue, and the Preaching the Gospel by the Lollards. He sat eighteen Years in that See, and was succeeded by Henry Chicheley, Bishop of St. Davids, whom the Monks of Canterbury had elected into his room, but he would not accept it till he had the Pope's Consent and Confirmation. He was as zealous a Persecutor of the Lollards as his Predecessour, and sat 25 Years in that See.

King Henry having an Account of the miserable Imprisonment of Henry Peircy the Son of the late Lord Peircy, surnam'd Hotspur, and Heir of the Earldom of Northumberland much pity'd his Condition and resolv'd to redeem him: And tho' by the Treason and Rebellion of his Father and Grandfather, his Honour and Estate was justly forfeited to the Crown; yet because he was an Infant and was no ways accessary to his Ancestor's Crimes, the King in Mercy purpos'd to restore him to his Birth-right, tho' in Justice he might have kept him out of it. This young Nobleman had been very unjustly dealt with by the Scots: For whereas his Grandfather had carried him to them when he fled thither after the Rebellion of Arch-Bishop Scroop, and entrusted him with them to secure him, and educate him, they made him a Prisoner by way of Reprisal, because their young King James had been many Years kept a Prisoner in England, and would not release him till the King was restored. But King Henry found out another Exchange for him, viz. by returning the Duke of Albany's Son (g) who was taken by the English at Halidown-fight, and so he obtained him and restored him to his Honour, Dignity and Estate, tho' they had been given some time before to John, Duke of Bedford the King's Brother, by which Act of Mercy he gain'd much Love and Respect from his Nobility, and an equal Admiration from all his People.

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2. and settled many Things of great Concern to the Nation, and for the Honour of the King, tho' it prov'd very severe and fatal to the Lollards, as will appear in the brief Account of the chief Acts of it. The first Act of this Parliament was a very Pious one for the due Management of Hospitals, ordering, That the Bishops of the Diocesse should by the King's Commission inquire into the Revenues and other Endowments belonging to such Houses as have been erected and endowed for the Relief of the Poor, and correct and reform what they find amiss according to the Laws of the Church. Other Acts also of great Use were made for the keeping of Servants and Labourers within their own Counties. That Justices of Quorum be resident in the Counties where they are appointed to serve by the King's Commission, and that the Quarter-Sessions for the Peace be kept in the same Week quarterly throughout England. That it shall be High-Treason to rob or slay any Persons, either in the Ports or passing upon the Seas, having the King's Letters of Truce and safe Conduct, by which Act also Conservators of Truce in every Port both of England and Wales were appointed. That Justices of the Peace and Sheriffs should be diligent to suppress all unlawful Routs and Riotous Assemblies under the Penalty of an hundred Pound Forfeiture for every Omission. But those Matters which were carried on and manag'd with the greatest Heat and Zeal were, 1. The Act against the Lollards, and 2. The Petition about the Revenues of Religious Persons. The first of these was procured chiefly by the Clergy, who taking advantage of the King's Displeasure against the Lollards for their supposed Rebellion lately raised against him, willingly caused it to be Enacted. 'That whereas divers of his Majesty's Leige-People as well by those of the Sect of Heretic, called Lollards, as by others of their Confederation, Excitation and Abetment have been made to annul and subvert the Christian Faith and Law of God within the Realm of England, and destroy the King himself, the Estates of the Realm both Spiritual and Temporal, and also all manner of Policy and the Laws of the Land: Therefore our Lord the King to the Honour of God, in Conservation and Fortification of the Christian Faith, and also in Salvation of his Royal Estate, and of the Estate of all his Realm, willing to provide a more open and due Punishment against the Malice of such Hereticks and Lollards than hath been had or used in that Case heretofore; so that for the fear of the same Laws and Punishments, such Heresies and Lollardies may the rather cease in time to come; hath by the Advice and Assent, and at the Prayers of the Commons Ordain'd and Establish'd, That the Chancellor, Treasurer, Judges of both Benches, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, and other Officers that have, or hereafter shall have Government of our People, do make Oath in taking their Offices to extend their whole Pain and Diligence to put out, cease and destroy all manner of Errors and Heresies, commonly call'd Lollardies within all Places where in they exercise their Offices with all their Power, and assist, favour and maintain the Ordinaries and their Commissaries in doing the same as oft as they shall be thereunto required, their reasonable Costs and Charges being paid by them. This Act as it shews how ill an Opinion the King had of the Lollards whom he knew only by the Misrepresentations of their inveterate Enemies, so it raised a very sharp Persecution against them, in which many were burnt, many for fear fled into foreign Parts to secure their Lives, and others through a more unmanly Cowardize denied and abjured the Truth: This with other Acts of Parliament being pass'd, the Houses came to raise the King some Money, which being the first he had ever had, they were willing to do the more largely, and for that End put up a fresh Petition to the King (as they had before done to his Father) to this Effect, 'That forasmuch as the Temporal Revenues which had been devoutly given to Religious Persons, but were disorderly consumed and spent as well to the dishonour of God and Religion as the Prejudice of the Religious Persons themselves, might be much better employed for the safety and securing the Realm and relief of the Poor (as by a particular Computation in the same manner as it was given in to the King's Father they made it appear) they besought the King to take the said Revenues into his Hands, and to employ them for his own and the Nations Advantage. This Petition though put up and promoted by such Persons as bore some Affection to the Lollards, and hated the Clergy for the Cruelty they had used so lately against the Lord Cobham; yet being done by some or most of the same Persons who had concurred in the Act made this Session against them, was not suspected of Revenge by the King, but as if it had proceeded from the good Affection they bore to him, and the present Necessities of the Nation, he began to listen to it and shew a Compliance with that strong Party in both Houses which appear'd Zealous for it, insomuch that (as Hall saith) the Fat Abbots began to sweat, the Proud Priors to frown, the Poor Fryers to curse, and the silly Nuns to weep, least their Babel should now utterly be demolish'd: But their Sins were not yet full. The Clergy laid their Heads together, and entred into deep Consultations how to save themselves: The Houses of the Fryers Aliens which were 110, they were contented to part with to secure the Rest, and accordingly they were given to the King with all their Rents and Revenues; but least this small Morfel should sharpen his Appetite to a greater Prey, it was contrived, that Henry Chicheley, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, a Person of great Eloquence and Policy should set on Foot the King's Title to the Crown of France, and by all the Cogent Flowers of Rhetorick endeavour to inflame the King's Youthful Affections with Desires of attaining that Kingdom, as well to immortalize his Courage as recover his Right, which he did in a full Parliament in this Method and to this Effect. 'That King Henry being a Prince so well qualified both for his Piety, Courage, and wise Conduct to govern not only one part of a small Island but the whole World, if an universal Monarchy can be ever settled upon one Person, it would be a great shame if the English should suffer his Power and Rule to be confin'd within narrower Limits than Nature and Providence had given him; especially since nothing can be supposed to oblige him to it, whose Courage was always forward to attempt any just Enterprize, but their backwardness to assist him with Men and Money for that End: That though indeed King Henry ruled only England and Ireland at present, yet the Dutchies of Normandy and Aquitain, and the Countries of Anjou, Gascoigne, and Maine in France did by Ancient Inheritance belong to the Crown of England, and the whole Kingdom of France was really and truly

A. D. 1414. Reg. 2. truly his, as Heir to K. Edward the Third his Great-Grandfather, whose Mother Queen Isabel after the Death of her Three Brothers, Lewis Hutyn, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, who all died without Issue, was the only lawful Heir of the Kingdom of France, and left her Title to her Son Edward, from whom King Henry is lineally descended: That tho' Philip de Valois had possessed himself of that Kingdom, upon a pretended fundamental Law, call'd the Salick-Law, by which it was enacted, That in terram Salicam mulieres ne succedant, Let not Women succeed in the Government of the Salick-Land; yet it is evident from the Original Constitution of the said Law by Charles the Great, and the common Custom of France it self in reference to the Succession of the Crown, that the said Law hath been unjustly made use of, and pleaded to bar the Kings of England from their Inheritance; for as to the making of it our Histories shew, that it was fram'd by Charles the Great when he conquer'd the Parts of Germany between the Rivers Elbe and Sala, where having observ'd the Women to be very Lewd and Voluptuous, and consequently unfit to govern, he made the Law, That in these Countries no Woman should rule; which could in no wise include France, as is pretended it doth but falsely, as the Course of Succession to the Crown of France doth prove. For Pepin, King of France, who deposed Chilperick, claim'd the Kingdom as his Right by Inheritance, because he was descended of the Lady Blithilda, Daughter of King Clothair; and Hugh Capet who held the Crown in Prejudice of Charles, Duke of Lorraine, the only Heir-male of Charles the Great, made his Claim good by proving his Descent from the Emperour Lewis the Son of Charles the Great by the Lady Lingard, which Pleas could have no tolerable Grounds, nor would they have been admitted, had the Salick-Law as is pretended been in Force from the Time of their first King Pharamond. But that which renders this Argument most plain is the Case of St. Lewis, who being dissatisfied in Conscience about his Right to the Crown, because the Succession was a little confused and intricate, and being ready to resign what he fear'd he had no good Title to, he was shew'd, that he was lineally descended of the Lady Ermengard, Daughter and Heir to Charles, Duke of Lorraine, the sole Heir-male of Charles the Great, and was satisfied in the Justice of his Title, which he could not have been if the Salick-Law had been known and in force at that time in France; and since the Title of the succeeding Kings to this Day is deriv'd from the said Lewis of whom they all come, the Kings of England will have at least as good a Title as any of them could challenge, and so consequently is the lawful Heir of France as being from the Elder Family tho' by a Female Branch, and the Salick Law is but a Trick set on Foot to debar the Kings of England of their Right: That if the Salick-Law were indeed of that Antiquity and Use in France as is pretended, yet it ought not to be observed in any Christian Commonwealth, because it is directly contrary to a Law of God (which no humane Law or Custom may contradict) and that allows the Woman to inherit her Father's Possessions in case of a Defect in the Male-Line, as is evident from the Case of the Daughters of Zelophehad, upon which God commanded, That if a Man died without Heirs-male his Daughters shall inherit, and by this Law the Daughter of Sheshan, 1 Chron. 2. 34. obtained her Father's Inheritance, and held it to the Captivity. Wherefore it was not without good Reason that Ottoman the great French Lawyer call'd the Salick-Law an unjust Ordinance: That God himself had seem'd to declare in favour of the English Title to the Crown of France by the great Success he had given to Edward the Third and his Son the Black-Prince in endeavouring to recover their undoubted Right to it by Arms, who were so Victorious, that they in a few Years conquer'd the greatest part of France, took King John Prisoner, and braved his Successor Charles the Fifth at the Gates of Paris without Resistance; and though God for the Just Punishment of our Sins took away both those Victorious Princes (who if they had lived, doubtless had long since decided this Quarrel, and subjected the whole Realm of France to the English Crown) and so given France a Breathing time, yet their Title still remained; and though it was not claim'd by King Henry the Fourth by reason of his Troubles at Home, yet his Father having left him a quiet Possession of his Crown had as it were prepared all things for his Son to recover it. Wherefore he concluded with an earnest Exhortation to the King not to sit down in Sluggishness and Ease, but to achieve the Conquest of so Noble a Nation, whereby he would not only recover his Right and enlarge his Dominions, but get himself immortal Honour, assuring him, That the Clergy would assist him with such a Supply of Money for that End as no King before him had ever received, and did not doubt but the Laity would willingly contribute their Proportion. This Oration of the Arch-Bishop, tho' unexpected by the King and Parliament, yet being well studied and ordered by him had the desired Effect, for the whole House were convinced thereby of King Henry's just Title to the Crown of France, and immediately resolv'd to give him their utmost Assistance to the Recovery of it, and the King himself inflam'd with the Desires of Victory, could think upon nothing else but Armies and Laurels. The Bill against the Clergy was wholly laid aside, and a Subsidy of 300000 Marks given him from the Laity to carry on a vigorous War against the King of France; and so the Parliament broke up and this Session was ended.

While this Parliament was sitting, and the intended Recovery of France was debated hotly among them, there came over Embassadors from France, being sent to the King by the two great Factions of the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, and solicited him earnestly, but severally, to assist them against their Adversaries, promising him (as was said) more than was in their Power to perform: The King gave them no other Answer at present but this. That he would shortly send over his Embassadors into France and signifie his Resolutions to both of them, because he waited to see what would be the Result of the present Debates, and accordingly would manage his Affairs and pursue his Advantage. As soon therefore as the Parliament was broke up, and his Expedition into France resolv'd on, and all eager Preparations for it determin'd, he sent a solemn Embassy into France by the Duke of Exeter, the Arch-Bishop of Dublin, the Lord Gray, the Lord High Admiral, and the Bishop of Norwich with 500 Horse to King Charles the Sixth, to require of him in a peaceable manner (for the avoiding the Effusion of Christian Blood) to surrender the Kingdom of France and all the Appertenance to him as the lawful and undoubted Heir of it, which if he would do quietly, King Henry would then take the Lady Katharine his Daughter to Wife, and endow her with all the Duchies belonging to the Crown of France; but if King Charles refused to grant his just Demands, he would enter France with Fire and Sword to recover his Right from him or lose his Life. The French King hearing their Demands entertain'd them with Contempt, telling them in Scorn, That their Business required Deliberation, desir'd time, and sent them away without an Answer. The Dauphin was not content with such Modest Reflections, but knowing something of King Henry's effeminate course of Life while he was Prince, sent him a Tun of Tennis-Balls, scornfully intimating, That he was fitter for a Game at Tennis than a Warlike Expedition, and knew better how to bandy a Ball than shoot a Bullet, and that they must be as soft as himself who valued the Menaces of so unwarlike a Prince. King Henry not a little enraged at these Returns of his Embassy, said, 'That as light as they made of his Demands, he'd make the French know that he deserv'd the Respect of a Prince from them, and tho' they had sent him Tennis-Balls, he would send among them such Balls as the strongest Walls of France should not be able to withstand: And so with all the Zeal and Haste imaginable prepared for his Expedition into France; for having gathered up the 300000 Marks granted him the last Parliament, he rais'd a very puissant Army, and hired a great Number of Ships out of Zealand, Holland and Freizland to join with his own Fleet to carry over his Army: He also call'd a great Council at London about Michaelmas, in which he caus'd it to be ordain'd, that no French Men nor other Strangers should be promoted in the Church without his License for the future, and all such as did enjoy any Preferments already, should find Sureties not to disclose the Secrets of the Realm, nor assist the King's Enemies with Money, which Edict was at the same time confirm'd by a Canon of the Convocation sitting in St. Paul's to elect certain Persons to be sent to the General Council appointed to meet at Constans in Germany by the Emperor Sigismund to heal the Schism then in the Church. The French prepare to defend their Coasts against K. Henry, and excite the Scots against him.

The Preparations made in England against the French were not unknown to them, and the Dauphin who then had the Government of the Realm under his Father, call'd a Council of the Dukes of Alençon and Berry, with other great Lords to consult about the properest Methods of opposing the King of England, and by their Advice an Army was rais'd to lie on the Coasts, and the Maritime Garrisons strongly fortified against any Invasion. But the main Thing they depended upon was the Assistance of the King of Scots, who by their Instigation and Help was drawn to invade the English Borders with such a powerful Army as would, they hoped, hinder their Expedition into France. And indeed the Scots appear'd at first so Formidable, that it begat a Dispute in the King's Council, whether Scotland or France should first be subdu'd. The Earl of Westmerland, who then was made Lord Warden of the Marches of Scotland, mov'd the King to go first against Scotland, alledging, that it would facilitate his Conquest over France to subdue that Nation first according to the old Proverb, Who so will France win, must with Scotland first begin. But the King's Uncle Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter, a wise and learned Man, affirm'd and urg'd the contrary, That it would be the most certain way to subdue Scotland to conquer France first, because it was by the Policy and Money of the French that the Scots were able so well to defend and maintain themselves. Take away France and the Scots will fall of course. Besides the present Factions of Burgundy and Orleans would be so great an Advantage to the King in gaining that Nation, that it would be very impolitick to omit this Juncture to invade France. These and other Arguments of like Nature were so prevalent with the whole Assembly that it was resolv'd, that the King should go on with the War against France, and that Sir Robert Umfrevile with a small Body of Men, and with the Forces of the Bordering Counties should be sent to defend the Nation from the IncurSIONS of the Scots. This Valiant Commander soon after his arrival, viz. upon St. Mary Magdalen's Day, July 22. came to an Engagement with them, and was so fortunate that he routed their whole Army, and took 360 of them Prisoners with great Spoil, and got safe into Roxborough-Castle, of which he was Governour. The News of this Success against the Scots much amaz'd the French, and taught them how little the Aid of the Scots was to be trusted to: Whereupon they altered their Methods, and sent over an Embassy to King Henry by the Earl of Vendosme, William, Archbishop of Bourges, the Bishop of Lisieux, the Lords Ippe and Braquemont, the King's Secretary, and many others, who being accompany'd with 350 Horse-Men as Attendants arriv'd at Callis a little after Christmas, and landed within a few Days at Dover.

King Henry being very earnest and diligent to make all possible Preparations for his design'd Expedition into France, took his Journey early this Spring to see in what Condition and Readiness his Fleet and Transport Ships were which lay at Southampton, and give such necessary Orders as were requir'd for his Proceedings; but in his Passage News was brought him, that a Pompous Embassy from the French King was landed at Dover and hastening towards him, which caus'd the King to desist from his Journey a while and retreat to Winchester to receive them and give them a speedy Audience, tho' without a prophetick Foresight it was easie to guess at their Business, that they now were afraid of him they so lately scorn'd and derided. As soon as they arriv'd they were admitted to the King, and the Arch-Bishop of Bourges in an Eloquent Speech having shew'd the Barbarous Cruelties of War and the Advantages of Peace, especially between such two neighbouring Nations as England and France, dissuad'd the King from his intended Design, and promised him from his Master many profitable Conditions if he would dismiss his Army, viz. That his Master the French King would give him in Marriage the Lady Katharine, and for her Dowry several Countries in France, with a large Sum of Money. (i) The King gave them no Answer to their Proposals presently; but having for several Days feasted them Royally at his own Table, he at length order'd the Arch-Bishop of

A. D. 1415. Reg. 2. Canterbury to answer their Proposals in this Manner. 'That the Dutchie of Aquitain and Anjou with several Seignories and Dominions did of right belong to his Master the King of England, as they had formerly done to his Royal Progenitors; and though he was fully intended to recover them by force, as he did not doubt but he should be able to do thro' the Divine Assistance, which he could not doubt of in so just a Cause; yet for Peace sake, and to avoid the Loss of so many Lives as would probably perish in the Quarrel, he was contented to dismiss his Army and give over his intended Expedition, if their Master would restore them to him by a Marriage with the Lady Katharine, if not he would enter France with all his Force, and destroying the People and Towns with Blood, Fire and Sword never desist till he had recover'd them, which were his Ancient Right and Patrimony. The King himself was present, and as soon as the Arch-Bishop had ended his Speech assented to it, and (k) promised upon the Word of a Prince, that he would perform it to the uttermost. The Arch-Bishop of Bourges an high and lofty Prelate heard all this with Impatience, and as soon as the King had done speaking, without Consideration, what or to whom he spake, burst out in his Passion and reply'd. 'That his Majesty the most Christian King, who was the most Renowned, Mighty and Excellent Prince of Europe without Competition both in Blood, Power and Preheminence, did not offer those Things which he had propounded out of fear of King Henry or his Nation, but merely out of a Compassion to avoid the Effusion of Christian Blood, and since his Proposals tho' very Advantageous were despised, God and his good Subjects would soon put an end to the Quarrel, which was supported with so much Equity and Right, and then desir'd his Passport to depart. King Henry with a Princely Gravity and Mildness told the Angry Prelate, 'That he valu'd not his Bravadoes, and as he was satisfied in his Right, which they themselves could not be ignorant of, so he doubted not but through God's help he should find means to recover it; if his Master had many Subjects to assist him, he doubted not but to find their Equals in Number and Courage among his own, by whose help he would make the highest Crown in France to stoop, and proudest Mitre to kneel; and giving him his Letters of safe Conduct, bid him go tell his Master, 'That within three Months he would enter France as into his lawful Patrimony, and by God's Assistance take that by dint of Sword which he unjustly detain'd from him: And so sent him away. (l)

Reg. 3. The War with France being now unmovably determin'd, K. Henry who was already in great forwardness for it, doubled his Diligence to have all Things ready within the Three Months, appointed to the French Embassadors, and accordingly gave out strict Orders to his Captains and Commanders to meet him every ways equipp'd at Southampton on June 24. and so pass immediately into France. (m) In the mean time he set all Things in order against his Departure out of the Realm, that his Absence might not create any Disturbance among his Subjects, and for that End he appointed his Mother-in-Law, Joan de Navar, (n) a Woman of great Prudence and Judgment in National Affairs, to be Regent in his Absence with the Advice of his Privy-Council; The Earl of Westmerland, the Lords Scroop and Greystock, and Sir Robert Umfreville, with some other Valiant Captains he appointed to keep the Frontiers of the Nation against the Scots who had engag'd in the French Assistance, and would certainly be very troublesome as soon as they heard he was gone, and therefore he sent them with a sufficient Strength to prevent their Incurfions. On June 18. the King left London, and began his Journey to Southampton where his Army was to meet him on the 24th, and accordingly did; all Things being ready, and all Persons cheerfully attending the King's Motions and Desires, with all speed possible to pass into France. But before they could take Ship a sudden Accident put a stop to all for a while. The French King who could not fairly oppose Henry's Courage, brib'd some of his Favourites to take away his Life by base Treachery, but the Conspiracy and its Actors were fortunately discovered to him before the time for its Execution was come, by this Means and on this Occasion. Richard, Earl of Cambridge, Brother to the Duke of York, Henry, Lord Scroop, the High-Treasurer, and Sir Thomas Grey, (o) a Privy-Counsellor, three Persons most in Favour with the King, and almost constantly in his Company, having received of the King of France a Million of Gold, had promised him to kill King Henry in his Voyage to France, or if they could not do that, to deliver him into his Power, and that they might make their treacherous Design to look the more plausibly, they discover'd it to the Earl of March, Edmund Mortimer, pretending that it was out of a real desire of restoring him to his Right that they had taken up such desperate Resolutions; and tho' they expected not his Concurrence, yet they must exact an Oath of Secrecy from him for their own Security, in a Matter of so great Danger to themselves, as well as of Importance to him. The Earl of March either not very desirous of the Crown when so worthy a Prince himself and so great a Friend to him was in Possession, or else suspecting that this Conspiracy arose from other Causes than what was pretended, refused at first to swear to them, but when they were very importunate with him to do it before they parted, he at length consented upon Condition they would allow him an Hour to consider of it (p) which they granted. The Earl of March having thus got his Liberty to

(l) This Arrogant Prelate upbraided King Henry in his Speech with the Badness of his Title even to the Crown of England; and he said, The Crown you wear appertains to the true Heirs of the Deceased Richard, and while they are alive 'tis with them and not you that our Royal Master should have made a Treaty.

(m) From Southampton he sent Antelope his Pursuivant at Arms with a Letter to the French King, dated at that Place on the Sea, to shew he must expect no more Messages from him: In it he demanded the Restoration of the Provinces in France belonging to the Crown of England, and offered still to marry his Daughter, otherwise he would recover them by Arms. The French King answered, If that was his Mind, he would be prepared to receive him, and as to the Marriage he thought it a strange way of Courtship to address his Mistress covered with the Blood of her Father's Subjects.

The King, though much surprized at the Baseness of his Friends, yet did not so much distrust the Discovery as to neglect himself, but causing them to be apprehended brought them to an Examination before himself, and Nobles present with him. They denied not the Accusation which was taken so lately from their own Mouths, but confessed themselves guilty of the whole Plot. (q) The King much amazed at their detestable Treason told them, 'That he could not but with horror think upon this their Execrable Fact, which not only tended to the Destruction of his own Person, and the Nobles his followers, but to the Ruin of the whole Nation, of which they were so unnatural Sons as to betray it to their Enemies by this Treason: That as to himself he desired no Revenge; but as he was the Supreme Governour of the Nation he took himself oblig'd to inflict the Punishment upon them which they had deserved, for the safety of his Dear Friends and the Preservation of the whole Nation: And thereupon wishing them an hearty Repentance for their Offences and Mercy from God, he commanded that they should be Executed, which being accordingly perform'd the Earl's Head was permitted to be buried with his Body, but the Lord Scroop's Head was sent to York, and Sir Thomas Gray's to New-Castle to be Spectacles of Terror to all Beholders. (r)

K. Henry proceeds in his Expedition, and lands in France.

The King having thus punished those Conspirators promised himself security, and began to put forward his Expedition, but least any Remnants of this Treason should prove afterwards fatal to him, or prejudicial to his Proceedings, he called his Nobles to him, and having represented to them the Glory of this Achievement against France, and how much he depended upon their Fidelity and Courage, told them, 'That the Treason, which by God's Mercy he had so lately escaped, would make him value their Loyalty to him the more if they persisted in their Duty, and he would not be forgetful to reward it, and in Confidence of their Firmness to him he was resolv'd to proceed in his Design. The Nobles hearing these Words which favoured of a little Distrust, fell down on their Knees, and promised faithfully to serve and obey him, and rather die than suffer him to fall into the Hands of his Enemies: With this Encouragement the King put an end to those Delays which had given the French hopes that their Plot against his Life had been Successful, and went on board with his Nobles and Soldiers, August 11. to sail into France. His whole Army was but 6000 Spears and 24000 Foot, besides Gunners, Engineers, Artificers and Labourers, and his Navy consisted of 1000, (or as others say 1500) Ships, with which he landed safe on August 15. at Caux, a Town situate at the Mouth of the Seine in Normandy; for his Arrival struck the Inhabitants with such Terror that they made no Resistance. The King at his first landing fell down on his Knees, and with much Devotion besought God to favour his Cause according to the Justice of it, and give him Success against his Enemies as the Equity of his Enterprize deserved it, and that he might preserve a due Order in his Army he put out a Proclamation, forbidding his Soldiers upon pain of Death to take any thing out of any Church or Monastery, to abuse any Priest, Women or unarmed Persons, or raise any Quarrels with any Man to the disquieting either of the Country or Army. These things being done, the King sensible that Delays would bring Inconveniencies, proceeded to put all things in order for Action, and to encourage his Captains and Leaders he conferred the Order of Knighthood upon several of them, and disposed of the Banners and Standards to such Men as he knew to be of greatest Strength and Courage. The next Day he sent forth his Spies to take a view of Harfleur, an important Haven in Normandy, which would be a commodious Passage for the English into France upon all Occasions if it could be gained; and having received the Account of it set forward with his whole Army towards it, being three Leagues distant from Caux, and sat down before it August 17. The Town was well fortified, and a strong Garrison put into it to defend it; for besides the Inhabitants the French King had placed in it 400 Men of Arms under the Command of the Lord de Tenteuil, chief Captain of the Town, the Lords Blanville, Haqueville, and others very expert Warriours who made a very brave and gallant Resistance, being as desirous of an Ominous Beginning in preserving, as the English were in conquering the Town. The Siege was carried on by the Care and Conduct of Ham-fry, Duke of Gloucester, (s) who by Mines, battering the Walls with his Engines and Ordinance, and by continual Assaults sought to reduce it soon into his Power; but the Inhabitants and Garrison by stopping the Course of the River which so swell'd that it became dangerous to the King's Camp, and by Countermineing secured themselves for a while; that though they lost many, and their Town was much endamaged, yet they kept themselves out of their Enemies Hands. The King of France thinking to relieve them sent a Force down to Candebec-Castle, which was but a little distance from Harfleur, but it proved no help either to that Town or the Country about, for the English spoil'd the Villages, forrag'd the Countries, and brought much Prey to Harfleur, and the Town being reduced to very great Streights capitulated with the King of England, that if it were not relieved by the Dauphin or King within a certain time limited they would resign the Keys into his Hands, thirty of the Chief Persons being delivered to the King's Mercy, and the rest to be suffered to go whether they pleased, yet without Arms or Goods, and twelve Persons were delivered to the English as Hostages for the Performance of this Agreement. The Besieged immediately dispatched their Messengers to the Dauphin to come down to their Relief, but he returned them Answer, That he was not able to give them any Succour: Whereupon, at the Time appointed Sir Lionel Braquemont, Governour of the Town came, and on his Knees delivered up the Keys to the King, and yielded up himself with other Lords and chief Persons to the Number of thirty to the King's Mercy, September the 22d, and so all the rest, as

(r) The King having return'd God Thanks in St. Martin's Church made his Uncle Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorset, Governor of the Town, and gave the Prey to the Soldiers whom he left in Garrison, and Peopl'd it with English, whom he invited thither by giving all such Families as would go over their Dwellings and their Childrens after them for nothing, which so many accepted, that the Town was well Peopl'd with English in a short Space.

K. Henry's Army being sickly, he leaves Harfleur and went to Winter in Callis. King Henry having obtain'd his wished-for Success in taking Harfleur would have pursu'd his Victory and proceeded to take other Towns which would not have dared to stand out, but that he was sensible of the Condition of his Army, which by lying so long in the Field was grown very sickly, and many died of the Bloody-flux, of whom some were Persons of Note, as Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, the Bishop of Norwich, Lords Beaumont, Molins and Barnell, and others, and of the Common Soldiers above 2000. The Duke of Clarence, Earls of Marshal and Arundel were so dangerously ill of the same Distemper that he was forced to let them return into England to recover their Health, and many that remained were infected and Weak. This State of the Army with the Consideration that the Winter was coming on, made him take up Resolutions of passing immediately to Callis without further Action to recruit and rest his Army in the Winter there; but because the Dauphin was hovering about with some small Forces, he thought it convenient to offer him some Propositions of Agreement, or to decide the Quarrel with him by single Combat, (u) offering to stay eight Days for him about Harfleur, which if he refused, it would be a means to prevent his Attempt upon them in their Passage, but the Dauphin giving him no answer either way, the King began his March without delay to Callis, lest the Bridges should be broken down, and so they must encounter many Difficulties to get thither, but could not be time enough to avoid it; for the French King having Intelligence of his Success before Harfleur, and his Design to Winter his Army at Callis, gathered a considerable Body of Men and sent them down under the Command of the Dauphin and Duke of Aquitaine to obstruct their Passage, who broke down the Bridges, destroying the Forrage in the Field, and carried all the Provisions into the Walled Towns whether the People betook themselves also for safety. King Henry either not knowing what was done by the French, or else seeing it necessary to persist in his Design, kept on his March intending to pass the Some at Blandre-quef, the Ford which King Edward the Third had waded over with his Army to the Battel of Crissy, but found it staked and made impassable; whereupon he march'd up the River further and resolved to ascend up to the very Fountains of it if they could not get over before. The usual Bridges and Passages over it he tried, but found them either destroy'd or so strongly guarded that he dare not force his Way with so weak an Army: For these Reasons he passed by Port-Remy, Amiens, Corby and Bowes, but at length through the Negligence of the Garrison at St. Quintins he found a safe Passage near Perons. In this tedious Journey they encounter'd many Difficulties, partly thro' want of Victuals, and partly from the Assaults of the Enemies from their Garrisons; for tho' the King's great Justice in restraining his Army from Pillaging, and in hanging one that had stoln a Pix out of a Church, procured him great Love from the People of the Country through which his Army passed, and made them venture to sell 'em Provisions contrary to their own King's Prohibition; yet the small Supply that came that Way was not sufficient for so great a Number to subsist upon. The Garrisons also at Em and Corbay assaulted them Weak and Weary, and tho' the former was repulsed back with the Loss of a valiant Captain, (x) Lancelot Peirce, yet the other came upon them with so much Advantage, that they won the Standard of that part of the King's Forces which was commanded by the Earl of Stafford, (y) but were so bravely opposed, that the Standard was again recovered by a valiant Gentleman John Bromley, of Bromley in the County of Stafford, Esquire, and the French driven into the Town. The Earl of Stafford like a Worthy Commander, sensible of the Brave Action in regaining his Standard, whose Loss would have been so great a Disgrace to him, gave the Valiant Gentleman for a Reward forty Pound a Year out of his Mannors and Lands in Staffordshire, and by a Deed settled it upon him for Life.

King Henry having thus gotten over the Some King of France resolves to fight K. Henry and his Army, and send him a Defiance. was resolved to keep on his direct way to Callis, not attempting any thing by Arms, unless where it should be necessary for their Defence, because his Army was much lessened by Sickness since he left Harfleur, and the Remainder was harassed and weakened by their long Marches and scanty Provisions, and so he went on softly and warily. But the King of France being very angry that the English had gotten over those Difficulties which he thought insuperable, and were in a fair way to get safe to their intended Rest, called a great Council of his Nobility at Roan, of whom the Dauphin and Duke of Brittain were Chief, to consult how to proceed further against the English, and it being at length determined to engage them to a pitch'd Battel, Mountjoy, King at Arms, was sent to King Henry to defie him, and demand Battel on the Thursday following, and for that End an Army under the Constable, the Lord de Albret, and the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon was sent down to block up their Way. King Henry receiv'd the Herald very kindly, but not being willing to hazard his Army, which was unfit to fight, return'd this Answer. 'That he would keep his direct Road to Callis without any Disturbance to any Man, and if they should hinder his Passage it should be at their Peril, he and his Army would endeavour to make their Way, and leave the Issue to God. It is said by some, that King Henry was so fearful of an Overthrow, when he saw the French on all sides swarming about him, that he offer'd to resign Harfleur, and restore all Damages done to it, if they would suffer him to pass undisturbed to Callis, but the French sure of Victory

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3. rejected his Proposals, as the French Historians relate, but ours deny the Story, as unbecoming Henry's great Spirit. After this Answer King Henry kept on his Way to a Village called Forceville, and so by Cheve, Bonyers, and Bangy to Agincourt, October the 22d, in the County of St. Paul, where he had a certain Information that the French Army, which was six or ten times bigger than the English, the former being 60000 or more, and the latter but 15000 (z) and those half starved and tired with Travel, and many of them Sick and Diseased, was ranged in order of Battel ready to fall on him if he lay still, or block up all Ways if he pressed forward. King Henry seeing the Battel unavoidable made the best Preparation so short a time would give him leave, and knowing that the Strength of the French consisted in their Horse, he ordered his Men to get every one a sharp Stake shod at both ends with Iron, which being fixed in the Ground leaning forward might keep of the Horse from rushing in upon his Foot. (a) The Night before the Battel was to begin, King Henry having engaged them to stand up manfully in their own Defence and rather die than yield, they spent in Prayer and Confession, but the French as secure of the Victory, passed it in Jollity and Mirth, Drinking and Gaming, in talking of the Victory they should have, and parting the Prisoners. The next Day which was St. Crispine's Feast, October the 25th, the Battel began about Ten a Clock. King Henry being sensible of the Advantage which the French had of him by their Multitude, pitch'd with the Town on his Back, and a River on the one side, and thick Hedges on the other of his Army that the French might not surround them, the Stakes being fixed on the Front of the Army to keep off the Horse. The Vanguard he put under the Command of the Duke of York who desired that Service; the main Body was led by the King himself, and the Rere-Guard by the Duke of Exeter. The French Army was led by the Flower of the Nobility of the Nation. The Vanguard was led by the Lord Albret, Constable of France, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ew and Richmond, the Marshal Bouciquault, the Lord Dampier, Admiral of France, with other Captains. The main Body by the Dukes of Barr and Alençon, the Earls of Nevers, Vaudemont, Blamont, Salinges and Grant-pree, and the Rereward by the Earls of Marle, Damp-martin, Falconbrig and Lord Louway. The Earl of Vendosme commanded one of the Wings, and Sir Guichard Dolphin the other. The Signal for the Battel being sounded, the French rushed forward upon the English with their Horse (b) and the English as they drew towards them overshadowed them with Clouds of Arrows, which by their fall wounded their Men and disorder'd their Horse, who in their Confusion not observing the Stakes fell upon them and were pierced with them to Death. The Dukes of Brabant and Alençon broke in upon the English with a small Party but were slain, the Duke of Alençon and two of his Servants being slain by King Henry's own Hand. (c) The Battel was hot and furious, and lasted three Hours, but at length the Victory fell to the English, who by their Courage had slain, taken or put to flight the whole French Army. In the Flight the Rere-guard of the French, which got off almost entire, set upon the King's Camp which was but slenderly guarded and pillaged it, taking the King's Crown, and a rich Sword set with Diamonds, and other precious Stones, which they carried in Triumph as if the Victory had been theirs. King Henry hearing a great cry in the Camp supposed that the French had been gotten together in a Body again, and seeing the King of Sicil (d) come in with some fresh Troops began to fear the Loss of his new-gotten Victory, and immediately gave order to slay all the Prisoners except some of the greatest Quality, least they joining with the Enemy should prove their Destruction, which was accordingly done, but this fear soon vanished, for the King of Sicil drew off and would not fight after he saw the French Army routed, and so the King caused a Retreat to be sounded about four a Clock in the Afternoon, and the Soldiers having plundered the Slain and Wounded retreated with the King to the Village they lay in the Night before, and refreshed themselves well with the Provisions of the French Camp. The King himself sensible of the greatness of the Victory, which nothing but the Divine Power joining with such small Forces could have effected, called his Army together, and caused his Prelates and Chaplains in the most solemn Manner to give Thanks to God for it, singing this Psalm, When Israel came out of Egypt, and making every one to kneel on the Earth when they came to these Words, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy Name give the Praise, and then adding Te Deum and other Anthems, gave most devout Thanks and Praise to God. This Victory was obtain'd with little or no Loss to the English, for they lost only the Duke of York, Earl of Suffolk, with two or three Gentlemen more, and 26 Soldiers, or as the French Historians themselves relate, (e) 3 or 400. But the French lost 10000, among whom were the Lord Albret, the Constable, the Dukes of Barr, Brabant and Alençon, the Marshal, Admiral, and Master of the Horse, with 11 Counts and 18 great Lords, besides a great Number of Esquires and Gentlemen, and 1500 Prisoners; (f) among whom were the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ew and Richmond, Count de Vendosme, Son of the late Duke of Bretagne by

(z) Harding, an English Historian who was present at the Battel says, King Henry's Army consisted of no more than 9000 Men. Walsingham reports, that they were but 8000. And the French Historians do not pretend that they were above 25000. Whereas the same Authors, as well English as French agree, that the Constable's Army consisted of 150, or at least 140000 Men. Enguerant Monstrelet affirms, the Horse were 150000.

(e) The French Historians, Monstrelet and de Fenin say the contrary, the former, that the English lost 1700 Men, the latter 4 or 500, which is most likely. Caxton affirms, there were but 26 English Soldiers killed, and Walsingham says not many more, viz. the Duke of York, the Earl of Suffolk, four Knights, one Esquire and twenty eight common Soldiers. Of the French, Le Fevre, who was in the Battel, writes, that 10000 were killed, of which 100 were Princes and 7000 Nobles.

(f) The Prisoners according to Juvenal des Ursins were 14000, and all Authors agree, that they were as many as the Number of the English Army.

A. D. 1415. Reg. 3. the Q. Regent of England, (g) and many other Persons of Quality. The next Day after the Victory the French King sent Montjoy with four Herald's more to desire leave to bury the Dead and to have the Number of the Prisoners, which the King readily granted. But the French themselves had made them a miserable Spectacle, by stripping them of all their Cloaths, which the English had not meddled with, (for they took only Money and rich Things) and leaving them all Naked. This odious Spectacle so moved the Earl of Charilois, Son to the Duke of Burgundy, that he buried 5800 in one piece of Ground at his own Charge, because their Friends not knowing them neglected their Burial. The Bishop of Esquines a little after made the Ground into a Church-Yard in respect to the Bodies of so many Persons laid there.

K. Henry goes to Calis, and Duke of Burgundy punisheth the French who plunder'd the English Camp. The Fight being thus fortunately ended in favour of the English, King Henry having ordered the Slain to be decently buried went to see the Damage of his Camp, which tho' being considerable yet not to be recover'd, he resolv'd to proceed with all Expedition in his Journey to Calis without any further Care about it. But the Duke of Burgundy would not so pass it over, and considering that the Party who had plundered the English Camp, had cowardly deserted the Army in danger, and by pillaging the English for their own Private Gain had been the Cause that their Braver Brethren who were taken Captive in the Fight had been kill'd in cool Blood, he determin'd to punish the chief Commanders of them very severely; but his Son the Earl of Charilois being made their Friend by the Rich Present of King Henry's Sword, so effectually interceded with his Father that they were all spared. King Henry after two Days march arrived at Calis, carrying with him the Bodies of the Duke of York and Earl of Suffolk to be interred in England, and immediately dispatched a Messenger over into England to the Queen Regent with the News of this Signal Victory, which filled the Nation with an universal Joy; for the Te Deum was not only sung in all Churches of the Nation, but a mighty Procession of the Queen, Nobility and Clergy, Mayor, Aldermen and Companies of London was celebrated with extraordinary Solemnity and Devotion from St. Pauls to Westminster, where they all made a great Oblation at St. Edward's Shrine, and then returned in Triumph. The King himself remain'd at Calis a while intending to have pursued this Victory closely had the Season permitted him, but it proving very wet and unfit for Warlike Enterprizes, he thought it convenient to look after his Affairs in England, and taking Ship November the 16th, he arrived at Dover, November the 23d, having had a very troublesome and dangerous Passage. He brought with him his Chief French Prisoners, and was received with Processions and Triumphal Joy by his Nobles and other Subjects; and being by them conducted towards London, was met by the Mayor, Aldermen and Clergy of that City with like Processions, (h) and Attestations of Joy at St. Thomas of Waterings: But the King himself seem'd very little taken with these outward Ceremonies, and forbade that any Songs or Ballads should be made of this Victory, because it was solely from God, and he would have him have all the Honour of it. The Citizens made the King a Present of 1000 l. in Gold in two Basons of equal Value, which the King receiv'd of them with a cheerful Resentment of their Love and Respect to him, and so retreated to his Palace at Westminster, where he made it his first Care to bury the Bodies of the Duke of York at Fodringhey in Northamptonshire, and of the Earl of Suffolk at Embsay in Oxfordshire; (i) their Exequies being devoutly perform'd by the Arch-Bishops and most of the Bishops in St. Paul's Church by the King's Order. But the good Fortune of this Battel was not more joyfully received by the English Court and People than the bad Fate of it was lamented by the French, for the King and his Court were under heavy Perplexities, and the Dauphin of Viennois the Heir of the Crown took it so grievously, that he soon after died of mere Sorrow. Great Care was also taken to chose new Officers into the Places of such as were either slain, or had behaved themselves so, as by their Cowardize to be unworthy of future Employment: All which shew'd under what Fears and Distractions the French were in after this Victory; which though they thought to recover by fresh Forces and Officers, yet it was such a Terror to them that they never dar'd to attempt any thing considerable after.

The King being in England, the Earl of Dorset, Governour of Harfleur having a strong Body of Men under his Command, viz. 3000 English Men made an Inroad into Normandy almost as far as Roan where the King of France and his Court than lay, and got a great Booty of Money, Prisoners and Cattle; but it being heard at Roan the Earl of Arminack was sent to pursue him with 5000 Horse, who being newly made Constable was mighty desirous to gain himself Reputation by this Exploit, and thereupon followed them very hotly till he had overtaken them. The English unable to resist so strong a Force, were forced to withdraw into an Orchard well fenced with Ditches and Banks for their Security with the Loss of 300 of their Men and all their Prey. The French withdrew to Villemont, an adjoining Village that Night, and in the Morning pursued the English again as far as the Sand of Cheif de Caux, where setting upon them at a Disadvantage by reason of an Hill that hinder'd them from assisting each other, the English fell so fiercely upon them that they routed them wholly, and so got safely to Harfleur. The Constable was much blamed for his Rashness and Unskilfulness in this Exploit, and lost more Honour by his last ill Conduct than he got by his first good Fortune, and the English became more terrible for their Courage and Hardiness.

This Year the Order of the Church-Service Divers was changed throughout England from the Use of St. Paul to the Use of Sarum. On Candlemas-Day seven Dolphins were discovered playing in the River Thames, and four of them were taken.

The King on Munday, March the 16th summon'd his Parliament to meet at Westminster, and though he requir'd no Taxes in so great a War, yet he thought it necessary to summon his Great Council to settle Things well in his Absence, which he did by making several Benefi-

That Justices of the Peace shall Award a Capias to apprehend all such Persons, and imprison them to be tried by the Judges of Assize who should have Power to hear and determine all such Matters: And then was the Parliament Prorogued because of the Emperour's coming.

In the beginning of May, Sigismund the Emperour, Cousin-German to King Henry, and a very Wife and Learned Prince, came into England out of a pious Design to make Peace between the King's of England and France. He had been before in France and brought over with him the Arch-Bishop of Rhemes, an Agent for his Master the French King, who seem'd forward to conclude it. He was received at Calis honourably by the Earl of Warwick who was Governour there, and conveyed over to Dover in 30 great Ships. The King having Intelligence of his coming sent the Duke of Gloucester with a large Train of the Nobility to receive and entertain him, yet ordering them to meet him on the Shore with their drawn Swords, and to demand of him the Cause and Reason of his coming, whether it were as a Mediator of Peace only, and the King's Friend, or as an Emperour to claim England as a part of his Kingdom, if as the latter to resist his Entrance, but if as the former to give him a kind Welcome? Which they exactly performed entring into the Water with their drawn Swords in their Hands. The Emperour with a Smile mildly replied. That he came as the King's Friend and to make a Peace, and was then honourably conducted to Shore by 'em, and from thence to London. The King met him in Person at Black-beath, May the 7th, and carried him through London to Westminster, where he was lodged in the King's Palace. Albert, Duke of Holland came also about the same Time but staid not long. The Emperour was very earnest with the King for a Peace, and his Perswasions had almost wrought the King to a Compliance, but the French not giving over their Acts of Hostility while they knew Peace was in Agitation, but first falling upon the English about Roan, and then laying close Siege to Harsleur both by Sea and Land, so incensed the King of England, who by their Actions judged that they designed only to amuse him with Proposals of Peace till they could by Force reduce their Country, that he would not hearken to any further mention of it, but recalled his Ambassadors the Bishop of Norwich and Sir Thomas Erpingham out of France, resolving to prosecute the War with the utmost Vigour; whereupon the Emperour gave over further pressing the Peace between France and the King, and entred into a firm League with K. Henry himself to this Effect, viz. That the Emperour and King of England their Heirs and Successors would be Friends and Confederates to each other against all Persons whatsoever (the Church of Rome and Pope for the Time being only excepted). 2. That neither they nor their Heirs or Successors should be in any Council or other Place where either of them his Heirs or Successors should sustain any Damage in their Lands, Goods, Honour or Person. 3. That if either of them their Heirs or Successors should know of any Damage or Loss that was like to befall or happen to each other, they should give each other as speedy Information of it as they could conveniently. 4. That either of them their Heirs and Successors would use all lawful Means possible to advance the Honour and Interest of each other. 5. That neither of them would permit their Subjects to levy War against each other, and that it shall be lawful for the Subjects of both Nations to Traffick and Merchandize with each other without any Impediments. 6. That neither of 'em would wittingly receive and harbour, much less defend any Rebels or Traytors to them, but either resign them up to the injur'd Prince or drive 'em out of their Realm. 7. That neither of them should begin a War with any other Person but such as they now were at War with, without the Consent and Advice of each other, unless it were in case of necessary Defence of themselves or their Subjects and Dominions. Lastly, That it should be lawful for both of them to prosecute the War against France to recover their Rights so as should to them seem Expedient, and that they would afford each other Assistance in so doing. These Conditions and Agreements were sealed (k) October the 19th, 1416 and the Emperour having stay'd almost seven Months in England at the King's Charge, and being made a Knight of the Garter departed Home, and King Henry accompany'd him to Calis partly in Honour to him, and partly to look into the State of his Affairs on that side, where having taken his leave of the Emperour, and renew'd a League with the Duke of Burgundy for his Provinces of Flanders and Artois to continue to the Michaelmas Twelve-month following: He returned again into England to meet his Parliament, which had been adjourn'd till this Time for the Emperour's coming.

While the Emperour yet remain'd in England King Henry sent his Navy under the Command of his Brother John, Duke of Bedford to raise the Siege of Harfleur, which was secured and carried on by Sea by the French Fleet under the Command of the Viscount of Narbon, who was assisted by six large Genoa Gallies and several Carricks. The Duke zealous for the Honour of the King and Nation immediately pass'd over to Harfleur, and engaging with the French Navy, after a sharp Fight obtain'd a signal Victory, taking three Genoa Carricks, and in them the Bastard of Bourbon, Prisoner, the rest being all sunk or driven shatter'd into Brittain. The Emperour return'd to Callis, and was not accompanied, but follow'd by King Henry, who Embark'd at Sandwich, September the 4th, and arrived at Callis the same Day, the Emperour waiting on the Shore for his Landing.

The News of this speedy Deliverance of Harfleur being brought into England was astonishing to the Emperour, who heard of the Success of the English Fleet before he could have imagin'd them there, and with Admiration said to the King; 'Happy is the Nation who hath so good a King, but much more happier the King who hath such Valiant and Obedient Subjects.'

Fourth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

King Henry being return'd from Callis met his Parliament at Westminster, and having shew'd his Lords and Commons by his Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, the Bishop of Winchester, that tho' for the ease and quiet of his Subjects he had waved the pursuit of his Conquests which God had so Successfully begun, and condescended to disadvantageous Terms of Peace, yet the French had rejected all; and therefore since he could not give over the War with Honour, he hoped that they would give him such Supplies of Money as were Necessary for so great an Undertaking, which he did not doubt but would bring in greater Advantages to the Nation in a short time. The Parliament readily assented to his reasonable Desires, and having obtain'd his Assent to some Acts of Importance; 1. For punishing Masters who give greater Wages to Servants than is allow'd by Statute. 2. For confining Merchant-Strangers to certain Places of Residence in the Port-Towns. And 3. About granting Letters of Marque or Reprisal to Persons that have been wrong'd by any Foreigners who are at Peace with the King; they gave him a liberal Supply of Money, a Fifteenth of the Laity, and two Tenths of the Clergy. After this Gift of Money the King appointed his Brother John, Duke of Bedford, by and with the Advice and Consent of his Parliament, to be Regent of the Nation in his Absence, and made Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorset, in Consideration of his many faithful Services, Duke of Exeter, allowing him a Thousand Pound a Year out of his Treasury, and giving him Forty Pound a Year out of his Free-farm Rents in and about the City of Exeter, and the Parliament confirm'd both to him, and was soon after dissolved and sent into their Countries. In the Time of this Session of Parliament a Beggar was hang'd for a barbarous Cruelty which he had used in dismembring Children.

A. D. 1417. The King kept his Christmas at Killingworth-Castle in Warwickshire, where while he remain'd multitudes of Lampoons were scatter'd up and down the Nation against the Church-men, but especially in Noble-Men's Houses and in great Towns, as St. Albans, Northampton and Reading. The King was very much displeased at it, being sensible that the next way to bring Religion itself into Contempt and Disuse was to render the Ministers Contemptible, both which Things were equally abominable to him: Wherefore he used all Means to apprehend the Authors and Dispersers of them, and was so Zealous to vindicate their Reputation, that he was call'd, The Prince of Priests: But the Clergy were so generally hated, that they found none so much their Friends as to discover their malicious Enemies, that they might receive their condign Punishment, neither for Love to the King nor hopes of Reward.

K. Henry II. Expedition into France.

After Christmas the King set himself with all Diligence to make Preparations for his Second Expedition into France, lifting great Numbers of Soldiers, who being invited by the Success of the last Year offered themselves willingly to his Service, and hiring several Ships to Transport his Troops over into France. In the Spring he had gotten an Army of 25527 brave and lusty Men, and fifteen hundred Ships, but found his Charge so far to exceed the Supplies given him the last Parliament, that he was forced to borrow great Sums of Money to go on with his Design; for the Bishop of Winchester lent him Twenty Thousand Pound, for which he pawn'd his Crown to him, and the City of London lent him Ten Thousand Marks more, for which the King left them his Jewels as a Pledge. With this Money he put all Things in readiness for his Passage into France as soon as the Weather and Seas should favour him. These great Preparations in England being known in France, the French King endeavour'd to hinder his Passage by hiring many Ships and Carricks of Genoa, which being join'd to his own Navy, might not only infest the English Coasts, but keep the King of England and his Army from Landing in his Dominions; but the King of England was neither so hasty nor careless as to neglect this Danger, and though he was oblig'd to stay a little the longer, yet he took care to remove this Obstacle by sending his Fleet under the Command of John Holland, Earl of Huntington (1) to scour the Narrow Seas of all French Vessels, who accordingly did his Business so effectually, by taking some and sinking others, that the King waiting ready at Southampton for the first Opportunity of sailing over safely, took Shipping, and sailing from Portsmouth July the 28th, landed in Normandy August the 1st, at Beville, and immediately upon the Shore made Forty Eight Knights, of the most valiant and best of his Captains, that he might encourage them by these Marks of Favour to greater Boldness in the future Attempts. The News of the Arrival of the English was no sooner spread in Normandy, but all the People were affrighted, and fled either into the Wall'd Towns and Castles, or got them into Bretagne, leaving the Country open to the Will and Power of the Invaders, who having so much room left, soon made themselves Masters of the Towns and Cities.

Reg. 5.

Earl of Huntington clears the Seas for his Passage.

Several Castles and Towns taken by the English.

And the first Thing that the King undertook, after he had been at Harfleur and taken Notice of the Condition of it, was the Siege of Tonque-Castle, a Place not so Important in itself; (m) but because the King would not leave it behind him to annoy or infest his Army when it should be busied about any thing greater. The Duke of Gloucester managed the Siege with one part of the Army, and took it August the 9th, by Resignation. He made Sir Robert Kirkby Captain of it. The Earl of Salisbury while this was a doing besieged the Town and Castle of Ambervil-lers, and with like Success became Master of it. The King gave him the Lordship of the Town and Territories adjoining, and to his Heirs; which Gift, tho' the first of that Nature, much raised the Hopes of the Nobles, and made them dare great Things in confidence, that from such a Beneficent King the bravest Attempts should have the greatest Rewards. The Army being a little flushed with these Victories the King resolved upon a greater Enterprize, which was the Siege of Caen, one of the strongest and best Towns in Normandy, and in his March destroyed and plundered all the Villages in the Country leading up to it. The Town was well provided

In the Suburbs of Caen were several Goodly Churches and Monastries, which the King was very unwilling should be destroyed, not only for Piety sake, but because they might be a Refuge for his Army, and therefore he sent his Brother the Duke of Clarence to prevent the Destruction of them from the Inhabitants, who according to the usual Methods of those Times would set them on Fire upon the Approach of the Enemy, that they might not be an Harbour to them. The Duke of Clarence made all possible haste with a 1000 Men to save them, but before he could get thither the Citizens had set them on Fire, yet by his Diligence he saved the Abby-Church of St. Stephens and one Nunnery. The King with the whole Army came before the Town, August the 17th, and began the Siege of it, casting up high Banks and making deep Trenches to keep the Besieged from falling out upon them; several Assaults he made against it, but to his own Loss, wherefore he resolved to trust to his Mines, and therefore set all his Pioneers to Work, by whom he so undermined the Walls, that they stood upon a few Posts only, ready to fall when there was Occasion. The Besieged he kept always awake with continual Alarms, that being weakened with much Watching they might be unable to make any considerable Resistance. When all Things were ready for a general Assault, he sent an Herald to them to offer them Mercy if they would resign their Town; but they having Promises of Relief rejected all Proposals of Peace, and so the King storm'd the Place and took it by Force, September the 8th, slaying all Persons that were in Arms against him. All the Arms that were in the Town he commanded to be brought into the Market-place, and all the Chief Magistrates he summoned to the Senate-House, and, such as had been most Stubborn and Inflexible in resisting him, he caused to be put to Death, and the rest he fined. The Fury of the Soldiers in plundering, insulting and cruelly killing their Enemies, upon such Success, he so far restrained by his Care and Prudence, that he was not thought a more Fortunate than Wise Commander; yet he took such Care to reward every one's Labour and Valour in the Siege by giving them a Share in the Plunder, that they were better contented with the King's Liberality than if they had been left to Carve for themselves. The Castle still held out after the Town was taken; but because they perceived that no Relief came according as they were promised, and it was impossible for them to hold out long without it against so great an Army, they yielded, September the 20th, upon a Capitulation, that the Captain and Soldiers might safely depart whether they pleased. King Henry Peopled the Town with English. The Example of this City was so terrifying, that Fourteen other smaller Towns and Castles immediately resigned to K. Henry, and upon their taking an Oath of Fidelity to him he continued the Captains in their Offices, and suffer'd the Inhabitants to enjoy their Lands and Estates in as large or more ample manner as they had enjoyed them at any time before. Caen being then orderly settled under English Officers, viz. Sir Gilbert Umphreville, who was made Captain of the Town, Sir John Popham, Bailiff, and Sir Gilbert Talbot, Captain of the Castle, the King pursued his Victories, taking Coursy-Castle, Argenton, Alanzon, and Sees with little or no Opposition, and appointing English Captains over 'em, and then he returned to Caen, where he put in

Caen, a Chief Town in Normandy besieged and taken by Storm.

The Castle of Caen surrendered.

Execution his Proclamation which he had before put out, commanding all the Inhabitants of Normandy who were fled from their Habitations, to return again by a certain Day perfix'd, or else he would give their Lands to his Soldiers; whereupon he conferred on the Duke of Clarence the Viscounties of Ange, Orb, and Fontenz, with all the other Lands of such as did not return according to his Command. While the King was thus busied himself with part of his Army, the other parts whom he had sent out under his several Commanders with equal Success enlarged his Conquests: For the Earl of Warwick, and Lord Talbot took the Strong Castle of Dampfront, The Duke of Clarence took Courton, Barry, Bechelovin, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Crevener, Anvilliers and Fresny. The Duke of Gloucester, with the Earl of March, and Lord Grey of Codnor took the whole Island of Constantine, except Cherburg, and placed English Captains in them.

While the English thus carried on their Victories, the Kingdom of France was unable to put any stop to the impetuous Current. The King himself was not fit to attempt any thing of that Nature through his Indisposition of Mind, being afflicted with long and frequent Fits of a Frenzy, which made him not able to govern, much less to act in such Difficulties and Dangers. The Duke of Burgundy, who at that time was by the Queen's means constituted the Regent of the Kingdom in hatred to her Son Charles the Dauphin, was engaged so much upon her Account to execute a Female Revenge upon the Dauphin, that he could not attend to the more necessary War against Henry, who sought the Conquest of them both; though it may be thought, that if the Duke of Burgundy had been at Liberty, he would have made but a very feeble Resistance against the King of England, with whom he was in League for the Preservation of his own Countries in Flanders and Artois. The Dauphin, Charles was the only Person really solicitous for the Good of his Country, and was willing to have run the utmost Hazards to have rescued it from the Power of the Invader; but he had neither Friends nor Money to go on with his Design, till the Count De Arminack had advised him to seize upon his Mother's Jewels, Plate and Money, by which indeed he was enabled to raise some Forces for the Defence of the Kingdom, but thro' his Mother's Malice he was compell'd to make use of them another way, viz. to chastise her Fury and Burgundy's Folly, who to gain her Favour was forced to be the Instrument of her Revenge. While these Civil Broils were carried on by the French, King Henry was very diligent to improve this Advantage, and with wonderful Celerity run over Normandy, and laid such a Foundation for the Conquest of France, that the most hearty Union and strongest Forces could hardly have prevented it.

But though the French themselves thro' their Civil Discords did nothing against the English, yet they instigated their Old Friends the Scots to invade England, and that so powerfully as to draw the King himself, if it were possible, out of France; for they entred with a strong Army, and besieged the Castles of Barwick and Roxborough. And that they might have either the Assistance of the English themselves, or meet with a more faint Opposition, they brought along with them a Person whom they pretended to be King Richard, but to little Purpose; for though the Earl of Westmerland, who was the Lord Warden of the Marches, was not then at Hand to defend the Borders, yet the Gentry of the Northern Parts were Active to raise the Forces of the Countries,

The Arch-Bishop himself, though unfit to ride, yet to encourage the Soldiers march'd with them, being carried in a Chariot: But the Scots hearing of the Greatness of the English Army, which in the King's Absence they thought impossible to be raised, departed in a Fright, and dar'd not stay their Approach, leaving the Sieges unperfect which they had begun.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. About the Feast of St. Andrew, John, Duke of Bedford, then Regent of the Nation in the King's Absence, did by his Order call a Parliament at Westminster to represent to them the Charge of the War, and obtain further Supplies for carrying it on, which he obtain'd with no Difficulty, viz. a Fifteenth of the Laity and Tenth of the Clergy. Few or no Acts pass'd this Session: But the Tryal and Condemnation of the Lord Cobham made it as Remarkable as others, which was after this manner. The Lord Cobham having for four Years space shifted from Place to Place to secure himself from his Enemies, but being for the most part in Wales, was at length discovered to the Lord Powis to be in a part of his Barony, call'd Powisland. This Peer, a zealous Patriot of the Church, knowing how acceptable a piece of Service it would be to the King, as well as a Reward to himself, sent a certain Number of Men to seize and apprehend him, but it proved so desperate an Attempt, that they ran great Danger of their Lives; for the said Lord who had been always bred up in War, and a Person of undaunted Courage stood upon his own Defence, and dangerously Wounded several of the Aggressors, but being over-powered and disabled by several Wounds he had receiv'd in the Contest, he was at length taken, and being carried up to London by the Lord Powis, was imprison'd in the Tower for his Tryal: With him were taken several Books which seem'd to reflect some Disgrace on the Way of Worship then in Use, viz. Mass-Books with the Faces of the Saints and Heads scraped out, and their Names blotted out of the Litany, which were delivered to the Arch-Bishop, and by his Means exposed to the Sight of the Auditors at the Sermons of St. Paul's Cross by the Preachers, who aggravated the Guilt of the Fact, and accused him and his Party of doing Injury to the Saints in Heaven. The People being thus wrought upon to think his Death deserved, he was at length brought before the Parliament to be examin'd and try'd; and the former Sentence against him being read, which he did not much Oppose, he was condemn'd to be hang'd and burnt, hanging in St. Giles's Fields, which Sentence he accordingly suffered upon Christmas Day. The Lord Powis who had been the chief Instrument in his Apprehension, had the particular Thanks of the Houses given him for his Pains, and the Parliament took effectual Care to put all former Statutes against the Lollards in Execution. The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury in his Convocation then sitting made an Ecclesiastical Constitution, That all Suffragan-Bishops and their Arch-Deacons should twice a Year make a diligent Inquisition after all Persons suspected of Heresy; and for the most certain discovery of all such Persons,

The Arch-Bishop of Canterbury in his Convocation then sitting made an Ecclesiastical Constitution, That all Suffragan-Bishops and their Arch-Deacons should twice a Year make a diligent Inquisition after all Persons suspected of Heresy; and for the most certain discovery of all such Persons, their Favourers and Books, he ordered, that they should Swear two or three Persons in every Parish to give a distinct Information, if any such Persons inhabited in their Parishes; thus hoping to crush the whole Sect, now the Head and Leader of them was taken off. But yet notwithstanding this Zeal shewed for the Doctrine of the Church, it is Remarkable, that the same Parliament stood up very manfully against the Encroachments of the Pope: For whereas Pope Martin V. had sent over into England to require a Tenth of the Clergy to carry on the War against the Bohemian Hereticks, they made an Act, That the Church and all Estates of the Realm of England should enjoy their Ancient Liberties, which were not Repealed nor Repealable by the Common-Law, by which they chiefly intended to exclude the Pope's Jurisdiction.

In the time of the Regency of the Duke of Bedford, Queen Joan was accused of a Contrivance with her Confessor Fryer Randolph, to put the King to Death by Sorcery, and was thereupon apprehended with her Confessor, and she was first Imprison'd in the Castle of Leeds, and after in the Castle of Pemsley, and he in the Tower of London, where while he lay he happen'd to fall into an hot Dispute with the Chaplain of St. Peter's Church in the said Tower, and coming to Blows was slain by him. The Queen was not long after brought to her Tryal, was found innocent of the Crime laid to her Charge, and was thereupon released from her Confinement. (n)

While these Things were transacting in England, the King was busied about the Siege of the Town and Castle of Falaise, which he had begun in the beginning of November. The Town made a brave Resistance, but being reduced to great Straits for want of Provision, they desired to Capitulate the 20th of December, and agreed, that they would resign the Town to the King upon the 2d of January if they had no Relief from their King or the Dauphin, to which K. Henry assented, and accordingly the Town was delivered up to him upon these Articles.

I. That all the Strangers that were in the Town should be left to the King's Mercy, and the English to his Justice to be punished for their Treason in fighting against their King, as they deserved.

II. That all the English Prisoners in the Town should be set at Liberty without any Ransom, acquitted from the Oaths made to them whose Prisoners they were.

III. That no Goods should be carry'd out of the Town, but the Soldiers should depart without any Damage to their Horses or Arms.

IV. That none of the Inhabitants of the Town should receive the Persons or Goods of any within the Castle, nor give any Relief in Victuals or Ammunition to them.

All which Articles were observed, and the King took Possession of the Town: But the Castle still held out; and tho' the King used all the Arts of War to reduce it, yet it kept him out a Month longer and then beat a Parley, Feb. 2. and came to Conditions of Resignation on Feb. 16. following, if they had no Relief come to them before that time from their King, Dauphin, or Earl of Arminack, which not receiving the Castle was put into the King's Hands by Sir Oliver Manny, Governour of the Castle, and all the Persons in it resigned themselves to the King's nify them in Life or Goods, and accordingly they were all dismissed and sent away free, only Sir Oliver Manny was detain'd till the Castle was repair'd at his Charge. Falaise being thus conquered the King divided his Army into three Parts, and sent them out under the Conduct of the Dukes of Gloucester and Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, to take the lesser Towns in his Way to a greater Attempt which he design'd shortly to Enterprize, which was the Siege of Roan, the Chief City of Normandy, with which all the Country must be his.

Reg. 6. On Easter Day in the Afternoon in St. Dun- stan's Church in the East in Sermon time hap-pen'd such a terrible Example of Female Pride as no History can match. The Ladies of the Lord Strange and Sir John Trussel, two Women of high Spirits and implacable Hatred one to another, met at the Sermon, and being in the same Pew vied so eagerly for Superiority (tho' in that Place Humility had been the greatest Sign of Gentility) that thro' their rude Behaviour one to another they caused their Husbands to engage in their Quarrel, and draw their Swords to revenge the Disgrace done to each others Wife. The Congregation was much al-arm'd at this impious Fray, and several Persons who were much troubled at the unseasonable Disturbance of the Publick Devotion of that Day, in which most of the People had receiv'd the Sacrament, bestirred themselves much to appease their Fury and part them, but all in vain.
 These incensed Gentlemen would not hearken to any Advice, but looked upon them who sought to pacify them as their Enemies, and wounded several of them, and killed one Thomas Petwarden a Fishmonger, dwelling at Sprat's Key.
 But at length they were both seized for this Fact and imprison'd in the Counter in the Poultry. The Arch-Bishop having an Account of this Notorious Misdemeanour, excommunicated the Offenders both in St. Paul's Church, and in all the other Parish-Churches of London, and suspended the Church wherein it was done from all Holy Services as defiled with Blood, and that a due Penance might be inflicted upon the Authors of it, sat in St. Magnus Church, April the 21st, upon an Inquisition to examine who were the Persons chiefly concern'd in it. The Lord Strange and his Wife upon full hearing were prov'd the Delinquents, and for this Prophane Act injoy-ned this following Penance, viz. That on May the 1st, all their Servants should go before the Parson of St. Dunstan's in their Shirts from St.
Paul's to his Church, the Lord and Lady following him, the former bare-headed, and the latter bare-footed, Renald Kenwood the Arch-Deacon of London following them: That at the Consecration of the Church (which they had Pro-phaned and polluted) the Lady should fill all the Vessels with Water, and offer an Ornament of Ten Pound Value to the Altar, and her Husband a Pix of Five Pound Value, which being done accordingly by way of a Satisfactory Penance they were absolved. The Murder of Tho- mas Petwarden in this Examination seems not to have been regarded, because there was no Prosecutor; for the Lord Strange had made his Widow a large Satisfaction, and so escaped the Punishment of his Crime.

About this Time the general Council of Con- stance broke up having sat three Years: In it the three Antipopes were all deposed, and Otho Ce-

lonna was chosen Pope by the Name of Martin V.
Richard Clifford, Bishop of London (o) was first nominated for Pope by the Committee appointed by the Council for the Election; for as all the English Clergy were reputed among the most Eminent for Learning, so none was thought fitter for Pope than one of them. But the Bishop named, through Modesty and other Considerations, put off the Dignity to the Person who was first named by him and after chosen. The Prior of St. John supported the Triple Crown at his Instalment and Coronation. By this Council
Wickliff's Books were condemn'd for Heretical; John Huss, and Jerom of Prague (tho' they had the Emperour Sigismund's Letters of safe Conduct) were accused, condemn'd and burnt for Heresie, notwithstanding the many Petitions sent by the Bohemians to the Council to beg their Lives, and they were much lamented by them.
St. Bridgit was Canoniz'd, and England accounted one of the Five chief Nations of Europe and reckon'd before Spain.

Normandy being almost all come into the Power of the English, the Lawful Proprietors of it, the King resolv'd upon the Compleat Conquest of that whole Country, and thereupon sent the Duke of Gloucester to besiege Cherburg a considerable Port and a strong Town in the Isle of Con- stantine, while his Recruits which he had sent for into England of 15000 Men could arrive, with which he intended to Besiege Roan. Cherburg being very well provided for a Siege which they expected made a strong and valiant Resistance;
 and tho' the English by their Batteries, frequent Assaults, Mines and other Warlike Devices an-noy'd the Besieged, and sought an Entrance into it, yet they made such a good Defence, that they kept them out, till at length they were forced by Famine more than the Sword to Condition to deliver up the Town to the King of Eng- land if no Relief was sent to them within Sixty Days, which they did not doubt of, because the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy, who had hitherto spent that Time and Force one against another, which should have been employ'd against the Invading Enemy, were made Friends by the Intercession of the Pope and Cardinals, and were at Liberty to mind the Nation's Interest better:
 But their Hopes and well-grounded Expectations proved in vain, and they were obliged to surrender their Town and Castle the last Day of November to the Duke, who made the Lord
Gray of Codnor the King's Lieutenant there, but dying soon after, Sir Walter Hungerford succeeded him. While these Things were doing at Cherburg the King receiv'd his Recruits out of England, and soon after set forward to Besiege
Roan, taking some smaller Fortresses in his Way, viz. Louviers, and Pont de Larche, which standing on each side the Seine was with some Difficulty encompassed: But the King by an ingenious Device of Wicker-boats laid over the River begirt it so closely that they were forced to surrender it within Fifteen Days. (p) From hence the King with all his Forces march'd to Roan, and sat down before it, July the 30th. The Citizens, who had long expected this woful Day, had made as strong a Provision as was possible, for they had train'd 15000 of their Body in Arms, and had got a 1000 choice Soldiers from the Duke of Burgundy; they had laid into the Town Ten Months Provision, and burnt the Suburbs that they might not be an Harbour or Relief to their Enemies. The King of England

A. D. 1418. being come before the Town summon'd the Inhabitants to surrender the Keys to him by Wind-
Reg. 6. for the Herald; but they gave him this resolute Answer, That they had received none of him, and therefore would deliver up none to him, and thereupon made a brisk Sally out of the Town upon the King's Forces, but were driven back again with the Loss of thirty of their Men. The King after this made many Assaults upon the Town, but to little or no Purpose; for the Citizens were very Numerous, being above 200000 Men, and behav'd themselves with so much Boldness and Valour (for they had sworn never to resign the City to the English so long as they could hold their Swords in their Hands) that the Besiegers could get no Advantage of them; wherefore it was thought the most prudent Course to block up all Avenues into the City and starve them, which their great Number made them liable to the sooner, and to that end the English Navy which was made up of 100 Sail of Ships, was brought up the Seine to hinder all Relief by Water, and certain Ships sent by the King of Portugal to assist the King were laid at the Seien's Mouth to prevent all access up the River to them. The Lord (q) Kilmahin also came out of Ireland with 1600 Irish Men well Arm'd and Disciplin'd to help the King in this Siege, and they were very Serviceable to the English in the Blockade; for by the Help of these Men he kept the City so closely Besieg'd, that there were no Avenues possible to it. While the King lay idle and without Action about the Town, he sent the Earl of Warwick to summons Candebeec, and Fourteen other Fortresses which lay at a small Distance round about, to surrender to him, but they answer'd him, That they would follow the Fate of Roan, and would resign quietly if that City were taken without Relief, which the King was contented to yield to, because he could not well spare sufficient Forces to subdue them from Roan, and so much the rather, because the Duke of Burgundy had promised the Inhabitants to raise the Siege. This made the King not only to keep his Army together, but to cast up a Trench round about it, and fill it with Spikes that the French might not Surprize them or remove the Siege. The Duke of Burgundy either not able to attempt so great a Matter, or else despairing of Success did not undertake it, but only sent his Soldiers to annoy the English Conquests at Kilbeuf, Eureux and Laviers, where they were with no great Difficulty repulsed by the English Garrisons. About December, which was full four Months after the Siege was begun, the City of Roan began to be much pressed for Victuals, and put out of their Gates many useless People who consumed their Provisions, but did no good in the Defence of the Place, and they miserably perished under the Walls, because the King of England would not suffer them to pass through the Army, yet in honour to Christ he gave them Relief upon the Day of his Nativity. The Inhabitants of the Town, notwithstanding this Ease of their useless Brethren, yet underwent by Christmas so great a want of Corn and other Food, that they were forced to eat Dogs, Cats, Horses, Rats and Mice, and drink Vinegar; yet they held out so long, that there died above 50000 of Famine, and had not at last yielded had there been any possibility of Relief; but being sorely Oppressed with Famine they came to a Parley upon New-Years-Day, and after several Meetings for Eight Days together, nothing being concluded, the People of the Town were so enrag'd with the Governour and Burgeses, because they did not yield to the King of England's Demands, that they threatned to slay 'em and deliver up the City to his Mercy unless they did it speedily: Whereupon they desiring another Meeting, it was fully agreed and accorded,

I. That the City and Castle of Roan should be deliver'd up to the King of England, at any time after Jan. 19. if no Relief came to them before, upon his Demand.

II. That all the Captains and People whatsoever, being and dwelling within the said Town and Castle, should be left entirely to the Mercy of the said King.

III. That they should pay to the said King 300000 Scutes of Gold, of which every two Scutes should be worth an English Noble.

IV. That every Soldier and Stranger being in the said Town or Castle, should swear upon the Evangelists before their Departure, not to bear Arms against the King of England in any Place whatsoever before the First of January next ensuing.

V. That the Inhabitants of the Town should receive the Poor People lying in the Ditches about it to their Habitations, and allow 'em sufficient Provision till Jan. 19.

These Articles with others of less Importance were sealed, Jan. 16. and on the 20th the King entred the City in a most Triumphant manner. The Clergy of the City with Forty Crosses, and Burgers meeting him to welcome him, by whom he was conducted to the Cathedral Church of our Lady to give solemn Thanks for the Conquest of it. Then the King went to the Castle to receive the Homages of the Burgeses, and having made Proclamation, that all Persons that would swear Allegiance to him should enjoy their Lands and Estates, many submitted to him, and he confirm'd all their Liberties and Properties and Priviledges to them. The Captain of the Town Alain Blanchart was beheaded, the Garrison was pillag'd and put out of the Town. Guy de Boutellier, Captain-General of the City-Forces submitted to King Henry, and had his Estate restor'd, and a Place given him under the Duke of Gloucester. Thus was Roan again in the Power of the English, after the French had been Masters of it 215 Years, and King Henry having re-edified the Castle and Walls, and built another strong Tower to keep the Towns-men in their Obedience, made it the Chief Chamber in Normandy, and order'd his Treasury, Mint and Exchequer to be settled there at the Suit of the Bishops and Abbots.

After the Surrender of Roan the several Castles which had agreed to resign upon that Surrender, yielded themselves up to King Henry, and he sent out his Captains to take in others, as Castle-Galliard, Vernon, Nantes, Baudmout, and many others, the King himself remaining still at Roan. The Duke of Burgundy (who rul'd all under the King of France and was upon that account hated by the Dauphin, tho' the outward Signs of Enmity were laid aside) seeing the Current of King Henry's Fortune to be irresistible, desir'd a Conference with him to establish a Peace between the Two Realms, and accordingly a Meeting for them was appointed at Melan and agreed on; but it prov'd nothing but a complimentary Enterview, for they came to no Conclusion, because the Demands of the King of England were thought too unreasonable to be comply'd with, whereupon they parted with some Heat: King Henry telling the Duke, That with the Dauphin, that by their united Forces they might put some stop to his Victories. This Meeting inflam'd K. Henry's Courage, and with fresh Vigour he prosecuted the War, for he immediately surpriz'd Ponthoife and got the Town without Resistance; for the Captain Lisle Adam fled with all the Inhabitants, the English having scal'd the Walls and let in 3000 upon them before they could be provided to oppose them. The News of this Conquest being carried to Paris so terrify'd the King, Queen, and Duke of Burgundy that they fled from Paris to Troyes in Champagne, leaving that City under the Command of the Count de St. Paul, and the Chancellor Eustace de Laitre. About Candlemas the King left Roan and went to Eureux, where the Dauphin profered him a Meeting at Dreux to make a Peace, but disappointed the King, so that in great Displeasure he return'd to Eureux, and sent

Reg. 7. out the Earl of Warwick to besiege La Roch-guion, which being taken Apr. 6. the King gave the Command of it to Sir Guy Butler, the Duke of Exeter to Castle-Galliard, and the Duke of Gloucester to Tvery, which he obtain'd with the Castle, May 13. The Duke of Clarence won Gisors, and the Earl of Huntington burnt Friaux, Bretenil, Clermont and the Castle of Vendueil, by all which Conquests the English over-ran all the Country about Chartres, and brought the French into great Distress, which was to all considering Men among 'em the more Insupportable, because there appear'd no Hopes of Recovery.

K. Henry aims to get Paris.

King Henry having now made great Progress into the Country began to cast his Eye upon Paris, which being the Metropolis of the Nation would be a certain Means to gain the whole, if he could become Master of it, and to that end sent out his Army under the Duke of Clarence to subdue the little Towns that lay in his Passage, as St. Germans-en-Lay, Meulan, Montjoy, and many others, by which having clear'd his Way he sent the Duke of Clarence to take a View of that City, and tho' he spent Two Days in surveying the Walls of it, yet none appear'd against him they were all so terrified at the Approach of the English. But the more Prudent and Grave Persons seeing their Danger, and considering that the Fate of France depended upon the Welfare of that City, entred into a Consultation how to secure themselves and save their Nation: And since a Peace had lately been proclaim'd between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy in their City and Amiens, they endeavoured by all means to draw them to unite their Forces that they might rescue the Kingdom from the Power of the Conquerour; for tho' the English had under their Valiant King got no small part of their Country, yet it was chiefly thro' the civil Dissentions of the Heads and Governours of their Nation. They were still strong enough to recover all if they could bring their Leadeers to an hearty Union, which they thought it no hard matter to do by uniting their Two Heads together: And to this End by much Labour and Intercession wth those two great Persons they brought them to an Interview at Monstreusur-fault-yonne. The Dauphin here not forgetting the Wrongs which he had had from the Duke of Burgundy, whose present Greatness was built upon his Ruins, and was thought as well by others as himself to tend much to his Disreputation, believ'd this a seasonable Time to vindicate his own Title and Right to the Crown. He reproach'd him for usurping that Authority which was properly belonging to himself, charging him with breach of Promise in not withdrawing his Garrisons agreed upon to be remov'd by their League of Amity, and continuing the Civil War. The Duke knowing this no seasonable Time for Justification, least it should make a Breach, humbled himself on his Knees to the Dauphin, and made a modest Excuse for his Actions, hoping to pacifie him by a mild Answer and so unite for the Nation's Good; but while he remain'd on his Knees his Sword entangling in his Legs, he laid his Hand upon it to remove it, which the Dauphin's Followers observing immediately cry'd out, Do you draw your Sword against the Dauphin? At which Words Tanneguy de Chatel, a Knight in great Favour with the Dauphin struck him with his Battle-Ax and cut off his Chin, and others encourag'd by his Example fell upon him with their Swords and kill'd him. This Fact made the Breach wider than before, and the Dauphin got himself a more zealous and furious Party of Enemies than ever, for the Queen was enraged for the Loss of her Favourite, and the Earl of Charlois of his Father, who being encourag'd to revenge his Death by her, was resolv'd by all means to prosecute so bloody and barbarous a Murther, which was the more Odious to all Men, because it was committed under the sacred shew of Friendship, and so it tended much to the Damage of the Publick, which the Duke neglected his Guard to unite for the Defence of.

While the Union between the Duke of Burgundy and Dauphin was thus driving on, King Henry was very Active to compleat his Conquests, and strengthen himself against their Conjoyn'd Forces, like a Wise Prince providing against the utmost Danger which could be suspected; for after he had taken several other Towns, as Veulquissin, Chaumont, Neufle and Dangu, he put strong Garrisons into them, and put them under the Command of such of his Captains as he knew most faithful to himself, most æmulous of the English Honour, and most courageous in the most daring Attempts. Normandy which was now wholly under his Power unless Mount St. Michael, he was as careful to keep in their Obedience by putting their chief Towns into his best Friends Hands, viz. he made the Lord Bourchier his Lieutenant at Deep, the Earl of Warwick at Aumarl, Sir John Gedding at Cherburg, and others of like Fidelity in other Principal Towns. The King himself kept his Christmas at Roan, having a stout Army about him ready to oppose any Accidents or sudden Assaults. But when he saw that the desir'd Union between the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy was quite broken by the Murther of the latter, he then began to be secure against any present Resistance, and sent out part of his Army under the Earl of Salisbury to besiege Tresny, which resisted them courageously, but was at length surrendred up to him for the King's Use; the Earls of Marshal and Huntington, Sir John Green-Cornwal, Sir Philip Leech, and divers others to subdue the Country of Maine, where the Dauphin had a Garrison at Mens, and a strong Force in the adjoining Territories: With these the English were encountred briskly, but after a sharp Battel became Conquerours, with the Slaughter of 5000 French Men, and taking 200 Prisoners, among whom was the Marshal de Rou, and divers other Persons of Eminency. The greatest part also of the Country came into their Power.

These Successes following upon the former soon brought the Queen and Young Duke of Burgundy to a Resolution in their Design, which was to revenge themselves upon the Dauphin for the Murther of the Old Duke of Burgundy his Father. Fortune had made Henry so much her unchangeable Favourite, that they judg'd it in vain to oppose the Current of his Victories. It seem'd to them to be an immutable Decree of the Fates, that France must be subject to him; and therefore they thought it much better to submit upon the best Terms they could make, than spin out a little Time and come under the Conquerour's Will; for by this means the King might perhaps hold his Crown for Life (which was as much as he need desire, the Dauphin being so undutiful and unworthy to Inherit) and the Blood of Thousands of People be sav'd which otherwise must necessarily perish in the Quarrel. Wherefore it was fully resolv'd and agreed upon by the Queen, Duke, and all their Party, who were then at Troyes in Champaign, that Ambassadors should be sent to the King of England to treat about a Peace for the good of both Sides, and Preservation of the Kingdom, which was accordingly done presently: But King Henry being often before deluded with the French Men's pretended Offers of Peace, would give no heed to their Proposals, as being intended only to stop the Current of his Arms, which he would by no means suffer to be interrupted, and therefore sent them away without an Answer according to their Desires, and went on in his Conquests, which scarce a Day passed but he something enlarg'd, and he never accepted but with a very thankful Heart to God the Giver of them. The Return of the French Ambassadors was very unacceptable at Troyes; but understanding that the former delusive Tender made by the Dauphin and the Old Duke of Burgundy were the Cause of the King's Distrust, and not any Averseness in himself either from his Vain-glory or Success, they dispatch'd the same Ambassadors back again to assure K. Henry of the Queen and Duke of Burgundy's real Intentions, and their Willingness to come to a Peace as Honourable and Advantageous to him, as they desir'd it shuld be Safe to them. King Henry, hearing this, was not willing to be thought Implacable and Cruel; and tho' he came over into France to gain his Inheritance by Conquest, yet 'twould be much better to obtain it peaceably if it were possible, especially since the Continuance of the Quarrel would cause the Effusion of so much Christian Blood on both Sides, began to listen to their Proposals, and sending the Earl of Warwick and Bishop of Rochester to the Duke of Burgundy to be better ascertain'd in Matters, after Two or Three times passing backward and forward, and much Intercession made by the Bishop of Arras, and other Persons of Quality, they at length came to an Agreement on certain Articles upon Condition, That the French King and his Parliament or Assembly of Estates would assent to them, which could not be much doubted of since all Things at Court were managed by the Queen, the Duke of Burgundy and his Friends: However for Form sake K. Henry sent a solemn Embassy to the Duke of Burgundy, sufficiently Authorized to treat and conclude of all Matters then under Debate, who was to conduct 'em to Troyes in Champaign, where the French King then was, to procure his Confirmation of them. The Persons employ'd in this great Affair were the Duke of Exeter, the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Ely, Lord Fanhope, the Lord Fitz-hugh,

Sir John Robfert, and Sir Philip Hall, who arriv'd at Troyes, March 11. in the Company of the Duke of Burgundy, and after a few Days entering into Consultation with the French Ministers, it was agreed and concluded between them, that King Henry should come to Troyes and marry the Lady Katherine, and after the Celebration of the Marriage a firm Peace, already concluded, and finish'd upon certain Articles, should then be seal'd and fully ratified by both Kings, and all the Nobles of the Realm of France, and other Estates, as well Spiritual as Temporal, and also the Cities and Commonalties, Citizens and Burgesses that were at that Time subject to the French, the King should take their Corporal Oath for the due and true Observation of them.

The Model of the Treaty being thus drawn up in the full Sense and Purport of it, tho' not reduced to Form, the Ambassadors for the King of England return'd again to their Master, leaving only Sir John Robfert behind to attend on the Princess Katherine, and gave him a full Account of what had passed, and how far they had gone in the Peace; with which King Henry, who was then at Roan, was so well contented, that he immediately gave Order for a speedy Preparation for his going to Troyes; and all Things being ready, he began his Journey, May 8. He was accompany'd with his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Huntington, Ew, Tankervil and Longevil, with (r) 15000 Men of War. He went from Roan to Ponthoise, and by St. Dennis to Charenton, where he pass'd the Bridge over the Seine, but left a strong Detachment under the Command of Sir William Gascoigne to keep the Passage. Then entering Brie in Champaigne he besieg'd and took the Town of Crispy, which was kept against him by the Dauphin's Party, hanging the Chief Governour, and carrying some others of the Principal Men Prisoners with him. From hence he pass'd by Provins and Nogent to Troyes. He was met by the Duke of Burgundy, and a great Number of the Nobility Two Leagues from the Town, and by them conducted to his Lodgings prepar'd for his Reception. He arriv'd, May 18. and after Two or Three Days rest to refresh himself he, went to visit the French King and Queen and Princess Katherine, and within few Days being affianced to the Princess Katherine in St. Peter's Church, the Agreement before concluded by his Ambassadors was alter'd in many Particulars, and then sign'd and fully ratified, both Kings swearing upon the Holy Evangelists inviolably to observe and keep all the Conditions and Covenants therein Specified and Concluded. After this the Duke of Burgundy and the Nobles present took an Oath to King Henry, who by the Articles sign'd was to have the Regency of France during the King's Life, and after him to enjoy the Sovereign Power of that Kingdom absolutely for himself and Heirs, in this Form.

Ego Philippus Burgundie Dux, &c. which is thus render'd into English: I Philip, Duke of Burgundy do swear upon the Holy Evangelists, for myself and my Heirs, to Henry, King of England, and Regent of France (s) under King Charles, that We will humbly and faithfully obey King Henry in all Things which concern the Crown and Civil Government of France, and after the Death of King Charles our present Sovereign will be faithful and obedient Subjects to the said King Henry and his Successors for ever; nor will we receive or quietly submit to any other King of France but King Henry and

The same Oath did all the Bishops and Peers of France then present take to King Henry, and then upon the Third (†) of June, being the Munday after Trinity-Sunday, the Marriage between King Henry and the Princess Katherine was solemniz'd and compleated, and King Henry thereupon declar'd and proclaim'd Regent and Heir to the Crown France. After these Things King Henry entertain'd the King, Queen, and all the Peers of France which had sworn Allegiance to him, and attended his Nuptials, at a Magnificent Banquet, and at the Table declar'd, That as it had been the main Subject of his Labours and Endeavours to unite the Kingdoms of France and England under One Government, which now by God's Providence he had effected, so it should be his daily Care to rule them both with that Justice, and in that Order as may make them the Happiest Monarchy upon Earth: And tho' I am an English Man born, yet much French Blood runs in my Veins, which with that fresh Alliance that I have to you by Marriage so inclines my Affections to you, that you may assure your selves of an equal Share of my Favours and Love as my natural Subjects of England; and so long as you defend my Right by your Aid and Assistance, you shall never fail of that Love and Defence which may be expected from your King, who like a Father of your Country will cherish and protect you as his Children. When the Banquet was ended the Kings and Queens tarry'd a few Days at Troyes, and then took their Journey to Paris, where they were receiv'd with outward Demonstrations of Joy and Welcome, and the English were entertain'd with Feastings by the Parisians.

The Articles of Peace between K. Henry and the French King at large.

Peace being thus settled in both the Kingdoms of France and England to the general Satisfaction of the Subjects of both, it was thought necessary by K. Henry that Copies of the Treaty thus made should be fairly Written, and being sent into every City and Market-Town in both Kingdoms be proclaim'd and openly publish'd to all Persons; which Articles, because they shew not only how honourable a Conclusion K. Henry made of the War, and how very careful he was to satisfy his People in important Matters of State, but also the Right and Title which the Kings of England then had and still have to the Crown of France, it is convenient to set them down all particularly in the Form that King Henry sent them into England, and in which they were Publish'd in London, June 23. 1420.

Henry by the Grace of God King of England, Heir and Regent of France, and Lord of Ireland, to all Christian People, and all Our Loving Subjects.

WE being desirous to have it kept in perpetual Remembrance, do hereby Notice, Publish and Declare, That altho' there have been many Treaties of Peace between the Most Excellent Prince Charles, the present King of France, Our Father and Us, without any Good Effect; yet We considering the great Harms and Damages that have redounded, not only to the Subjects of both Realms of France and England, but to the Holy Church by the long Wars and Divisions between them, have at length made and concluded a Peace with our said Father in Manner and Form following, viz.

A. D. 1420.
Reg. 8.

I. That since by the Marriage of our dearly belov'd Queen Katherine, the above-mention'd Charles, King of France, and his Queen Isabel are made Our Father and Mother, We will honour them as Our Father and Mother above all Kings and Princesses of the World.

II. That We will not disturb or disseize, but quietly suffer the said King and Queen Our Father and Mother to enjoy and hold the Crown and Royal Dignity of France, with all the Rents and Profits, Dignities and Prerogatives belonging to the same during their Natural Lives.

III. That the Lady Katherine Our Queen shall have and enjoy such a Dower in England as the Queens of England in Times past were wont to receive, viz. Forty Thousand Scutes yearly, of which every Two shall be in Value an English Noble.

IV. That the Annual Payment of the said Forty Thousand Scutes shall be secur'd to our said Queen Katherine by the Laws and Customs of the Realm, that it may be constantly and duly paid to her after Our Death, if Our said Queen shall over-live Us.

V. That Our said Queen Katherine, if she survive Us, shall immediately after Our Death, have and receive for her Dower out of the Kingdom of France the Sum of Twenty Thousand Franks yearly, of and from the Lands and Lordships that Blanch, Wife to Philip, the Grandfather of King Charles did hold and enjoy.

VI. That during the Life of King Charles, King Henry shall not assume the Title of King of France, and that the French King shall in Writings entitle him, Our Thrice Noble Son Henry, King of England, and Heir of France.

VII. That after the Death of K. Charles Our said Father, the Crown and Realm of France with all the Rights and Appurtenances thereof shall come, descend, and remain to Us and Our Heirs for ever.

VIII. That his Queen Isabel Our Mother, in case she shall survive him, shall keep her Estate and Title, and all such Rights and Revenues, as Blanch the Wife of Philip Our Grandfather enjoy'd and held.

IX. That since Our said Father is unable thro' Sicknefs and various Distempers of Body to attend to the Government of his said Realm of France, the Management and Disposal of all publick Matters and Affairs in the said Realm shall be invested in Us, with the Advice and Council of such of the Peers of France as we shall think meet to consult with, to whom it shall be Lawful for Us to join some of the English Nobility, if thought convenient.

X. That the said King Henry as Regent of France, will labour and endeavour diligently and faithfully to manage the Government of the Realm of France in such manner, as shall make most for the Honour of God, the Establishment of Divine Worship, the Prosperity of Our said Father and Mother, and common good of the People.

XI. That we will by Our Power cause that the Court of Parliament in France, shall retain and keep their accusom'd Sovereignty and Authority, in all Places subject to Our said Father Charles now King of France.

XII. That we according to Our Power will Protect and Defend, all and every of the Peers,

Nobles,

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8. Nobles, Cities, Towns, Bodies Corporate, and Single Persons, now, or in Time to come subject to the King of France in all their Rights, Customs, Priviledges, Freedoms and Franchises belonging and due to them in all manner of Places subject to Our Father the King of France.

XIII. That We will diligently and carefully provide that Justice be administred, and equally distributed to all Persons impartially in the said Realm of France, according to the Rights, Laws and Customs of the said Realm, and that We will preserve Our said Subjects in Tranquillity and Peace, and defend them to the utmost of Our Power from the Violence and Oppression of all their Enemies.

XIV. That We will according to the best of Our Skill and Judgment prefer no other Persons to the Administration of Justice, or Offices of Trust in the Government, but such as are able and skilful in the Laws of the Realm, and of undoubted Integrity, that all Persons may receive impartial Justice from them.

XV. That We will with all Our Might endeavour, as soon as conveniently may be, to reduce to the Obedience of Our said Father, all Cities, Towns, Castles, Places, Countries and Persons within the Realm of France, as are now Disobedient and Rebels to Our said Father, siding with the Dauphin and Earl of Arminack.

XVI. That for the more effectual Accomplishment of this Our Design, it is Accorded and Agreed, That all the Nobles and other Estates of the Realm of France, as well Temporal as Spiritual, which are at this Day Obedient to Our said Father, shall take this Oath following to Us.

1. That they shall all, and every One of them, in their several Places and Degrees, be Subject and Obedient to Us, having the Rule and Government of the Realm in all Our lawful Commands, and Impositions for the Common Profit.

2. That all the Peers and Nobles of the Realm of France, as well Spiritual as Temporal, as also the Citizens, Burgesses and Commons, shall and will keep and observe whatsoever concerneth them in their Degrees, in the Treaty made between Our Father and Us.

3. That, from and after the Death of Our said Father King Charles, they will receive Us or Our Heirs, as their Sovereign and the very King of France, and that they will not be in Counsel with, nor consent to, or help any that shall conspire against Us, our Throne or Dignity, but if they know of any such Persons shall oppose it according to their Powers, and discover it as soon as they can to Us, that we may prevent it.

4. That all manner of Conquests that shall be made upon the said Rebels and disobedient Persons (except it be in the Dutchy of Normandy) shall be for the Profit of Our said Father Charles, but that all manner of Lands and Lordships of Persons who have sworn, or shall swear to obey Our said Father and Us, and keep the Articles of this present League, shall be restor'd to the said Persons again in all our Conquests.

XVII. That all Ecclesiastical Persons who are Benefic'd in the Dutchy of Normandy, or in any other Places subject to our Father the King of France, who shall favour the Party of the Duke of Burgundy, and swear to keep this present Treaty, shall peaceably enjoy their Benefices and Preferments in Holy Church, as well in Normandy as elsewhere.

XVIII. That all manner of Churches, Universities, Studies General, and all Colleges of Studies, and other Colleges of Holy Church, being in Places subject to our Father, or in the Dutchy of Normandy, shall enjoy their Rights and Possessions, Rents, Prerogatives, Liberties and Franchises belonging or due to them in any wise in the said Realm of France, saving the Rights of the Crown.

XIX. That when it shall please God that We come to the Crown of France, then the Dutchy of Normandy and all other Places conquer'd by Us shall be annex'd to the Monarchy of France, and pay their Obedience and Submission to the Kings thereof.

XX. That Recompence shall be made by our said Father, or by Us, when We shall by God's Grace arrive at the Crown of France, if it be not made in our said Father's Life-time to all such Persons as obey him, and favour the Party of the Duke of Burgundy, for the Lands, Lordships, Rents and Possessions taken from them by Conquest, either in the Dutchy of Normandy or elsewhere, and if the said Lands, Lordships, Rents or Possessions belonging to such Persons in the said Dutchy and other Places be not restor'd by Us, they shall have lawful Power to enter upon them without further Delay.

XXI. That during our Father's Life in all Places subject to him, all Letters of Common Justice, and all Grants of Offices, Gifts, Pardons, Remissions and Priviledges shall be given out, and written in the Name of our Father, and if it be necessary in any Case to do otherwise, and write any Letters or Grants in our own Name, we shall take care to add our Father's Name, and our selves as Regent of France.

XXII. That We will not lay any Taxes or Impositions upon the Subjects of our Father without reasonable and necessary Causes, and for the Common Good of the Realm of France according to the Laws and Customs of the said Realm.

XXIII. That We will cause, that by the Assent of the Parliament of both Realms it shall be ordain'd and enacted, That from the Time that We or our Heirs shall obtain the Crown of France, both the Crowns of England and France shall be united under one Person, that is to say, From and after the Decease of our said Father to Us, and from and after our Death, to our Heirs successively, and that both Realms shall be govern'd not severally under divers Kings, but under the same Person, which for the Time shall be King of both Realms, reserving nevertheless to either of the said Kingdoms their Rights, Usages, Customs, Liberties and Laws, and not making either Kingdom subject in any wise to the Rights or Customs of the other.

XXIV. That We will from henceforth take effectual Care, that all, and all manner of Dissentions, Hatred, Rancours, Envy and Wars between the Realms of England and France and the People of the said Realms shall cease, and a perpetual Friendship and Concord be establish'd between the said Realms.

XXV. That the Two Nations being united in Common Friendship, shall help and assist each other against all Men that shall attempt any Harms or Wrongs against them, or any of them with all their Forces, Counsels and Assistance.

XXVI. That both the said Nations shall freely converse and Traffick together, with all manner of Merchandize, paying the usual Customs in the said Nations.

XXVII. That all the Confederates and Allies both of our Father the King of France and his Realm, and also our Confederates of our Realm of England shall, within Eight Months after the Publick Declaration of this Peace, declare by

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8.

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8. their Letters, that they desire to come under the Articles of the said Treaty, saving nevertheless their Obedience to either of the said Crowns, and the Rights and Revenues to Us and our Subjects, and our Father and his Subjects, against all his and our Allies and Confederates.

XXVIII. That neither our Father, nor our Brother the Duke of Burgundy shall begin or make any Treaty, Peace, or Accord with Charles, who calls himself the Dauphin of Vienna, but by the Counsel and Assent of all, and each of Us Three, or of the Three States of either of the said Realms above-nam'd.

XXIX. That We with the Assent of our said Brother the Duke of Burgundy, and other the Nobles and Peers of the Kingdom of France, who ought to be consulted with in that Case, shall Constitute and Appoint, for the Governance of our said Father, such Persons as shall be most suitable to the State and Degree of our said Father, and will be careful to promote the Worship of God, Honour of our said Father, and Good of the Commonwealth.

XXX. That all manner of Persons, both Nobles and Gentlemen who give any Attendance, or shall hold any Office about our said Father, shall be such as have been born in the Realm of France, or Places thereunto belonging, wise, true and able to do him Service, and that our said Father shall reside in the Places subject to him, and no where else.

XXXI. That We for the Things aforeaid, and every One of them will give our Assent by our Letters Patents seal'd with our Seal unto our said Father with the Approbation and Confirmation of Us, and all other of our Blood-Royal, and of all the Cities and Towns obedient to Us; and our said Father shall do the like to Us for himself, Peers and all other his Subjects under his Obedience.

Given at Troyes (u) the 30th Day of May, 1420.

Sign'd, Seal'd, Concluded and Agreed between the said Two Kings in the Presence of Queen Isabel, the Duke of Burgundy, the French King's Council, the Prince of Orange, Seignior Chastellux, Marshal of France, with many others of the Chief Nobility both of England and France, both the King's with the Queen taking a Solemn Oath upon the Holy Evangelists for the Observation of them, and the Duke of Burgundy and the other Nobility, swearing Homage to K. Henry, as the Regent of France (in the Form above-mention'd).

The Peace receiv'd in England with Joy.

The News of this Peace in England was entertain'd with an universal Joy, and a solemn Procession was Celebrated at London, at which a Sermon was Preach'd at St. Paul's Cross, in which the Preacher shew'd the Advantageous Effects of the King's Marriage, and the Peace which has ensu'd upon it. That the King had obtain'd the Kingdom of France with equal Honour, as if he had won it all by the Sword, but with less Expence of Blood and Treasure to the English: That tho' indeed he was at present but Regent of France under his Father-in-law King Charles, yet he was to bear the Arms of France with the English, and exercised the Authority of a King tho' he had only the Name, and was declar'd Heir apparent of the Crown, which was as much as K. Henry, who is a Pious Prince, could reasonably desire, having marry'd the Daughter of the French King, whom to Depose wholly would have been as Dishonourable to himself as Barbarous to his Father, and therefore could not decently be done.

Besides the League made between K. Henry and the French King, and whole Body of the Realm of France, there was also a Private League made between King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy to this Effect, and under these Articles.

I. That the Duke of Burgundy should to the utmost of his Power procure, that the Peace lately concluded between King Henry and King Charles should be observ'd and kept in all its Covenants and Articles. In consideration of which one of King Henry's Brothers should marry one of the Duke of Burgundy's Sisters.

II. That King Henry should ever shew a particular Favour to the said Duke of Burgundy as his most dear Brother, and support him in all his Rights.

III. That the said Duke of Burgundy after the Decease of King Charles should take an Oath of Fidelity to be true to King Henry and his Heirs, according to the Form of the League before-mention'd, and should in all Things be a Friend to King Henry and his Heirs for ever.

IV. That King Henry should do his utmost endeavours that due Punishment be inflict'd upon the Murtherers of John late Duke of Burgundy, as well upon Charles, who calls himself the Dauphin, as upon all others that shall be found Guilty of the said Murther.

V. That if the Dauphin should chance to be taken either in Battel or in any Town besieg'd, or if any other chanc'd to be taken that should be found Guilty of or Privy to the Murther of the said Duke John, he shall not be releas'd without a just Punishment for so foul a Fact, nor without the Consent of the Two Kings of France and England, Charles and Henry, and of the Three Estates of both Realms.

VI. That in Consideration of the Fidelity and Diligence of the said Duke of Burgundy in settling the Peace and furthering the Marriage of King Henry, the said King Henry should labour with King Charles and Queen Isabel, that the said Duke may have an Annual Fee of Twenty Thousand Pound Parisien settled upon him by Patent from King Charles, and assign'd to him out of such Lands as border'd upon his Country, to be by him, his Lady and his Heirs-males enjoy'd for ever; and if he could not bring it to pass before King Henry should obtain the Crown of France himself, then he should cause the same to be perform'd at the receiving of his Homage.

Thus did the Duke of Burgundy revenge his Father's Death upon the Dauphin, and by his Serviceableness so advanced his own Interests with the King of England, that he was in Gratitude oblig'd to reward bountifully the Assistance he had lent him.

The Progress of the King of England's Settlement by the Treaty was not unknown to the Dauphin and his Followers, who tho' they could not but be displeas'd at these Proceedings, yet neither fear'd nor faint'd, hoping for the Reverse of Fortune when all this Clue should be unravell'd and this curious Train defeated, but they were not insensible that they were in great Danger from King Henry's Power, which was very terrible before, and was now grown almost Irresistible. Wherefore they call'd a General Consultation to consider, what was best to be done for their own Security in this difficult Juncture. They despair'd to do any good by Oppo-

All therefore that could be resolv'd on was this, That the Dauphin's Life, upon which all their Hopes depended, should be in no case hazzarded, and that such Towns and Strong-holds as continu'd firm on their Side, and were most able to secure themselves and annoy their Enemies, should be better fortified, and so they would wait Fortune's Leisure, and stand only upon their Defence. The Burgundian Faction, who were most in Favour with King Henry, were equally Zealous to apprehend the Dauphin who had kill'd the Duke of Burgundy's Father, and therefore the Dauphin's Friends would not suffer him to go out with any Party, nor attempt any thing of Hazzard, but kept him under strong Guards to preserve him.

K. Henry endeavouring to subdue the Dauphin and his Party. King Henry having now arriv'd almost at the highest pitch of his Delires, had nothing to darken his Glory or Power in the least, but the Dauphin and his Party who were considerable for little but their Obstinacy: For their Number was small and their Strength not able to do much, save that they held out, and upon any Change or Discontent might easily increase into a formidable Body: Wherefore as soon as the Formalities and Solemnities of his Marriage were over, he set himself to reduce the Dauphin and his Party, and on June the 7th he began with the Siege of Sens, whither he went himself in Person with his Queen, Father and Mother, and Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy. It was a Town of good Strength, but made a very faint Opposition; for before the English could make any Assaults upon it they surrendered upon Condition, That all Persons should have their Lives spared, except the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy, if any of them should be found in the Town. From hence King Henry march'd to Monterau-faut-Tonne, and laid Siege against it. In this Town which was very strong and very firm to the Dauphin, was John, late Duke of Burgundy slain, and lay buried, which was the Reason that the Duke of Burgundy sat down with the firmer Resolution to take it, because he would enterr his Father's Body more Decently. The Town was not daunted with the Approach of King Henry, but resolv'd upon a vigorous Opposition, yet held out but a few Days, because the English having receiv'd a fresh Recruit of Soldiers out of England under the Command of the Duke of Bedford, follow'd them with continual Assaults, so that the Place was taken by Force,

The Town and Castle of Monterau taken.

The Duke of Burgundy's Body taken up and carried to Dijon.

June 23. but the Castle being well Victual'd and Mann'd would not surrender, and therefore the Siege was remov'd thither. While the Castle held out, the Duke of Burgundy was inform'd where his Father was buried, and thereupon commanded his Corps to be taken up, and being Embalm'd was carried to Dijon in his Dutchy of Burgundy, and there magnificently Entomb'd among his Ancestors. The Castle still stood out, and King Henry being willing to preserve it, sent Twenty Gentlemen whom he had taken in the Town, and who had render'd themselves Obnoxious to his Displeasure by abusing the King's Herald when he was sent to require them to yield, to perswade the Captain, whose Name was Guily, a valiant French Man, and true Friend of the Dauphin's to surrender, being threatned, that if they did not prevail they should be all hang'd. These Gentlemen were Guily's Friends, and true Men to their Country; but being in danger of Life, and seeing his Opposition to so great Forces fruitless, begg'd of him on their Knees, that he would surrender the Castle and save their Lives and his own, which otherwise would be lost. Guily was deaf to their Desires; whereupon the Petitioners were all hang'd in his sight, yet he sav'd his own Life, tho' he held out the Castle long, by a Capitulation, that all should have their Lives, but such as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther, upon the Delivery up of the Castle to him. Monterau being thus gain'd King Henry stopp'd not here, but following the Course of his Victory remov'd his Siege to Melun, a strong Town in the Isle of France which held with the Dauphin, and sat down before it, July the 13th. The Garrison which was 700 had well fortified themselves, and had very brave Commanders, viz. Seignior Barbafon, Melun being a Gascoigne of approv'd Valour and Conduct, Pierre de Bourbon, a Prince of the Blood, Monfieur Preaux and Bourgeois. At the first Approaches of the King's Army Barbafon call'd all his Soldiers to him with the Towns-men, who were equally concern'd to maintain the Siege, and having encourag'd them to behave themselves Valiantly against their Enemies, warn'd them all on pain of Death not to make any Motion, much less treat about surrendering the Town, or coming to any Composition or Agreement, until they had first acquainted him their Captain with it, and so set himself to the Defence of it. The King of England on the other side having a very strong Army commanded by his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester, Burgundy and Barr, and being accompany'd with the Young King of Scots, Prince of Orange, his Father-in-law the French King, and many other great Persons, was as diligent in plying the Siege, which as it was likely to prove Difficult, so would produce a more noble Victory. The French Queen and her Daughter the Queen of England, with the Dutcheffs of Burgundy lay during the Siege at Corbeil, and made divers Visits to their Husbands and Friends who lay about the City, whom the King of England nobly Entertain'd in his Camp. To this Siege for the King's Assistance came the Duke of Bavaria, who had married Queen Katherine's Sister, with 700 Men well accoutred, who being retain'd in the King's Service behav'd themselves very well. King Henry being thus provided with an Army, sought out all means by Mines, frequent Batteries, and Assaults to win the Town, but was so valiantly Opposed and Countermin'd, that he saw small Hopes of getting it otherwise than by starving them. While he lay before the Town, it chanc'd that two of the English Lords began a Contention about entering a new Mine, which to decide, the King himself went in first, and meeting there with the Lord Barbafon fought with him over the Barriers made in the Mine by the French for that Purpose. The King and Lord engag'd each other with equal Courage, and having got little Advantage on either part discover'd themselves, and so parted with Admiration of each others Valour. After this the King begirt the Town in on all sides to prevent Relief, and laid a Bridge over the Seine to stop any Passage into it that way, and to uphold an Intercourse between the Armies on each. The Belieged made many brave Sallies, but were as bravely Repulsed though with Loss on both sides. The King of France himself came into the Camp of King Henry, and commanded them upon their Allegiance, which they ow'd him as their Natural Lord, to resign the Town to his Son the King of England; but they answer'd, That if he

Given at Troyes (u) the 30th Day of May, 1420.

Sign'd, Seal'd, Concluded and Agreed between the said Two Kings in the Presence of Queen Isabel, the Duke of Burgundy, the French King's Council, the Prince of Orange, Seignior Chastellux, Marshal of France, with many others of the Chief Nobility both of England and France, both the King's with the Queen taking a Solemn Oath upon the Holy Evangelists for the Observation of them, and the Duke of Burgundy and the other Nobility, swearing Homage to K. Henry, as the Regent of France (in the Form above-mention'd).

The Peace receiv'd in England with Joy.

The News of this Peace in England was entertain'd with an universal Joy, and a solemn Procession was Celebrated at London, at which a Sermon was Preach'd at St. Paul's Cross, in which the Preacher shew'd the Advantageous Effects of the King's Marriage, and the Peace which has ensu'd upon it. That the King had obtain'd the Kingdom of France with equal Honour, as if he had won it all by the Sword, but with less Expence of Blood and Treasure to the English: That tho' indeed he was at present but Regent of France under his Father-in-law King Charles, yet he was to bear the Arms of France with the English, and exercised the Authority of a King tho' he had only the Name, and was declar'd Heir apparent of the Crown, which was as much as K. Henry, who is a Pious Prince, could reasonably desire, having marry'd the

Daughter of the French King, whom to Depose wholly would have been as Dishonourable to himself as Barbarous to his Father, and therefore could not decently be done.

Besides the League made between K. Henry and the French King, and whole Body of the Realm of France, there was also a Private League made between King Henry and the Duke of Burgundy to this Effect, and under these Articles.

I. That the Duke of Burgundy should to the utmost of his Power procure, that the Peace lately concluded between King Henry and King Charles should be observ'd and kept in all its Covenants and Articles. In consideration of which one of King Henry's Brothers should marry one of the Duke of Burgundy's Sisters.

II. That King Henry should ever shew a particular Favour to the said Duke of Burgundy as his most dear Brother, and support him in all his Rights.

III. That the said Duke of Burgundy after the Decease of King Charles should take an Oath of Fidelity to be true to King Henry and his Heirs, according to the Form of the League before-mention'd, and should in all Things be a Friend to King Henry and his Heirs for ever.

IV. That King Henry should do his utmost endeavours that due Punishment be inflicted upon the Murtherers of John late Duke of Burgundy, as well upon Charles, who calls himself the Dauphin, as upon all others that shall be found Guilty of the said Murther.

V. That if the Dauphin should chance to be taken either in Battel or in any Town besieg'd, or if any other chanc'd to be taken that should be found Guilty of or Privy to the Murther of the said Duke John, he shall not be released without a just Punishment for so foul a Fact, nor without the Consent of the Two Kings of France and England, Charles and Henry, and of the Three Estates of both Realms.

VI. That in Consideration of the Fidelity and Diligence of the said Duke of Burgundy in settling the Peace and furthering the Marriage of King Henry, the said King Henry should labour with King Charles and Queen Isabel, that the said Duke may have an Annual Fee of Twenty Thousand Pound Parisien settled upon him by Patent from King Charles, and assign'd to him out of such Lands as border'd upon his Country, to be by him, his Lady and his Heirs-males enjoy'd for ever; and if he could not bring it to pass before King Henry should obtain the Crown of France himself, then he should cause the same to be perform'd at the receiving of his Homage.

Thus did the Duke of Burgundy revenge his Father's Death upon the Dauphin, and by his Serviceableness so advanced his own Interests with the King of England, that he was in Gratitude oblig'd to reward bountifully the Assistance he had lent him.

The Progress of the King of England's Settlement by the Treaty was not unknown to the Dauphin and his Followers, who tho' they could not but be displeased at these Proceedings, yet neither fear'd nor fainted, hoping for the Reverse of Fortune when all this Clue should be unravell'd and this curious Train defeated, but they were not insensible that they were in great Danger from King Henry's Power, which was very terrible before, and was now grown almost Irresistible. Wherefore they call'd a General Consultation to consider, what was best to be done for their own Security in this difficult Juncture. They despair'd to do any good by Oppo-

All therefore that could be resolv'd on was this, That the Dauphin's Life, upon which all their Hopes depended, should be in no case hazzarded, and that such Towns and Strong-holds as continu'd firm on their Side, and were most able to secure themselves and annoy their Enemies, should be better fortified, and so they would wait Fortune's Leisure, and stand only upon their Defence. The Burgundian Faction, who were most in Favour with King Henry, were equally Zealous to apprehend the Dauphin who had kill'd the Duke of Burgundy's Father, and therefore the Dauphin's Friends would not suffer him to go out with any Party, nor attempt any thing of Hazzard, but kept him under strong Guards to preserve him.

K. Henry endeavours to subdue the Dauphin and his Party. King Henry having now arriv'd almost at the highest pitch of his Desires, had nothing to darken his Glory or Power in the least, but the Dauphin and his Party who were considerable for little but their Obstinacy: For their Number was small and their Strength not able to do much, save that they held out, and upon any Change or Discontent might easily increase into a formidable Body: Wherefore as soon as the Formalities and Solemnities of his Marriage were over, he set himself to reduce the Dauphin and his Party, and on June the 7th he began with the Siege of Sens, whither he went himself in Person with his Queen, Father and Mother, and Dukes of Clarence and Burgundy. It was a Town of good Strength, but made a very faint Opposition; for before the English could make any Assaults upon it they surrendred upon Condition, That all Persons should have their Lives spared, except the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy, if any of them should be found in the Town. From hence King Henry march'd to Monterau-faut-Yonne, and laid Siege against it. In this Town which was very strong and very firm to the Dauphin, was John, late Duke of Burgundy slain, and lay buried, which was the Reason that the Duke of Burgundy sat down with the firmer Resolution to take it, because he would enterr his Father's Body more Decently. The Town was not daunted with the Approach of King Henry, but resolv'd upon a vigorous Opposition, yet held out but a few Days, because the English having receiv'd a fresh Recruit of Soldiers out of England under the Command of the Duke of Bedford, follow'd them with continual Assaults, so that the Place was taken by Force, June 23. but the Castle being well Victual'd and Mann'd would not surrender, and therefore the Siege was remov'd thither. While the Castle held out, the Duke of Burgundy was inform'd where his Father was buried, and thereupon commanded his Corps to be taken up, and being Embalm'd was carried to Dijon in his Dutchy of Burgundy, and there magnificently Entomb'd among his Ancestors. The Castle still stood out, and King Henry being willing to preserve it, sent Twenty Gentlemen whom he had taken in the Town, and who had render'd themselves Obnoxious to his Displeasure by abusing the King's Herald when he was sent to require them to yield, to perswade the Captain, whose Name was Guily, a valiant French Man, and true Friend of the Dauphin's to surrender, being threatned, that if they did not prevail they should be all hang'd. These Gentlemen were Guily's Friends, and true Men to their Country; but being in danger of Life, and seeing his Opposition to so great

A. D. 1420. Reg. 8. Forces fruitless, begg'd of him on their Knees, that he would surrender the Castle and save their Lives and his own, which otherwise would be lost. Guily was deaf to their Desires; whereupon the Petitioners were all hang'd in his Sight, yet he sav'd his own Life, tho' he held out the Castle long, by a Capitulation, that all should have their Lives, but such as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther, upon the Delivery up of the Castle to him. Monterau being thus gain'd King Henry stopp'd not here, but following the Course of his Victory remov'd his Siege to Melun, a strong Town in the Isle of France which held with the Dauphin, and sat down before it, July the 13th. The Garrison which was 700 had well fortified themselves, and had very brave Commanders, viz. Seignior Barbafon, Melun being a Gascoigne of approv'd Valour and Conduct, Pierre de Bourbon, a Prince of the Blood, Monfieur Preaux and Bourgeois. At the first Approaches of the King's Army Barbafon call'd all his Soldiers to him with the Towns-men, who were equally concern'd to maintain the Siege, and having encourag'd them to behave themselves Valiantly against their Enemies, warn'd them all on pain of Death not to make any Motion, much less treat about surrendering the Town, or coming to any Composition or Agreement, until they had first acquainted him their Captain with it, and so set himself to the Defence of it. The King of England on the other side having a very strong Army commanded by his Brothers the Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester, Burgundy and Barr, and being accompany'd with the Young King of Scots, Prince of Orange, his Father-in-law the French King, and many other great Persons, was as diligent in plying the Siege, which as it was likely to prove Difficult, so would produce a more noble Victory. The French Queen and her Daughter the Queen of England, with the Dutcheff of Burgundy lay during the Siege at Corbeil, and made divers Visits to their Husbands and Friends who lay about the City, whom the King of England nobly Entertain'd in his Camp. To this Siege for the King's Assistance came the Duke of Bavaria, who had married Queen Katherine's Sister, with 700 Men well accountred, who being retain'd in the King's Service behav'd themselves very well. King Henry being thus provided with an Army, fought out all means by Mines, frequent Batteries, and Assaults to win the Town, but was so valiantly Opposed and Countermin'd, that he saw small Hopes of getting it otherwise than by starving them. While he lay before the Town, it chanc'd that two of the English Lords began a Contention about entering a new Mine, which to decide, the King himself went in first, and meeting there with the Lord Barbafon fought with him over the Barriers made in the Mine by the French for that Purpose. The King and Lord engag'd each other with equal Courage, and having got little Advantage on either part discover'd themselves, and so parted with Admiration of each others Valour. After this the King begirt the Town in on all sides to prevent Relief, and laid a Bridge over the Seine to stop any Passage into it that way, and to uphold an Intercourse between the Armies on each. The Besieged made many brave Sallies, but were as bravely Repulsed though with Loss on both sides. The King of France himself came into the Camp of King Henry, and commanded them upon their Allegiance, which they ow'd him as their Natural Lord, to resign the Town to his Son the King of England; but they answer'd, That if he

A D. were at Liberty, and free from King Henry's Power, who was their Enemy, they would do him the Duty of Subjects, and obey him in all Things, as their Sovereign, but being as he was, they desir'd to be excus'd, for they would never yield to the Mortal Enemy of France. But though no Humane Force nor Perswasions could prevail with stout Barbafon's Heart to submit to his Enemy; yet the Inflictions of Heaven, Pestilence and Famine turn'd his Resolutions, and he came to a Capitulation upon these Conditions.

Melun surrendred upon Conditions.

I. That the Town and Castle of Melun being deliver'd up to the King of England, both the Soldiers and Burgesses should submit themselves to his Pleasure, to be dealt with as he should think fit.

II. That all such Persons as should be found Guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther, should suffer Death.

III. That all the rest of the Soldiers should be receiv'd to Mercy, but should remain Prisoners until they should put in sufficient Securities for their faithful Obedience for the future.

IV. That the Natives of France should be dismissed to their own Homes.

V. That all the Moveables and Arms in the Town should be carry'd into the Castle.

VI. That all the Prisoners that had been taken during the Siege, or before, should be set at Liberty without a Ransom, and acquitted of all Promises.

VII. That Twelve Captains and Six Burgesses should be Hostages for the Performance of these Articles.

VIII. That all the English and Scots should be deliver'd up to K. Henry, and left to his Mercy.

Thus was Melun resign'd up to King Henry about the midst of November, and most of the Besieged sent under the Conduct of the Duke of Clarence to Paris, of which the French King had made him Captain, and gave him Possession of the Louvre, Bastile of St. Anthony, Hotel of Nesle, and Bois de Vincennes, where he placed English Garrisons. Among the Prisoners which were 600 and more, was Monsieur Barbafon, Pierre de Bourbon, and Seignior de Preaux. King Henry put an English Garrison into Melun, and left it under the Command of Pierre de Verrolt, a valiant French Man, going himself by Corbeil where his Queen and Mother lay during the Siege, whom he took along with him to Paris, where they were receiv'd with Processions, and all other Magnificent Solemnities, and convey'd to their Palaces, King Henry and his Queen to the Louvre, and King Charles and his Queen to the Hotel de S. Paul, an homely mean One in comparison of the former.

The D. of Burgundy's Murtherers punished with Death.

The first Thing done after their Arrival at Paris was to put the Murtherers of the Duke of Burgundy to Death, of which several of the Captives were found Guilty, and were accordingly Punish'd, and among them Two Monks, Bertrand de Chermont, a Gascoigne, much in favour with King Henry, was also punish'd with them with Death, because he had at the King's Entrance into Melun convey'd away one Amenion de Lau, who was prov'd guilty of the same Crime. The Duke of Burgundy himself, and the Duke of Clarence had much interceded with the King to save his Life, but could not prevail; for though the King protested he had rather have lost 50000 of his Nobles, yet he resolv'd that he should suffer Death to be an Example of Terror to all those, who out of Presumption of their Prince's Favour would venture to do Things Offensive to him, and Prejudicial to the Publick: And accordingly he was Executed with them.

While the Two Kings, Charles and Henry King of England remain'd at Paris, a great Assembly of the Clergy and Nobles met in the great Hall of the Hotel of St. Paul, where a Magnificent Seat of Justice under one Cloth of State was erected for both the Kings, as Supreme Judges of all Matters which might be examin'd in this Assembly. The main Design of this Parliament being to ratifie the late Alteration made by the Marriage and Peace with King Henry, very few or no Laws were made, but only every Member of the Assembly was sworn severally to keep, support, maintain and defend the Treaty and Final Agreement which was lately made and concluded between the Kings of France and England, and every Noble Man, Spiritual Governour and Temporal Ruler set their Seals to certain Instruments containing the Sum of this Engagement and Oath, which Instruments were sent to the King's Treasury of the Exchequer at Westminster to be safely kept, and there they still remain. The French King also himself, being then in perfect Health of Body, and Soundness of Mind, publickly own'd and declar'd, That the said Treaty and Agreement was made with his full and free Assent, and with Advice and Consent of all his Council of France, and that he for his Part would observe it, as his Heirs and Successors were obliged to do, in all its Articles and Parts; and that he did strictly require, That all his Subjects of what Degree soever, should observe it, and do nothing prejudicial to it.

To this Parliament did the Dukes of Burgundy, and her Son the Duke of Burgundy send their Advocates, Nicholas Rollin and a Doctor of Divinity to accuse the Dauphin, Charles, Viscount Narbonne, Seignior Tanneguy, and Barbafon, and Four others, of the Murther of John, Duke of Burgundy, and desire impartial Justice against them, which they did in a long Inveective; adding by way of Petition, That a Church might be Founded, and Furnish'd with Sacred Ornaments, and a sufficient Revenue to maintain Twelve Canons, Six Chaplains, and Six Clerks, to pray for his Soul for ever, every Canon to have Two Hundred Pound per Annum, Paris Money, every Chaplain a Hundred Pound, and every Clerk Fifty Pound, to be levy'd upon the Lands of the Dauphin, and his Associates in the Murther of the said Duke: To this Petition the Chancellor of France in the Behalf of K. Charles promised, that no endeavour should be wanting on his Part, and that all Justice should be done for them, and thereupon caused his Son to be solemnly call'd to the Marble-Table to answer the Accusations brought against him by the Name of Charles, Duke of Tourenne, and Dauphin de Vienne, which being done Three times, and he not appearing, he was by Arrest of the same Court of Parliament banish'd the Realm, and judg'd unworthy to succeed in any of the Seignories, as well present as to come, that belong to the Crown of France. But the Dauphin valu'd not this Sentence of his Enemies, from whom he could expect no milder, and had been sure of a more severe, if he had been in their Power; he stood upon his own Defence, trusting to God's Providence and his Sword, which he doubted not would settle him again in his Right. But Valiant Barbafon stood more Obnoxious to their Sentence, though less guilty, being vehemently accused for the same Murther by the Duke of Burgundy's Mother and Sisters, and many Circumstances produced against him tending to make him Guilty, but he so bravely defended himself against the Charge, though he freely acknowledg'd himself to be a true Servant of the Dauphin's, that he was in no wise thought Guilty

K. Henry ruling in Paris as King. King Henry being thus Establish'd in the Government of France as well as England, passed his Christmas in great Majesty in Paris, ordering all Affairs of State as he pleas'd, and being look'd upon by all Foreign Embassadors, as well as the Native French, as their King; Charles, the French King having indeed the Name, and keeping a Court, but very Private, and as a Prince, whose Power was out of Date. All the Grandure of France was seen only in King Henry's Palace, where were many Military Shews and Pastimes daily, and all the State and Magnificence of a Court. All Commissions were given out in his Name, and he placed and displaced Officers as he pleas'd. He also made a New Coin, which he call'd a Salute, wherein the Arms of France and England were quarter'd. Christmas being over, the King resolv'd to leave France a while and go into England to have his Queen Crown'd; wherefore leaving Paris under the Command of his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, with a Guard of 500 Men, he went to Roan and continu'd there some Time. Hither all the Nobles of Normandy came to him to pay their Homage, and the Earl of Stafford did his Homage for his Earldom of Perch, and Arthur Duke of Brittain for the County of Tury. Here he ordain'd his Brother the Duke of Clarence to be his Lieutenant in his Absence over all France, and his Deputy in Normandy, the Earl of Salisbury; leaving Roan he came by Amiens to Calis, and taking Ship came to Dover about Candlemas, and so pass'd to London, where he was receiv'd by the Citizens with as great Joy, as if he had been an Angel from Heaven, or a Victorious Alexander, who had subjected the World to him.

A. D. 1421. K. Henry gives publick Thanks giving for his Victories in France, and Q. Katherine is Crowned. King Henry being thus safely arriv'd in England, he according to his usual Piety would not enter upon any Material Business till he had given his Subjects an Example of signal Devotion in returning God publick Thanks for the Success which he had given him in France, and therefore by his Proclamation appointed, that Processions and Solemn Thanksgivings should be kept by all his Subjects in all Cities, Towns and Villages through the whole Nation, which was accordingly perform'd with much Devotion. This Act of Piety being ended the King appointed, that all Things should be provided with convenient Speed for the Coronation of his Queen upon St. Matthias's Day approaching, February the 24th, on which she was Crown'd with great Magnificence by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, John (x) Stafford. Besides the constant Ceremonies used upon such Occasions, which were all perform'd with great Exactness; there was more than ordinary Cost and Magnificence bestow'd in the Coronation-Dinner; for though it was in Lent, and so it consisted of Fish and Sweet-Meats chiefly; yet there was such vast Varieties of both, and such rare Devices in every Course, as were never seen upon the like Occasion. The Earl of March kneeling on the Right-hand of the Queen with the Scepter in his Hand, and the Earl-Marshal on the Left-hand, the Duke of Gloucester waiting bare-headed and over-seeing the Management of the whole Feast, made it one of the most splendid Banquets that was ever known in England. As soon as the Coronation was ended, the Queen return'd to her Palace at Westminster, where she remain'd till Palm-Sunday, when she remov'd to Windsor to meet the King, and keep her Easter there with him.

In the Interval between the Coronation and Easter, the King took a Royal Progress through several Parts of the Nation, to see in what State his Affairs were, and rectifie any just Matters of Complaint, which his People in his Absence might have receiv'd from his Officers and Justices. In his Journey he omitted no Opportunity of paying his Devotion to the Shrines of several Saints; so making it a Pilgrimage, as beneficial to himself (as he then imagin'd) as he intended it for his People. Many grievous Complaints with Petitions for Redress were presented to him against his Justices for the Mal-administration of their Office, which the King received with much Willingness and Cheerfulness from the meanest Persons; all Abuses immediately reform'd, not sparing the greatest of his Ministers whom he found Guilty of Misdemeanours in their Places; telling them, 'That since they had no respect to his Honour, which was wounded by their Unjustice and Partiality, he had no reason to shew them any Favour, but punish them the more severely, because for the sake of a little Gain or Friendship, they had robb'd him of what he most valu'd, his People's Love and Affections. These Affairs detain'd him longer in the farther Parts of the Nation, than he intended to have staid; and therefore not being able to reach Windsor to keep his Easter as he had intended, he sent for his Queen to Leicester, and there kept his Easter with her.

While these Things pass'd in England, the Duke of Clarence who had the Supreme Government of France having summon'd all the Garrisons of Normandy to meet him at a Town call'd Buchy, from thence began an Invasion in Anjou, and ravag'd the Country as far as Angiers, burning and plundering the Villages and Towns as he went along; but having an Information, that the Duke of Alençon was come into those Parts with a considerable Body of Men of the Dauphin's Party, and that the Scots in a Body of about 700 (y) Men were coming to joyn with them under the Command of Archibald, Earl of Douglas, and John, Earl of Buchan, he return'd back to a Town call'd Beaufort, intending to give the Duke of Alençon Battel before the Scots could come to him. Being on his March he took one Andrew Forgusa a Lombard and a Spy, who pretending he was fled from the French Camp, gave the Duke of Clarence an Account, that the French were but a small Party and might easily be vanquish'd by his Forces which were much greater, but this he said to encourage him to engage him rashly, and ruin himself and Army, as he did: For the Duke of Clarence being hasty and

The Earl of Huntington, Somerset and Perche, the Lord Fitz-Walter, with several other Persons of Note, as well as common Soldiers, were taken Prisoners, and the Victory fell to the French. But yet it cost them many Lives, for they lost 1200 Men. The Earl of Salisbury, (a) the Bastard Son of the Duke of Clarence had Intelligence of this Defeat of the English, and made all the haste he could to recover the Loss receiv'd, but he came too late to do any Service, only the French being fled at his Approach left the Dead at his Disposal, and so he sent the Duke's Body to Roan in order to be convey'd into England, and buried many of the Slain. The Earl of Buchan who was a chief Leader in this Battel was made Constable of France for this Action by the Dauphin, and the Earl of Alençon immediately besieg'd the Town of the same Name. The Earl of Salisbury endeavour'd what he could to raise the Siege, but lost 300 Men in the Successless Attempt, not being strong enough to relieve it, tho' the Dauphinists had not the Fortune to obtain it. The King was still in his Progress, and had left Leicester to go to York; in the Way to which Place having visited the Shrine of John of Beverley he heard of the News of his Brother's Death, which he receiv'd with abundance of Sorrow, and resolv'd to revenge it severely upon the French. He sent the Earl of Mortaign into his Place for the Present, intending as soon as he could settle Affairs in England and provide Things necessary for his Expedition, to go over again into France and prosecute his Victory in the Conquest of the Dauphin.

About the beginning of May a Parliament met at Westminster in order to the King's intended Expedition into France, and in it the King having given them an Account of his Victories in France desir'd their Assistance for the further Prosecution of them. The Laity return'd him Answer, That the Commons were so impoverish'd with the long continuance of Taxes, that they were unable to lend him any considerable Supplies, yet they open'd their Purfes before the Session was up. The King having in this Parliament pass'd some Statutes of Benefit to the Publick, and particularly an Act commanding, That no Gold should be Current in ordinary Payment but by Weight, according to the Standard in the Exchequer; for the Coin being then much abused by Walters, Clippers, and Counterfeiters of Money, was a great Hindrance to Commerce, and a Damage to the Subject, which was by this Statute in a great measure prevented. For this Act and some others of like Nature the House granted a Fifteenth of the Laity, and the Clergy being at the same time met in Convocation in St. Paul's, gave him Two Tenths. The King accepted the Assistance of his Subjects; but being too little to support so great a Charge, he borrow'd (b)

20000 l. of his Uncle the Rich Bishop of Winchester, giving him his Crown in Pawn for it, and with this he prepar'd for his Third Expedition into France. And having settled the Regency of the Kingdom in the Hands of the Duke of Bedford his Brother, and provided his Queen with a well-attended Court, with whom he left a strong Army of 30000 to defend the Nation against the Invasion of the Scots, who had engag'd in the Dauphin's Interest, and would therefore be Troublesom in his Absence, he with a fresh Army of 4000 Horse, and 24000 Foot, began his Journey into France, and taking Ship at Dover landed at Calis about the beginning of June, having the King of Scots with him to allure the Scots from the Dauphin's Part, either by Promises of Rewards, or Menaces of Punishment.

K. Henry being landed in France in this Third Expedition would not enter upon any Action till he had pay'd the Dutiful Honour of a Visit to his Father and Mother the King and Queen of France, who lay then at Bois de St. Vincennes near Paris, and therefore took his direct way towards that Place. At Montreuil in the Road the Duke of Burgundy met him with a Petition from the Bastard of Thian, who valiantly had held out Three Weeks the Siege of Chartres against all the Dauphin's Forces, and began to be straiten'd so much, that he could not hold out longer. The King after some Consultation with the Duke thought it necessary to raise the Siege, and having made him Commander of his Armies, sent him to relieve it speedily, the King proceeding in his Journey but slowly, till he could see the Success of this Attempt. (c) The Duke of Burgundy by moderate Marches proceeded towards Chartres, and being arriv'd at Monte the Dauphinists discover'd his Approach, and had an Information of the Strength of his Army, which being too great to encounter, they rais'd the Siege and retreated to Tours in Touraine. The Duke of Burgundy having thus reliev'd Chartres he return'd to the King, who sent him with a good Force into Picardy against Sir Jaques de Harcourt, who annoy'd the King's Conquests there. In the mean time the King went on to Paris to pay his design'd Visit, and was honourably receiv'd and entertain'd by the King and Queen of France. In his Passage he took a small Fort call'd La Ferte, (d) which being commanded by the Bastard of Bellay surrendered unto him upon Summons, but was as easily lost as taken, for Boursiers, a Picard to whom the King gave the Command of it, betray'd it to the Dauphin. Great Invitations he had at Paris to pass his Time in Pleasures, every Person being Ambitious to please him with the most grateful Delights; but his Mind was wholly engag'd on the Glory of Conquest, which seem'd a little eclipsed by the small Advantages the Dauphin had gotten by taking Bonneval, Galendon, and some other Places; he could not be at Ease, till his Forces were employ'd for the Recovery of them, and utter Suppression of the Dauphin's Party if it were possible: Wherefore having rais'd a small Addition of French Forces to his Army he

A. D. 1421. Reg. 9. march'd himself towards the Loire to fight the Dauphin, who had given it out, That he would try the Fortune of a Field-Battel with K. Henry; but the Dauphin's Courage fail'd when he saw the Greatness and Boldness of K. Henry's Forces, and he withdrew towards Bourges, where he continu'd without giving King Henry any Molestation and Hindrance in his Victories, for which Quietness he was Nick-nam'd, The King of Berry. (e) King Henry having no Opposition to his Arms, proceeded with all Expedition to reduce all Places to his Obedience, and sitting down before Dreux (f) himself; he sent the Earl of Dorset and Lord Clifford with 1200 Horse and Foot against the Dauphinists, who ravag'd the Countries about Paris, and before his Arrival had put the Duke of Exeter in Paris to great Straits for Provision, but they soon left the Neighbourhood of that on the Approach of the King's Forces. Dreux endur'd an Assault or two, but the Inhabitants and Garrison being timorous of a Storm desir'd a Parley, in which they promised to surrender the Town upon August the 20th, if no Relief came in the mean time, which was accordingly done, and 800 of the Dauphin's Men were permitted to depart in safety, having sworn to the King not to bear Arms against him nor his Allies for a Year ensuing. The Towns-Men also who would swear Allegiance to King Henry were permitted to enjoy their Houses and Estates, but such as refused were sent out of the Town with the Garrison, and the Earl of Worcester was made Captain of it.

K. Henry pursues the Dauphin, but was forc'd to retire for want of Forage. King Henry being made Master of Dreux pursu'd the Dauphin farther into the Country hearing that he lay at Baugency, but not finding him there he besieg'd and took divers Castles and Towns, as Baugency, Rongmont, and many other Places, intending to have at length gotten to Bourges it self, where the Dauphin lay strongly Fortified; but the latter had carry'd away or destroy'd all the Forage and Provisions of the Country, so that the King's Army was forc'd through mere want to retreat back to Orleans, where he stay'd two Days to refresh his Troops, and then passing through Gastinois and Vigny-sur-Tonne he arriv'd at Paris, and he was receiv'd with universal Joy and Respect. He remain'd there some time not only to recruit his Army, which was much Weaken'd by his late pursuit of the Dauphin, but to settle the Discontents of the City it self, which was disturb'd by some of the Dauphin's Party, and having finish'd it he march'd out again with his whole Army to lay Siege

Meaux besieged by K. Henry. to the City of Meaux in Brie. This City was very well fortified, mann'd and furnish'd with Provision, and could not be taken without very great Difficulty, yet because it was almost in the midst of King Henry's Conquest, and was many ways Prejudicial to the Country which had submitted to him, the Siege of it was resolv'd upon, and the King himself undertook to subdue it. It was a large City, and besides the Suburbs which were very populous and great, it was divided into two Parts by the River Marne which runs through the midst of it, viz. the Town and Market-Place. The King being sensible that if his coming were certainly known the Inhabitants would burn the Suburbs, sent the Duke of Exeter before him with 4000 Men to prevent it, following himself within a few Days. The King lodg'd in the Abby of Pharon, and the Duke of

Exeter in the Abby of Chage, the Earl of March in an House of the Gray-Fryers, and the Earl of Warwick over-against the Market-Place. They began their Assaults about October the 6th, (g) and continu'd with all their Vigour to force the Town to yield. The Inhabitants being strengthen'd with a good Garrison under the Command of the Bastard of Vaurus and other Men of Name both for Birth and Courage, held out valiantly, and made as brave Resistance within as the English did without, being as resolute to defend their own, as their Enemies were to gain it. Winter was a great help to the Besieg'd, and had certainly rais'd the Siege if any thing could have broken the steady Hearts of the English; for the River over-flowing much endamag'd their Camp, the Cold and Wet brought in many Distempers among them, of which not a few dy'd, and there was great want of Provision, so that the surviv'd scarce had any Strength to attempt their Enemy. Besides these Difficulties which Providence seem'd to cast upon them to cross their Attempts, Jaques de Harcourt a steady Friend of the Dauphin's with 800 Men infest'd the Besiegers, but he was repuls'd with the Loss of 300 of his Men, and was himself sav'd only by the Swiftness of his Horse: So much did the Courage of the English enable them to conquer all Dangers, and hold on boldly in their Undertaking till they obtain'd their Desires.

While Things were carry'd on thus bravely by King Henry in France, several Things of Moment pass'd in England. On December the 1st, the Duke of Bedford call'd a Parliament in the King's Absence, and because notwithstanding the Act of the former Parliament about the Coin, it was still found unfit for Commerce; therefore in this there were several Acts made for bringing in all Monies to be Recoin'd, and for the Weight of the several Pieces of Money with the Allay; and, which shew'd the King's Favour to his People, there was an Order sent to all Receivers of Money, that they should receive all Monies brought to them if it did not want above Twelve Pence in a Noble of the true Weight, and give them the New-coin'd Money for it, by which the King, though then under great Necessities for Money, yet was contented to lose almost Three Shillings in the Pound for the Benefit of the People. This Redress of the Coin by the King's Favour gain'd so much of the Parliament that they gave him a Fifteenth from the Laity, and the Clergy contributed a Tenth towards the carrying on the War, and so the Parliament was sent Home. In the Time of this Session, viz. on December the 6th, being St. Nicholas's Day was Queen Katherine deliver'd of a Son at Windsor to the equal Joy both of the Nation and King. The Queen in the King's Absence put forward his Christning, and therefore that solemn Act of Christian Initiation was perform'd by the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury soon after his Birth, the Duke of Bedford, and his Great Uncle Henry, Bishop of Winchester being his God-fathers, and Jaqueline, Countess of Brabant and Holland being his God-mother and Governess. The News of the Prince's Birth was sent over to the King with all convenient Speed, and was receiv'd with great Joy. He was then at the Siege of Meaux, and as soon as he heard it gave solemn Thanks to God, that it had pleas'd the Divine Providence to bestow a Son upon him that might succeed him in his Crown and Scep-

However it is said, that he was not pleased at the Place of his Nativity, which was at Windsor, because having some Information, that that Place would be Fatal to him, he had given a strict Charge that he should not be born there; but since an unavoidable Fate had cast his Birth there, he prophetically said, either from present Instinct, or from the Prediction of some other, unto the Lord Fitz-Hugh his Chamberlin and great Confident.

*I Henry born at Monmouth, shall small Time reign and much get;
But Henry of Windsor shall long reign and lose all, but as God will so be it.*

A. D. 1422. Christmas now approach'd, and though King Henry always kept it with some Solemnity, yet he chose rather to abridge himself of that Custom than break up the Siege of Meaux, though the Extremity of the Weather both for Cold and Wet, the Sickness of his Army and the great Losses which he had sustain'd by the Besieged, who had kill'd many of his Men; and among the Rest the Earl of Worcester and Lord Clifford, might have been an Argument sufficient to have discourag'd his Proceedings, and forc'd him to have left it. But all these Things rather increased than dishearten'd him; whereupon with more fierce Assaults he batter'd the Walls of the Town, and having made Bridges of Planks over the River Marn, begirt it so close, that it was much distressed, and could hardly hope to hold out against his various Arts to ruin them. But yet they stood out as undauntedly as Men in so much Danger could, having Intelligence that the Dauphin's Arms had prosper'd in Normandy, and that Auranches was fallen into their Hands, by which means King Henry would be oblig'd to send away part of his Forces to secure his Conquests there, which accordingly he did under the Command of the Earl of Salisbury, who soon regain'd the Town. At this the Citizens took heart, and endeavouring to get another Captain of great Courage and Experience, viz. the Seigneur de Offemont into their Town, thought to maintain their Ground against him; but being unfortunate in their Attempts, their Captain as he was Scaling the Walls falling into the Enemies Hands they were so discourag'd that they despair'd to hold out long, and began to carry all their Goods into the Castle. The King perceiving their Fear made a general and fierce Assault, and by dint of Sword obtain'd the Town. The Castle and Market-Place still held out, and though the King batter'd it with his Cannon, that it could not long stand out, yet they so insolently behav'd themselves to him by reproachful Words and Abuses as if they had been Unconquerable, which was the Cause, that when they were oblig'd at length to yield, they were reduc'd to such hard Conditions as no Town before had had impos'd upon them, which were to this Effect.

The Castle of Meaux surrendered, but upon hard Terms.

I. That the Market-Place of Meaux shall be surrendred up the Eleventh Day of May next ensuing.

II. That Monsieur Lewis de Gast, the Bastard of Vaurus, the Captain of the Town, who had barbarously spoil'd and oppress'd the People of the Country subject to King Henry, Jehan de Romieres, Bailiff of the Town, and Fromagon, and Barnard de Meureville, two Burgesses of the Town, who had been Assistants to their Captain in his Outrageous Acts should be left to King Henry to be put to Death for their Cruelties as he should think fit.

III. That Guichard de Siffay, Pierron de Luppe, Robert de Gerames, Philip de Gainaches, and John de Ouray should be deliver'd into the King's Power, and so remain till they had surrendred, or cause to be surrendred all the Towns, Castles, and Fortresses which they or any of them held in France, and then to be dismissed and secured of Life and Limb.

IV. That all the English, Irish, Welsh, and Scots that heretofore had been in the King's Service, or were his Natural Subjects should be left to the King's Will and Pleasure.

V. That all Persons who were found guilty of the Duke of Burgundy's Murther (and many there were in the Town who were accused of it) should be left to Justice for that barbarous Crime.

VI. That all the rest of the Inhabitants of the Town, as well Soldiers as Burgesses should also be left to the King's Disposal, their Lives only excepted.

VII. That the Count de Conuerfon who had been Prisoner to Pierron de Luppe, but at the beginning of this Siege was deliver'd up to King Henry at his Request, and upon Promise of a certain Ransom, should now have his Liberty without the Payment of the said Ransom.

VIII. That all the Arms and Goods in the Market shall be brought to One Place, and being there safely guarded, an Inventory of the same shall be exactly taken and given to King Henry.

IX. That the Sacred Reliques found in the Churches, with all the Church-Ornaments and necessary Utensils shall be safely preserv'd and restor'd to the several Churches.

X. That all the Prisoners, as well in the Market-Place as in any other Place within the Jurisdiction of the Town, should be set at Liberty Ransom-free, and be acquitted of their Promises.

XI. That no Man until the Day appointed for surrendring of the Castle shall go out of the Market-Place, nor any Persons admitted into it, unless by the Allowance and Assignment of King Henry.

XII. That these Articles shall be Subscrib'd and Seal'd by an Hundred of the Chief Inhabitants of the Place, and Four and Twenty of them, such as King Henry shall think fit to choose out from among them, be left as Hostages in his Hands for the more certain Performance of this Agreement.

The Articles were accordingly perform'd, and the Market-Place of Meaux surrendred to the King at the Time agreed on; whereupon he sent some Selected Persons immediately Prisoners to Paris, Roan and England. The Bastard of Vaurus himself was hang'd upon the same Tree whereon he had formerly hang'd many English and Burgundians the King's Friends, and his Head fix'd upon a Pole on the top of the same Tree, his Standard, which used to be born before him in Battel, being also set up by it. The Bailiff of the Town and two Burgesses were sent to Paris and there Executed. The Goods of the Town found in the Market-Place were distributed by the King himself among his Captains and deserving Men. The Breaches of the Town and Castle were immediately order'd to be repair'd, and a strong Garrison left both in the Town and Market-Place of Meaux able to defend it from any sudden Assaults and Surprizes. The Surrender of this great and important Place was such a Terror, as well as Example to such other Towns of less Strength that held out still for the Dauphin, that most of them immediately yielded to King Henry's Arms, viz. Crespi, the Castle of Pierre-pont, Merlaw, Offemont and many

Reg. 10. Q. Katherine being now perfectly recovered of all the Distempers and Weaknesses of Child-bearing, was very desirous of enjoying the Company of King Henry, whose Glory sounded over all the World, and accordingly having prepar'd all Things ready for her Voyage, took ship at Southampton and sail'd into France. John, Duke of Bedford, who was Regent of the Nation in the King's Absence, thinking it his Duty to take an equal, if not greater Care of the Queen than Kingdom, she being a more valuable Jewel than all earthly Power in the King's Eye, deputed his Brother Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to govern in his Absence, and with an Equipage of 800 Men conducted her over the Seas to Harfleur, and so by easie Journeys to Bois de St. Vincennes where her Father and Mother resided. King Henry had scarce settled Matters after the Surrender of Meaux, but hearing of the Arrival of his Queen, he hasten'd to meet her there. With great Joy was she receiv'd by her Parents, but with much greater by her Husband, who with a State and Splendor equal to his Love and Affection welcom'd her to his Embraces. They all stay'd a small Time at Bois de St. Vincennes, and on Whit-Sun-Eve, being May 30. remov'd all together to Paris, where King Henry in the Castle of the Louvre, and the French King in the Hostle of St. Paul celebrated the Feast of Pentecost in the greatest State and Magnificence. K. Henry and his Queen sitting upon that Festival in their Robes with their Crowns on their Heads, and keeping their Courts with a wonderful Confluence of People, while the King of France seem'd but like some Petty Prince or Noble-man to him. K. Henry govern'd and dispos'd all Things, and the King of France contentedly suffer'd him to act like a Sovereign, as tho' while K. Henry's Power and Glory daily increas'd, his own could never be eclips'd: So much did the Honour of the Son satisfy the Mind of the Father.

The Dauphin while K. Henry lay at Paris invades his Conquests. The Dauphin, who had constant Intelligence of the Motions and Condition of King Henry, and his Army, was not careless of this Opportunity of regaining what had been conquer'd by him; for though the King had conquer'd all Picardy, Normandy, Bry, the Isle of France and Champaign, yet still the greatest part of the Nation remain'd unconquer'd, and held with the Dauphin, whose Fortune though it was not equal to King Henry's, yet his Power and Greatness of Mind was not much inferior. The Dauphin therefore having an Army of 20000 Men, and thinking his Adversary now taken up with Pleasures and Ease, enters upon his Conquests, and takes with no Difficulty the small Town of La Charité upon the Loire. Being encourag'd by this Success he proceeded and laid Siege to a Town call'd De Cone on the same River, which not willing to undergo the Miseries and Straits of a Siege, agreed to surrender to him if the Duke of Burgundy did not come to their Relief before August the 16th, to which the Duke of Burgundy, who lay not far off with a Body of Men, but much inferior to the Dauphin's, assented; and having appointed a Day for the Fight, the Duke sent Word of their Appointment to King Henry, desiring, That he would send a greater Enforcement to his Army. King Henry hearing this Message, and being sensible that a Field-Fight might possibly put an end to the Quarrel between 'em, return'd an Answer, That he would certainly be with him in Person with all his Forces upon the Day prefix'd, but his brave Mind was crossed with a Crazy Body; and tho' he had begun his March, yet he was forced to yield to the Violence of the Distemper upon him, being a Fever and Flux, which he had contracted by the long Fatigues he had undergone in the Wars, and therefore remain'd at Senlis, sending his Army under the Command of the Duke of Bedford to assist the Duke of Burgundy upon the Day appointed, who accordingly joyning with the Earl of Warwick march'd hastily thither, and the Day before the Battel was to be, encamp'd near the Walls of de Cone. The King, who never miscarry'd in any of his Personal Enterprizes, and was desirous to be present in all dangerous Attempts, because a good Fortune seem'd ever to attend him, was discontented that the Army had left him, and therefore march'd forward after them in an Horse-litter, intending to animate his Men by his Presence, though he could not engage with them, and was carry'd as far as Melun, but there finding himself unable to travel he was oblig'd to cease his Design and return to Bois de St. Vincennes. The Dauphin who readily accepted the Proffer of Battel, and by his Herald had faithfully promised to abide the Field and try his Fortune; as soon as he saw the English Colours display'd, and his Army as he imagin'd inferior to them, notwithstanding his Vaunts dislodg'd them and march'd to Berry. This unexpected Flight of the Dauphin, as it gave Relief to Cosney so it encourag'd the Duke of Bedford to go on and undertake something which might be for his Master's Honour, and gratifie the Soldiers eager Courage, who were unwilling to return back without Action: Whereupon the Duke led 'em to Troyes in Champaign, and began the Siege of that important Place, but before any thing considerable could be attempted, the sad News of the King's Danger by his Sickness arriv'd in the Camp, which drew away their Leader, who immediately post'd to Bois de St. Vincennes to the King, and so damp'd the Hearts of the whole Army, that they could not go on with the Siege, tho' left under the Conduct of the Duke of Burgundy, but soon after departed, and so the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury with the rest of the Nobility return'd to the King.

The Duke of Bedford being arriv'd at St. Vincennes, and seeing the low and dangerous Condition of his Brother, much lamented his approaching and untimely End, as did also the other Noble-men about him; but the King, as unconcerned at his own Death, look'd cheerfully upon them, and comforting them for his Departure from them, gave them such Directions, for the Management of his Kingdoms for his Young Son after his Decease, as he thought necessary and suitable in his Farwel-Speech, to this Effect. That he knew his Death would be born by them with great Sorrow, but when their Passions were a little cool'd, they upon Consideration would have as little cause to be troubl'd at it as he himself had: For tho' indeed his Life and Reign had been but short, yet that was so far from disturbing him, that he placed it among one of his Felicities, that he should not outlive his Glories, as long Reigns do almost inevitably cause the most successful and brave Princes to do: Fortune either being tired with long Attendance, or Old Age being Nauseous to her. Reg. 10. reels out of the World with him; and though he was laid in the Dust, the Glory of his Courage and Victories, Virtue and Goodness should live for ever: That though indeed much Blood had been shed in his Quarrel, and Blood-shed be one of the most crying Sins in the Ears of Divine Justice, yet his Conscience accused him of no Guilt in that kind, since he could protest in the Sight of God, that it was not any ambitious Desire of enlarging his Dominions, or of purchasing himself the Vain-glorious Name of a Conquerour, nor any other sinister Consideration had mov'd him to take in hand this War, but the Recovery of his Inheritance, to which he had an undoubted Right from his Ancestors by the Judgment of the most Learned and Conscientious both of the Clergy and Laity of his Realm, who both instigated and encourag'd him in the Prosecution of this War till he had gotten his due; assuring him, that he might do it without any Danger of God's Displeasure, or Peril to his own Soul; That he was sensible his untimely Death would create great Troubles to them, and all his People, because he should leave them in such a Multitude of Business depending, and without a Prince to succeed him, who shall be able to govern in his stead, but the Consideration of the Frailty of all worldly Things ought to mitigate their Sorrow; for when we have done all we can, there will still be something wanting which we desire. Having thus comforted them concerning his own Death, he went on and gave them Directions about his Son: And first conjur'd them all to follow and observe the Council that he should give them. He earnestly entreated them to love his Infant Son and their King, Prince Henry, and to take care that by their Wise and Prudent Instruction he may be made Able and Worthy to rule so great Kingdoms, and manage so great Scepters, and that they would comfort his Queen, the most afflicted Creature living, and love her with the same Affections as he had always done them while he was alive. He exhorted them to live in Unity and Concord one with another, and continue the League of Amity with Philip, Duke of Burgundy, which would conduce much to the Security of the French Dominions in their due Subjection, if by their Breaches among themselves they did not endanger all. He propounded to them for Deputy-Governour of his Kingdoms in his Sons Minority, and desir'd they would quietly submit to them, his Brethren, Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to govern England, and enjoyn'd him not to depart out of the Realm upon any Occasion soever, till his Son was arriv'd at an Age able to assume the Government, and John, Duke of Bedford, with the Assistance of Philip, Duke of Burgundy, to govern his Kingdom of France, commanding them (who were both present) to prosecute the Dauphin with all their Force, till they had either totally subdu'd him and his Party, or driven him out of the Realm, for said he, you will never be quiet so long as he hath any Power to disturb you, and it is absolutely necessary, that either you must lose what you have, or he be driven out of all. Then he commanded them (however Time or Occasion might invite them to the contrary) that Normandy which is the Ancient Inheritance of the Crown of England, and hath been purchased and regain'd with so much Labour and Expence of Blood, should not be alienated from that Crown upon any Occasion whatsoever. Lastly, He enjoyn'd them, that the Duke of Orleans, the Earl of Eu, the Lord Gaucourt, and Guichard de Sifay should be kept Prisoners in England till his Son came of Age, least if they were set at Liberty they might raise greater Troubles in France, than they should have Power or Policy enough to allay. The Noble Men full of Grief stood silent about him, but promised to perform all his Desires to the full.

The King having thus order'd the Matters of his Kingdoms, that his Son might be well Educated and enjoy a prosperous Reign, betook himself to prepare for the State which he was sensible he was just ready to enter upon, because of the Violence and Strength of his Distemper; wherefore calling his Chaplains and Physicians he enquir'd of these latter how long it is possible he might live, who answer'd, Nor above two Hours; whereupon he order'd the former to do their Office, and fit his Soul for its Dissolution. He first made a very devout and penitential Confession of his Sins, and then receiv'd the Holy Sacrament, after which he caused the Seven Penitential Psalms to be recited, and as the Chaplain who read them mention'd the Name of (h) Jerusalem, he burst out into this Ejaculation. Lord thou knowest that it was in my real Purposes to conquer Jerusalem, and rescue it out of the Hands of the Infidels, if it had pleas'd thee to lengthen out my Life, but thy Providence hath defeated my Design; Thy Will be done, and then before the Chaplain could read many Verses further he gave up the Ghost at Bois de St. Vincennes, on the last Day of August, 1422. having liv'd Thirty Six Years, and reigned Nine Years, Five Months and Fourteen Days, (i) leaving a Son of Eight Months Old Heir of all his Dominions, whose Education was at the Desire of his Father committed to the Duke of Exeter. His Bowels were enterr'd in the Church of St. Maur de Toffes, and his Body being embalmed was inclosed in a Coffin of Lead, and being accompany'd with all the Lords and great Men, as well of France as England, and the whole Army, was brought with much Honour and Lamentation to Paris, and there being set in the Church of our Lady, solemn Obsequies were said for him (k) several Days, and a great Distribution of Money given to the Poor. From thence he was remov'd to Roan, where his Body remain'd till all Things could be made ready for his Burial and Conveyance into England, and then being carry'd to Calis he was convey'd to Dover, and from thence to London, where his Corps being set in St. Paul's Church, his Exequies were again celebrated. The Entrance into, and Passage through London (l) was very Magnificent. An Effigies representing his Person as near as could be, the Head whereof was Massy Silver, was laid in a Bed upon the Top of the Hearse where his Body lay, painted curiously in Imita-

We must here Correct a Contradiction in Mr. Goodwin's History of this King, He says, Page 1. He was Crown'd the 9th of April, 1413. in the Twenty Sixth Year of his Age. And pag. 337. He died the 31st of August, 1422. in the Tenth Year of his Reign, and Fortieth of his Age: If he was but Thirty Six Years Old in 1413. he certainly was but Thirty Five or Thirty Six in 1422.

The Covering of the Bed was of Cloth of Gold, and a Canopy of very great Value was born over his Body by certain Noble Men. His Corps was attended by the King of Scots, all the Nobility, and most of the Gentry of England besides those of France, who likewise after the Exequies perform'd at St. Paul's attended his Body to Westminster, where it was enterr'd among his Royal Ancestors in November following, by S. Edward the Confessor, and his Effigies laid upon his Tomb erected over the Body, where it remains still, but Headless, the Covetousness of such as were employ'd to sweep the Church clean from Superstition at the Dissolution of the Monastries, being so great, that they spared not the Monuments of the Dead to advance their own Interests and Estates. But the Preservation of that was the more necessary, and so their Sacrilege the more intolerable because they swept away those Monastries at Richmond, viz. One of Carthusians, and another of Monks and Nuns of St. Bridget which he had erected and endow'd to say Three Solemn Masses for his Soul every Week for ever: So that were not his Virtues and brave Actions more lasting than Iron or Brass, his Memory had perish'd ere this, but so long as either England or France remain, or any Memoirs continue in them, he will be Celebrated as the Glory of the One, and the Terror of the Other. His Queen, who not long after his Death came over into England with her Son King Henry, was afterwards marry'd to Owen Theodore or Tudor, a Gentleman of Wales, one not Eminent either for his Noble Birth, (m) or Plentiful Fortune, but being of a very graceful and beautiful Personage found such Favour with her as to receive him into her Bed, and by him had Three Sons, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen. Edmund was after by her Interest made Earl of Richmond, and marry'd to Margaret, Daughter and sole Heiress to John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, (n) natural Son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, and by him she was Mother of Henry the Seventh. Jasper was made Earl of Pembroke by K. Henry the Sixth, and requited his Favour by continually adhering to him against the Family of York in all his Wars. Q. Katherine surviv'd Owen, and retreated into the Nunnery of Bermondsey in Surrey, where she dy'd in the Fourteenth Year of her Son Henry's Reign, and was bury'd in our Lady's Chappel in St. Peter's Church at Westminster: Her Corps was taken up in King Henry the Seventh's Reign, her Grand-Child, and set by her Husband's Tomb, where it still remaineth unbury'd to be seen and touch'd by any that please. Thus ended the most Glorious King Henry, and his Beautiful Queen Katherine.

Having given the Reader a View of this glorious Reign, it may be thought Presumptuous to add a Character of a King whose Victories and Virtues were so illustrious, that Eloquence it self is too weak to describe them. He was possessor of every Quality which forms a good Man and a Hero. His riper Years made a sufficient amends for the Extravagancies of his Youth; and yet even those were but the Sallics of that Martial Fire which afterwards shone out so brightly, to the Immortal Honour of his Name and Empire. That he was as Brave as the Bravest Captains of Old Rome, appears by the Facts which adorn his Annals. He undertook no Enterprize that he thought too Perilous for himself to engage in, and never put his Troops upon Action to which he durst not lead them in Person. As he was the most Brave, he was the most Generous Prince of his Age, and did nothing that a true Father of his Country might have occasion to repent of. He treated his Subjects like his Children, and never was so much displeased with his Condition as when it oblig'd him to burthen them with Taxes, which he always laid as sparingly and equally as possible. He was truly Religious according to the Religion of the Times, and his Zeal for the Prosperity of the Church was as warm as his Passion for the Interest of England. Indeed he was too severe with the Lollards. He was the first who Persecuted them for their opposing Papery, which is the only Blot in his Reign; and yet that, if we consider they were Hereticks in his Judgment, was the Fault of his Religion, and not an Error of his Mind. He attributed all the Glory of his Conquests to God the Giver of all Victory. He was always devout in his Prayers for Success on his Arms, and hearty in his Praise for the Blessings with which they were Crown'd. He was strict and impartial in the Distribution of Justice, and as he furnish'd the Church with the best Bishops, he supply'd the Courts with the best Judges. He delighted in the frequent Meeting of his People in Parliament, and never refused the Royal Assent to any one Bill that was presented him for the Publick Good. In his Wars abroad he was as merciful as in his Government at home, and spar'd even the Blood of his Enemies. He lov'd his Queen with Tenderness and Constancy, and in a Word was too Great and too Good for so Wicked and Idolatrous a Generation, having left an Example of Heroick Virtue behind him, which the Favourites of Fame have endeavour'd to imitate but could never reach. He was graceful in his Person, tall of Stature, his Presence Manly and Majestick. His Hair was Black, his Neck long, his Look Gracious and Lovely, his Speech Grave, his Wisdom Conspicuous in all his Actions, and his whole Life from his Man-hood to his Death the Wonder of his own Age, and the Admiration of Posterity.

IN THE
Reign of HENRY the Fifth,

Are related among

The Actions of his Life, in the same manner as the Author has done in the History of his Father, and in all the King's Reigns which he wrote from RICHARD the Second down to HENRY the Seventh; only some few memorable Things which he omitted, we shall insert in their proper Places.

ON the Day of his Coronation there happen'd a Tempest of Wind, Snow and Hail, the Snow was most taken Notice of because 'twas most Prevalent, on which the People made various Superstitious Observations. Some thought it presag'd, that the New King would be Cold and Negligent in the Administration of the Government, or Wrong and Oppress them, others took it for a good Omen, that having dispell'd those Clouds of Vice which had darken'd the Nation, Brightness and Serenity would succeed the Storm.

'Tis no Wonder that a Reign so Glorious as this should produce a great Number of Hero's. 'Twould be endless to put down all the Illustrious English Names that shine in the History of the Conquest of France: Some of the Chief and these who distinguish'd themselves most, we think it our Duty to mention, as Thomas, Duke of Clarence, John, Duke of Bedford, and Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, the King's Brothers, of whom the Two latter made greater Figures in the Reign of his Son Henry the Sixth. Thomas, Duke of Exeter, and John, Earl of Somerset, his Uncles, Princes worthy of their Relation to Henry the Conqueror of France. Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, Thomas Mountacute, Earl of Salisbury, John Holland, Earl of Huntington, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Beaumont, the Lord Bardolf, the Lord Fitz-bugh, Sir John Falstaff, Sir Thomas Erpingham, Sir Walter Hungerford, Sir James Harrington, Sir Philip Hall, Sir John Cornwall, Sir Lewis Robissart, Sir Gilbert Umphreville, and the Brave Welsh Captain David Gam, whom King Henry Knighted, when he was dying of the Wounds he receiv'd in the Battel of Agincourt, fighting in Defence of his Royal Person.

As the King was great in War, so he shew'd by his Favour to Men of Learning that he would have been a Promoter and Patron of the Arts of Peace, if he had liv'd to have given Rest to his Arms. He was himself bred up at Oxford under the Tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, and took delight in the Conversation of Thomas Rudburn, Bishop of St. David's, Stephen Patrington, Bishop of Chichester, and John Carpenter, Bishop of Worcester, Men noted for their Learning and Eloquence: Besides these, there were many others Eminent in his Time, viz.

Dr. Alain of Lun in Norfolk, Prior of the Carmelites in that Town, a Divine and Philosopher.

John Seguarde a Poet. He taught Polite Learning in Norwich, and wrote against the Abuse of Poetry by writing Lewd Verses.

Dr. Robert Rose, Prior of the Monastery of Carmelites in Norwich. He was Noted for his Moderation in the Disputes between the Wickliviſts and Papiſts.

Dr. John Luck. Ant. Wood ſays, he was a great Friend, and Bale, that he was a violent Enemy of the Wickliviſts. See Wood's Athen. Oxon. and Bale, de Scriptor. Britan.

Richard Caiſtre of Norwich, a ſecret Friend to the Wickliviſts.

William Wellys, General of the Order of the Black-Fryers in England.

Richard Smetiſham, a Famous Diſputant.

William Taylor, A.M. a Zealous Wickliviſt. He wrote a Book, De non invocando Sanctos, and was a Martyr, being burnt in Smithfield in the laſt Year of this King, whoſe only Blot was the Blood ſpilt in his Time by the Papiſts to ſupport their Idolatry, and the King out of Bigotry or Intereſt too much encourag'd their Cruelty.

Dr. William Lyndwood, a Civilian, Author of the Book call'd, Provinciale ſeu Conſtitutiones Anglia.

Bartholomew Florariuſ, call'd ſo from a Book he wrote, which he Intitul'd, Florariuſ.

Adam Hemlington, famous in the Universities of Oxford and Paris.

William Batecomb, an Excellent Mathematician.

Robert Maſcall, one of the English Deputies at the Council of Conſtance, and Biſhop of Hereford.

John Purvey, A.M. Wickliff's Pupil, a Man of extraordinary Learning. He wrote a Comment upon the Revelations, publiſh'd afterwards by Luther without the Author's Name, in which he aſſerted, that the Pope was the Whore mention'd in the Apocalypſe. He dy'd in Priſon. He wrote many other Treatiſes.

Bertram Fitzallen of Lincolnſhire, a Philoſopher.

John Beſton, one of the beſt Orators of his Time.

John

John Leland, Senior, a Grammarian and Poet.
Dr. John Bale, Learned in the Greek Tongue.

Dr. Richard Ullerston, a violent Enemy to the Lollards.

Peter Clark, A. M. He disputed against Thomas Walden in the Schools at Oxford, vindicating Wickliff's Doctrine, he fled for it to Bohemia and dy'd there.

Roger of St. Ives, He wrote against Sir John Oldcastle.

John Tartas, a Logician.

Roger Whelpdale, Bishop of Carlisle.

John Waynesfleet, a Divine and Philosopher.

Richard Fleming, He was first a great Favourer of Wickliff's Doctrine, but was brib'd off by the Bishoprick of Lincoln.

Nicholas Pont, of Merton-College in Oxon. He disputed with Richard Fleming, while the latter was a Wickliffist.

Thomas Cranly, Arch-Bishop of Dublin, a Poet, being Distressed by the Irish Rebels, he wrote an Epistle in Latin Verse to King Henry for Succours.

Thomas Walden, He was sent to the Council of Constance to Dispute with the Hussites, being a violent Papist.

Thomas Otterburn, a Franciscan-Fryer.

Dr. John Langden, Bishop of Rochester.

Robert Grasdale.

John Shirburn wrote Chron. Britan.

John Henfield, a Monk of Battle-Abbey, and Peter Bassel, Esquire, the King's Chamberlain, who wrote his Life, were Historians.

And that Brave Soldier, Courtier and Christian, Sir John Oldcastle, who defended himself at his Tryal with more Learning and Eloquence than all the Doctors his Adversaries accused him with. He wrote Three Pieces. The First, To the Parliament of England. The Second, The Complaints of the Husbandmen. The Third, A Confession of Faith.

Reg. 1.
K. Henry's
Age and Succession.

HENRY the Sixth, the Son of that most Heroick Prince Henry V. but rather of his Piety than Courage, was left Heir of the Crowns of England and France when he was not above Nine Months Old, by the untimely Death of his Father, and accordingly was Proclaim'd King of all his Dominions, August the 31st, 1422. both at London and Paris. (a) The State of Affairs was so Intricate and Troublesom, that it required a Prince of equal, if not greater Magnanimity and Conduct than the Nation had so lately lost; but so great was the Religious Respect which the People then had to the Right of Succession, (b) that tho' a much fitter Person might have been Elected for the Government, yet they chose rather to submit to a Child the Rightful Heir, than to the most Brave Hero who wanted that Lawful Claim. And indeed the late King Henry who was as able to preserve a Kingdom by his Wisdom, as to get it by his Valour, had taken such effectual Care upon his Death-Bed to supply all the Deficiencies in Government during the Minority of his Son, by putting in sufficient and able Deputies in both Kingdoms, as well as Tutors for the Education of his Person in all Virtuous and Princelike Endowments and Accomplishments, that instead of One he may seem to have left us many Kings. For he made his Elder Brother John, Duke of Bedford Regent of France, and his Younger Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester Governour of England during the Non-Age of his Son, both Persons of that Wisdom, Valour and Integrity, that as they knew how to manage so great Trusts with the greatest Skill and Fidelity, and uphold the Interests of the Crown in their own Family without an Ambitious Usurpation of it, so they were both admitted to those High Stations with the general Approbation and Content of the Nobility and Commons of the Nation. Thomas Beaufort, Duke of Exeter, and his Brother Henry, Bishop of Winchester were appointed Guardians of his Person, and to take care of his Education, as soon as he was capable of any Impressions of Honour and Goodness; which Choice shews that his Royal Father, who indeed himself was the perfect Model of a good Prince, accounted Religion as necessary for a Prince, as Policy and Martial Skill, and in the mean time he remain'd under the Care and Government of his Mother Queen Katherine, who with the Indulgence and Kindness fit for so great an Infant and so good a Mother, nourish'd him in his Child-hood, till he was Old enough to receive the Instructions of his Wiser Tutors and Guardians.

His De-

Due Care being thus taken of the King's Royal Person, and the Government being put into the Hands of so Wise and Good Men, Necessities of State requir'd speedy Action; and tho' greater Time might have justly been allow'd to their Grief for the Loss of so loving a Brother, and so great a King, yet since Ceremony might bring irrecoverable Damages upon both Nations, the Two Dukes upon whom the Charge of them lay were forced to offer some Violence to Nature, and betake themselves immediately to the Management and Settlement of Publick Affairs. The Duke of Gloucester being as desirous to please as benefit the Nation, and sensible that the Best Government is always establish'd upon good Council, made Choice in the first Place of such of the Nobility to be his Council, as were more Eminent for their Wisdom and Virtue, and provided such Under-Magistrates, as by their Justice and Impartiality might give a general Satisfaction to the People, and by their Fidelity and Loyalty might secure the Constitution, and preserve the Peace under their Infant-King. The Duke of Bedford also was equally diligent and careful to preserve his Dominions in France, which being hardly impossible to be done but by the subduing of the Dauphin (as his Brother K. Henry the Fifth in his dying Speech had order'd) he kept on Foot the same Forces which he had left in France, and with the same Zeal and Courage sought to suppress both him and his Adherents, which no doubt he might have done, had not that fatal Alteration, the Death of the French King Charles the Sixth, so soon happen'd, for he dy'd within Fifty Three Days after King Henry his Son-in-law, on October the 21st following. The Life of K. Charles was many ways an Advantage to the English; for tho' the Settlement made by him upon K. Henry and his Heirs after his own Death, could be reasonably thought of little Validity against Charles the Dauphin's Claim, because he was so distem-

(a) He cou'd not then be Proclaim'd King of France, because Charles the Sixth was living, and by the Treaty of Troyes, the King of England was not to be Stiled King of France till after Charles's Death.

(b) 'Twas rather their Respect to the Memory of his Father than to the Right of Succession; for besides, that they shewed they did not value much that Right when they placed Henry the Fourth, the King's Grand-father on the Throne, The Divine Right of Succession was in Edmund, Son of Roger Mortimer, late Earl of March, who was the Son of Edmund Mortimer, by the Princess Philippa, Daughter and Heir of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, the King's Great Grand-father, which Title we shall hear more of to this King's Cost before the End of his Reign.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1. per'd in his Understanding by his Disease, and so over-rul'd by his Queen, who to revenge her own Quarrel, valu'd not her Son's Right, that no Act of his in these Circumstances could be of any lasting Obligation, yet so long as he was alive, and had confirm'd the Title of the English to all they had already gotten by their Arms, and joyn'd further with them to subdue his Son, the English met every where with more Assistance, their Proceedings were more justifiable, and the Opposition that the Dauphin and his Party made against them, thus joyn'd with his Father, look'd like a most unnatural Rebellion, and so no doubt was accounted by many, who otherwise would have assisted him; and though they thought it a glorious Act to rescue their Kingdom out of the Power of the Conqueror, as the Dauphin rightly pretended, yet their Consciences would not suffer them to engage in that Action which carry'd so great Sin, under the fair Pretences of recovering their Country and Liberty, as Rebellion is; for they could not fight for the Son, but against their Father, nor save their Country from the Conqueror without Wrong to their lawful Prince. But the Death of Charles now releas'd them from these dubious Perplexities, and put a new Spirit into the French, who were weary of the English Power and long'd for Liberty.

K. Charles his Death. Charles the French King dy'd at Paris, and was bury'd at St. Dennis, after he had been a Crowned King of France Forty Six Years (or according to the French History, Forty Two Years.) He was a Prince of that Excellent Disposition and Temper in his Younger Days, while his Understanding was clear and vigorous, and govern'd his People so well, that he was universally lov'd by his Subjects, who therefore call'd him, Le Roy Charles le bien aimé, i. e. K. Charles the Well-belov'd: But the Happiness which France might have promis'd her self under so good a Prince, was soon eclips'd by the Disease which seiz'd him within four Years after he came of Age, thro' a great Fright, which he was put into as he rode thro' the Forrest of (c) Mans by the sudden Appearance of a Man (or rather a Spirit in Human Shape) which boldly laying hold of his Horse's Bridle and stopping him, said, O King ride no further, but return back immediately, for you are betray'd. These Words much surpriz'd the King; and tho' his Guards forced the Man by Blows to let go his Bridle, yet his sudden Disappearance, as if he were more than a Man, made such a strong Impression upon his Mind, that he fell into a Fit of Frenzy, which plainly discover'd it self to be nothing else but the Effects of those Fears, and the excessive Jealousy of Treason, which he had conceiv'd in his Mind from the former Words; for he look'd upon all about him as Traytors, and with all his might would strike any Person that he could come at, with any thing he could lay hold of. In which miserable Condition, saving some short Intervals, he reign'd Twenty Nine Years, or rather was govern'd by Factions and Parties, for he was in no wise able to govern himself. This Misfortune brought many Troubles upon the Kingdom, creating strong Divisions among his Nobles, and giving his Enemies an Opportunity to encroach upon his Territories, which the English had done so effectually, that he was in his Life-time become a King only in Name, tho' not without his own Consent, and saw his Kingdom and Regalities in the Power of a Foreign Prince, Henry the Fifth King of England. Death was never a greater Happiness to any Person than to him; for though he had nothing blame-worthy in him but his Affliction, yet that made his Life so troublesome to himself as well as others, that nothing could be so desirable to him as Death, which restor'd him to a right Mind, a sweet Repose, and eternal Happiness at once. After his Death his Kingdom was immediatly seiz'd on by Two Rivals, who with equal Zeal, and as they thought, or pretended, Title, sought to establish themselves Kings of it. The Duke of Bedford almost as soon as he had given up the Ghost caused his Nephew Henry VI., then King of England, to be proclaim'd in Paris after this Manner. Two Herald's at Arms in their usual Formalities, and many Nobles to attend them, were sent into the most eminent Streets of that City, and one of 'em having cry'd out, King Charles is dead, another immediately said with a loud Voice, God save King Henry the Sixth, God give a long and happy Life to Henry the Sixth, (d) King of France and England, Our Sovereign Lord: And after the same manner was he proclaim'd King in other Parts of the Realm. Charles, Duke of Touraine, commonly call'd the Dauphin, on the other side was also proclaim'd and crown'd King of France by his Party at Porchiers, as being Legitimate Heir to the Deceased King, and by the Laws and ancient Edicts of the Nation as well as Nature, the lawful Heir to the Crown of France. The English indeed at this Time were grown so Powerful, and had gotten so large Dominions in France, that they derided this their Competitor, and call'd him in Contempt, The King of Berry, because his Fortunes were at so low an Ebb at his Father's Death, that little of France was in his Power, but the City of Bourges in Berry and the Territories adjoining; yet the Justice of his Title, his undaunted Courage in his worst Condition, and constant Resolution to recover his Right, and restore the Liberties of France, were such Endearments of him to his Country-Men, that it soon appear'd that tho' Henry had largest Territories, Charles had most Hearts, which tho' under some Fears and Confinements, yet as Opportunity offer'd fell so by Degrees to him, that the English were quite expell'd France, and Charles regain'd all his Hereditary Rights, and an absolute Dominion over that Kingdom, yet not without some Difficulty and Struggling with a various Fortune, as the History of the following Years will shew us.

The great Change which had thus happen'd by the Death of King Charles, the best Friend of the English, much awaken'd the vigilant Mind of the Duke of Bedford, who could easily foresee the approaching Dangers of the English from the present King, who was not more Contemptible to others than Formidable to him. He knew that Charles the Dauphin crown'd King of France.

Duke of Bedford's Care to preserve France.

(c) Mezeray the most Authentick Historian among the French writes, that he fell Distracted by this means. He was going upon an Expedition against the Duke of Breign, and as he rode on a very hot and sultry Day arm'd from Head to Foot, his Page that carry'd his Lance following him, he happen'd to drop a sleep, and the Page by chance let the Lance fall on his Helmet, which not only awaken'd him, but threw him into such a Fury that quite bereft him of his Senses, inso much, that he fell upon all that were about him, and had certainly killed some of them had he not been prevented by being laid hold on. His Distemper, says the same Author, grew greater by a Fright the next Year, when Dancing in a Mask, the Cloaths of his Fellow Maskers being daubed with Pitch and Rosin, took fire, and before they could be undressed they were burnt or stifled, the King was snatched out of the Flames by a Lady of Masculine Courage; and this Accident so frighted him that he never entirely recovered the Use of his Understanding.

(d) As King of England, stiled Henry the Sixth, and as King of France, Henry the Second.

A. D. 1422. Reg. 1. the English Yoke could never be made easie to the French Necks, and that since now by the Death of the late King they had no Bond to hold them to their Allegiance, tho' never so often sworn and promised, but Conquest, they could expect Subjection from them no longer, than either Fear or lack of Opportunity could prevent their Revolt. This put him upon using all means to secure the Dominions of his Master, which he was sensible could not be always effectual, yet he hop'd it might preserve them to some advantageous Accidents. And the First Thing he did was to reinforce the Army which K. Henry his Brother had left in France, and place over it such Commanders, as were not only eminent for their Loyalty, but ready to undertake the boldest Attempts to maintain the Rights of their Country. With part of which he well fortified all the Garrisons on the Confines of the English Pale, and the rest he kept on Foot to oppose any sudden Invasion upon them by the Dauphin or his Party: Then he assembl'd all the Nobility, as well French as English to him at Paris, and having in a grave Speech reminded them of their Duty and Allegiance to K. Henry VI. their undoubted Sovereign, to whom they had not only oblig'd themselves to be faithful and true by the solemnest Oath made to his Father, but were ty'd by their present Interests; for as by their voluntary Subjection they were now settled in the quiet Enjoyment of their Honour and Estates, so by their Revolt they must necessarily expose themselves to all the Miseries of a renew'd War, which they must expect would be so much the more Merciless, by how much a treacherous Friend is always accounted as the worst of Enemies, he perswaded them to renew their Faith to the King, and take a fresh Oath of Fidelity to him. This Advice was readily comply'd with by all the Nobles and others present, who did their Homages to him in the King's Behalf, and took a solemn Oath of Allegiance to him, which being so good a President to all of inferior Degrees, the Regent imposed the like Oath upon all Persons as well English as French within K. Henry's Dominions in France. Besides these Things, he took the most effectual Care he could to keep Normandy, the Ancient Inheritance of the English, in Subjection, by encouraging the Nobility, and placing strong Garrisons among them, and that he might establish the English Sovereignty as firmly as he could among the French, he call'd in all the Ancient Coin and had it new made and stamped with the English Arms quarter'd with those of France, strictly forbidding, that any Money coin'd by the late K. Charles should be Current in K. Henry's Dominions, and ordering, that no Money should pass in Payment, but what had both the English and French Arms upon it. Two new Pieces were Coin'd as Badges of the English Sovereignty, One of Gold, call'd a Salus, of Twenty Two Shillings Value, and another of Silver, call'd a Blans, of Eight Pence Value. Thus did the Regent as wisely and cautiously provide for the Continuance of the English Power and Dominion in France as Human Prudence could devise, so that whatever might after fall out, he secur'd himself from any Negligence or deserv'd Blame.

First Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

But the Regent's Care was not thought sufficient to maintain so considerable a Part of the English Dominions, as France was deservedly accounted; the Duke of Gloucester who was equally concern'd to defend his Nephew's Right, thought it a Subject fit for the Consultation of a Parliament, which he summon'd for that End to meet, Novemb. 9. The Design of their Meeting being only to provide for the War in France, little of Publick Concern was enacted, but what Necessity requir'd, and therefore only Three Acts of that Nature passed, viz. 1. To invest in the Lords of the King's Council, a Power to appoint Officers and Work-Men to coin Gold and Silver, in as many Places as shall seem to them convenient. 2. To enjoin all Sheriffs, four times a Year, to proclaim in their Jurisdictions all Statutes in Force concerning Purveyors, that they may not abuse the People's Ignorance or Credulity in Buying. 3. To banish certain Irish Men out of the Realm, who having taken Sanctuary in Oxford committed many Rapes, Murthers and Heinous Disorders in the Nation to the great Disturbance of the adjoining Countries. Most part of the Session was spent in contriving Supplies for the carrying on the Conquest of France, and it was at length unanimously granted, That for every Sack of Wool exported, Five Nobles should be paid to the King for Three Years next ensuing; and an Act was made at the same time for an Allowance to be given the maim'd and decept Soldiers, who had serv'd K. Henry V. in his Wars with France, out of the Territories conquer'd by their Assistance, and Spoils taken in the War. With this Supply of Money the Protector the Duke of Gloucester rais'd a Body of able Men, and in the Spring sent them over to assist his Brother against the Power of the New French King, whom they had reason to suppose would be struggling for his Right, as indeed they soon found he did.

While the English Governours were thus providing to secure their Conquests in France, King Charles then call'd King of France was no less endeavouring to raise an Army to regain his Kingdom, of which he had left little more than the Title, for scarce any Province adher'd to him but Langue-doc, and that able to do him little Service, being assaulted on the one Hand by John De Guédon, Chalons, Prince of Orange, and on the other by the Lord Rochebaron, Governour of the Diocese of Velay, Friends to the English; but yet the lowest Ebbs of Fortune could not make him despair, having as he frequently used to say, God and Right on his side. With his Friends in Langue-doc he began to lay the Foundation of his ensuing Power, and with such an Army as he could pick up, which he put under the Command of the Count de Fois, encountred the Pr. of Orange, and Lord Rochebaron, whom he easily overcame, being but weak in themselves, and at too great a Distance to receive any timely Aid from the English. This Province being thus settled, he put it under the Government of Charles de Bourbon, Count de Clermont a Prince of the Blood, and as grateful to the People as faithful to himself, and being encourag'd by this Success he return'd to Poitiers to proceed in his Affairs, and raise an Army great enough for his Design, if it could be done with all his Interests. The Scots were his Friends, as they had always been to the Kings of France, but he was forced in so desperate a Condition to give them greater Encouragements than Ordinary, preferring some of their Nobles to the greatest Offices about him, as Charles Steward, Earl of Buchan, he made Constable of France, and gave him the Lordship of Aubeny, which his Posterity long enjoy'd, and James, Earl of Glascoe, Marshal, and besides choosing One Regiment of his Guards out of them (which is continu'd to this Day). These Favours shew'd to the Scots gain'd them readily to his Assistance, and made them not sparing in lending him Aid to recover that Dignity, which they were ready to believe by these Earnests would be their Gain

A. D. 1423. Reg. 1. as well as his own. He sent also to his Friends into Italy and Spain to require their Aid, who were not backward to his Desires, but lent him a convenient Force, which so elevated the Hopes of his Friends at Home (of which he had some Persons of Note in every Province of his Kingdom) that they also set all Engines at work to draw off the People from their Subjection to the English, and invite them to recover their Ancient Freedom and Rights, in which they were so Successful, that in a few Weeks they had gathered a great Army able to compass their Designs, and were assur'd privately of the Fidelity and Obedience of many considerable Towns, yea, even of the greatest part of the Parisians themselves, who tho' they dar'd not declare for him, yet would be ready as Opportunity should offer to act for his Advantage, which perhaps they should be the better able to do by being reputed Friends to the English. Thus did the Affairs of the Two Rival Kings stand. Henry had most of the Kingdom of France, but Charles had the most of the French. Henry was fear'd most, but Charles loved best. Henry was forc'd to trust his Enemies, but Charles to fight against his Friends: And then it was easie to guess which way the Victory would at length turn; for what Prince can be so Powerful that Treachery can not undermine, and what Prince so Weak as not to conquer where his Enemies are loath to strike and glad to yield, thereby to throw the Victory into the Hands they'd have it.

Duke of Bedford makes Alliances for the Safety of King Henry. The D. of Bedford with a watchful Eye observing the Growth of the Dauphin's Interest, feared that he would soon be, what he had as yet only the Title of, King of France, unless all speedy Means were used to crush him in the Beginning; and tho' he had a very good Force by him, yet he found it necessary to strengthen himself by a strict Alliance with such neighbouring Princes as might prove most prejudicial to the English by joyning with their Adversaries: Whereupon he invited the Duke of Burgundy, Peter, Duke of Bretagne, with his Brother Arthur, Earl of Richmond, John, Prince of Orange, and Amadeus, Duke of Savoy to an Interview at Amiens, and there enter'd into a League both Offensive and Defensive with them against Charles the pretended King of France. And that he might oblige them firmly to hold to their Promise, he marry'd Ann the Duke of Burgundy's Sister, and the Earl of Richmond his other Sister Margaret. From this Confederacy sprung almost an irresistible Opposition to all the Pretences of Charles to the Crown, for they all agreed to guard their several Parts of France against him and his Adherents, and to keep so strict a Watch upon all his Motions, that he should never be able to make any considerable Resistance. The Duke of Burgundy undertook the Defence of Picardy, and put in John of Luxemburg to drive out the Dauphinists (as they were call'd) out of the Towns they had possessed themselves of. The Earl of Salisbury was placed with a strong Body of Men in Champaign and Brie, not only to suppress any Insurrections, but keep the Parisians in aw. The Valiant Earl of Warwick was sent into Guyenne to take those Towns that held out for the Dauphin, and the Prince of Orange was sent with a good Army to suppress his Interests in Languedoc and Dauphiné. Thus did the Duke of Bedford provide as a strong Force to resist, as Charles had to oppose, and made as firm Alliances to uphold and to maintain K. Henry's Dominions, as Charles had to regain them, so that they seem'd almost an equal Match, scarce able to subdue each other, unless some special Decree of Heaven

A. D. 1423. Reg. 1. should turn the Scale, as it may seem to have done in Favour of the French, as the following History will manifest.

Both Parties being thus provided for Action, they were as eager to try their Fortune One against the other, as they had been to fit themselves for it. The English are said by the French Historians to have begun the Game, and the French by the English; Report perhaps having outrun the real Attempts of either side: But this is credible, that they began to Assault each others Territories with equal Fury and Courage almost at the same time. The English besieg'd Bazas in Guyenne, and took it without much Difficulty, being a small and weak City; but Charles undertook a more important Attempt by the Siege of Pont-Meulan, a fair City, then well fortified by the English, and standing upon the River Seine at a convenient Distance from Paris, where he was certifi'd he had many Friends who would be helpful to him, if he could make himself Master of a Place so fit for Communication with them. The eager Desire he had to gain this City made him carry on the Siege with the greater Diligence and Severity; for having obtain'd it by Force before the English could send any Relief, he put the whole Garrison to the Sword. The Duke of Bedford was sensible of the Inconvenience of this Loss, and so much the more because he found the Parisians more uneasy under his Government, and endeavouring by all Means to get him out of their City, under a Pretence, that the adjoining Castles were troublesome and hurtful to them, which he easily discern'd was only contriv'd to declare for their own King without Danger, and therefore resolv'd upon the Recovery of it whatever it cost him. Thomas, Earl of Salisbury, a Person not inferiour to the most Eminent Roman Captains, was thereupon sent with a strong Army to besiege it; but because K. Charles was sensible that the Garrison was unable to make any considerable Defence, and he was loth to lose the Advantage he had got, he sent a Relief to them under the Command of the Earl of Aumerl the Constable of France, and the Lord Anechy, who having with them a good Body of hardy Scots endeavour'd by a pitch'd Battel to raise the Siege. The English as valiantly under their brave Commander maintain'd the Siege, and so a bloody and fierce Fight began, which concluded after some Hours in favour of the English, and with a great Loss to the French, for there were slain 1800 French Men, and above 3000 Scots, and among them several great Men and Commanders, viz. of the French, the Earls of Lestrake, Comigens and Tonneire, the Lords Coquart de Cameron, De Port and Montmorancy, the Bastards of Arminack and Forrests, and the Viscount of Touraine; and of the Scots, the Lord of St. John's Town, Sir John Baggary, Sir John Turnbel, Sir John Holiburton, Sir Robert Listie, Sir William Douglas, Sir Alexander Hume, and many others. The Constable who had lost his Eye in the Battel was taken Prisoner, with the Earl of Ventadour, Sir Alexander Meldrum, Sir Lewis Ferignie, and 2200 Gentlemen of the French side. The English tho' Conquerors, yet kept their Ground with the Loss of several of their Commanders, as Sir John Grey, Sir William Hall, and Sir Gilbert Halsall, one of their Marshals of the Field, and 2100 common Soldiers. The Misfortune of the French in this Attempt so disheartned the Besieged, who were Spectators of the Battel, that they immediately surrendered the Town upon these Conditions.

Reg. 1. II. That all the Riches of the Town, as Gold, Silver, Jewels, and the like should be a Spoil for the English.

III. That all Persons who had serv'd Henry V. in his Wars against France, or had sworn to a final Peace with the English, as also all the Soldiers within the Garrison, that were either Scots, Irish or English, should be left to the Mercy of the English; and all others who would swear Fealty and Homage to King Henry should have their Liberties given them immediately without Ransom.

IV. That if there were any Person found in the Town who was either actually guilty of the Death of the Duke of Burgundy, or had been consenting any ways to his Death, that he should have no Benefit of this Agreement, but should be deliver'd up to the Regent to be punish'd, with some other Articles of less Importance. The Recovery of this Town was of great Advantage to the English.

Duke of Bedford panishes the Parisians, and prefers the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir John Falstaff.

The Regent having thus remov'd the Danger which the near Approach of K. Charles's Forces threaten'd him with, set himself with all Diligence to secure the English Interests more firmly; he first inquir'd into the design'd Revolt of the Parisians, and punish'd the Leaders of it with Death. Then he sent Sir John Falstaff to reduce the Castles of Pacy and Courfay, which being in the Hands of the French who pretended themselves Friends to the Regent, were become troublesome to the English at Paris upon K. Charles's Success. These Sir John Falstaff with a good Force of English Soldiers soon reduced, and returning with a good Booty and many Prisoners to the Duke, they were put into the Keeping of more Faithful Persons. But the Regent, who was of as eminent Wisdom as Fidelity, thought it not more Prudent to curb his Enemies than encourage his Friends, and therefore prefer'd the Earl of Salisbury and Sir John Falstaff to Places of greater Trust for their Services of this Year. The Earl of Salisbury he made Lieutenant and Vice-gerent for the King in the Counties of Brie and Champaign, and Sir John Falstaff, Great Master of his Household, his Deputy in the Duchy of Normandy, lying on this side the River Seine, and Governour of the Countries of Anjou and Main, which Honours, as they shew'd what Respect the Regent had for their Fidelity and Valour, so they became a strong Obligation upon them to be indefatigable in his Service, as indeed they were ever after. Transactions in England, and Accidents.

During these Transactions in France by the French and English, many Things not unworthy Observation happen'd in England, but none of so fatal an Influence as the Marriage of the Protector Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, which shall be more distinctly related in its Order. November the 7th, the Body of the Heroick Prince King Henry V. being brought out of France, was bury'd in the Abby-Church of Westminster at the Feet of St. Edward, as is more largely related in his Life. About March the 2d was William Tailour a Secular Priest, and Minister of Bristol burnt for Heresie in Smithfield. He had been accused several Years before of holding some Erroneous Opinions contrary to the Doctrines of the Present Church, and infecting the People of Bristol with them by his Preaching, viz. 1. That whosoever shall hang any parts of Holy Scripture about his Neck to defend him from any Danger or Infection, or to free him from any bodily Diseases or other Maladies (as was frequently done) taketh away the Honour due unto God only, and giveth it to the Devil. 2. That no Human Creature, neither in Heaven nor Earth is to be Worshipped.

3. That the Saints in Heaven are not to be Worshipped or Invoked. For these Doctrines he was summon'd to appear before Thomas Arundell then Arch-Bishop of Canterbury at Lambeth; and altho' they were then condemn'd as Erroneous and Heretical, yet because he deny'd that he had at any time deliver'd them as his own Opinions or Sense, but only propounded the same to argue about them, and with all promised, that he never would hold or favour any such Opinions hereafter, he was dismissed from his Imprisonment upon his Corporal Oath, and Security given into Chancery for his Good Behaviour for the Future. But he was not set at Liberty long, when a fresh Accusation was brought against him under his own Hand, concerning some Heretical Doctrines which he had vented in some Letters written to Tho. Smith a Priest of Bristol, wherein he had asserted, That every Prayer wherein we Petition any Supernatural Gift, ought to be made to God only, and to pray to any Creature on that Account is Idolatry. These Assertions being examin'd by the Convocation then held by Henry Chicheley, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury in St. Paul's Church, were condemn'd as Heretical; and he being Sentenc'd to Death as a lapsed and incorrigible Heretick, was first degraded of his Priestly Office, and deliver'd to the Secular Power to suffer the Punishment of his Crime, which he did in Smithfield with great Constancy and Christian Resolution. Whether the Shedding of this good Man's Blood provok'd the Divine Displeasure to inflict the Punishment on the Nation that follow'd, is not for Us to determine, yet it was certainly the Effect of some Sin of like Nature, for from Midsummer to the End of September, there fell every Day such Quantities of Rain, that the Harvest was in great Danger of being utterly lost for want of Seasonable Weather to have the Corn in; yet so great Diligence was used, that Wheat at London was not sold for more than Eight Shillings a Quarter, and Malt than Five Shillings. But the most Unfortunate Accident in England was (f) by the Marriage of the Duke of Gloucester. The French Historians say, That by this Match Providence, who had for a long time frown'd upon the French, for their Sins began to shew that he had some remainders of Favour for them, beginning now to revive the French Monarchy again, and restore them to their Ancient Liberties and Priviledges; upon this Occasion. Jaquet or Jaqueline, sole Daughter and Heiress to William of Bavaria, was by the Death of her Father left the Government of the Earldoms of Henault and Holland, two large and populous Countries. She was marry'd to John, Duke of Brabant before; but leaving her Husband upon a Pretence that he was a too near Relation to marry her (or as others, for his unkind Usage of her) she came into England, and being a Woman of an Ambitious Humour sought her a New Husband. The Duke of Gloucester, though then at the Helm of a great Kingdom, yet knowing that his Glory would have a Period by his Nephew's Age, sought to make himself an Absolute Prince by marrying her, and accordingly she became his Wife to the great Displeasure, not only of the Duke of Brabant,

Reg. 2. The Valiant Earl of Salisbury having lately receiv'd such an Encouragement to exert his Natural Courage for his Master's Honour and Interest, began this Year with many brave Attempts, which were attended with the desir'd Success, so that the Ruin of K. Charles seem'd almost unavoidable: For he besieg'd and took the Town of Cravant in Auxerre, and the Towns of Vertus, and Esperney in Champaign, with many other smaller Towns that were either affrighted or allur'd by their Example. But Montaguillon, a strong City in the Country of Brie cost him a great deal more Time and Labour, for it held out the Siege above Five Months, and was at last gain'd with no small Loss to his Army; but the Victorious Triumph which the English made at the taking recompenc'd their Pains and Loss abundantly, for the Conditions of Surrender were very Honourable (which the French Historians call strange and miraculous), viz.

I. That the Town with all its Treasure and Riches should be resign'd to the English, their Lives and Houses saved.

II. That the Captains of the Town, Pregent de Corinie, and of the Castle Guille Burgois, both Bretons, should swear never to bear Arms against the English on this side the River Loire.

III. That all the Soldiers should be left to the Mercy of the Regent, and should go to the Tournelles in Paris, where the Regent then resided, with bare Heads, and a Rope about their Necks, and a Dagger at their Breasts, which was done, and they all had suffer'd Death, had not the Dutcheis of Bedford obtain'd their Lives of her Husband thro' mere Commiseration to them.

While the Earl of Salisbury thus victoriously manag'd the English Affairs, the Earl of Suffolk was no less Industrious to carry on their Conquests another way; for he took the two strong Castles of Coucy and La Roche, and the Regent himself besieg'd and took the Castles of Crotay and Riol, by which means the Kingdom of France was almost entirely subject to the English, having an absolute Command of all Places as far as the Banks of the River Loire.

This Year in July was born to Charles the Titular King of France his First Son, whom he nam'd Lewis. His Birth was receiv'd with great Joy by his Adherents, and was thus far advantageous to him, that it mightily confirm'd his Party to uphold him thro' the Hopes of a Successor, and brought over to them all those who had any Affection to the French Monarchy. But all the Comfort his Father had in him was in his Child-hood, he proving in his riper Age Ambitious and Rebellious, aspiring so eagerly to his Father's Throne, that he could not wait Nature's Leisure, but sought to depose him.

Second Parliament, its Acts. The Protector being now loaden with many difficult Affairs of State, issu'd out his Summons to call the Parliament to meet, Octob. 20. and because he thought the Presence of the Infant-King might be a means to engage both Lords and Commons to be Zealous for his Interests: He thereupon was brought up by his Mother from Windsor, and at the opening of the Session (g) sat upon his Mother's Knee in the Chair of State among his Lords. The Speaker in an Eloquent Speech to the Lords, first extoll'd his Person, and told them, That such a Divine Sweetness appear'd in his Face, as foretold all the Happiness which could be expected from a good Prince, and the Son of such an unparallel'd Father, and then recommended to their Care the Government of the Nation in his Infancy, Exhorting them not only in Compassion to his tender Age, but in Consideration of their own Honour so to manage the Publick Affairs, as that neither the King nor his People may have just Cause to blame them when he came to his Government himself. The Lords and Commons were easily perswaded to do what they knew reasonable in it self and their Duty, and therefore immediately enter'd into Consultation for the Publick Benefit. The King stay'd but a few Days in the City, but with his Mother on November the 26th remov'd to Waltham-Cross, and not long after to Hartford, where he kept his Christmas with the usual Magnificence, the King of Scots being there with him. In the mean time the Parliament employ'd their whole Care and Thoughts for the Publick Good, and after much Deliberation Enacted and Order'd many Things of great Advantage to both Nations; for as to England they confirm'd all the Ancient Rights, Privileges and Franchises of the Church, and Lords Spiritual and Temporal, Cities and Boroughs, and all other the King's Subjects, and further enacted, That all Merchants trading in Wool should sell their Merchandizes at Callis only so long as the Staple continu'd there, by which means the Subjects of both Kingdoms were greatly enrich'd; That no Coin of Gold or Silver shall be carry'd out of the Realm upon any Pretence whatsoever, unless it be for the Payments of Soldiers, and other Expences of the King's Wars beyond the Seas, upon the Penalty of forfeiting the said Sum so carry'd out. That a sort of base Money call'd Blanks shall not be accepted or tender'd in any Payment upon Pain contain'd in the Stat. of Hen. 5. against Gally-halfpence, Sakins and Dorkins, both which Acts were well contriv'd for the Advantage of Trade and the Wealth of the Nation, because the Exportation of Money is the Ruin of the Riches of a Kingdom. And that Justice might thrive with Trade, it was also enacted, That all Officers made by the King's Letters Patents in any Courts of Justice should not only be Men of Integrity themselves, but should be sworn to entrust no Under-Clerks, for whose good Behaviour they themselves would not be Responsible, that there might be no Falshood, Bribery or Extortion in administering Justice, to the great Wrong of the People. And for the Security of the King's Person, it was further enacted, That if any Person, who is committed to Prison for Grand or Petty-Treason, shall break Prison and escape, his Crime shall be taken pro confesso, and his Goods and Chattels may be seiz'd by the Lord of the Manor where they were found, as if he were actually Condemn'd and Executed. Besides the Statutes made for the Benefit of England, it was ordain'd, That nothing should be omitted necessary for the Preservation of France, and that the Lord Protector should send such Supplies of Men and Money to his Brother into that Nation, as should be judg'd requisite for the Defence of it against the Pretensions of K. Charles. And so the Parliament broke up with much Applause and Commendation.

In the Time of this Session of Parliament, and by and with the Consent of the same, the Pro-

A. D. 1424. Reg. 2. James, King of Scots set at Liberty. Protector (solicited by Mordicai, Duke of Albany) considering, not only that James, King of Scots, had been long detain'd Prisoner in England without a just Cause, but that being set at Liberty he might probably so manage him to a firm Friendship with the English, that he would deny the French King the Assistance of his Subjects the Scots, whose Valour had almost wholly supported him, set him free from his Captivity, and provided a large Retinue to convey him honourably into his own Country; but least this Obligation should be forgotten he marry'd him to the Lady Jane, the Daughter of the Duke of Somerset, and Cousin-German to the King, (b) with whom he had a large Dowry, besides many Gifts of Plate and Jewels which her Kindred of the Nobility presented him with, and at his Departure induc'd him to take this following Oath of Friendship and Fidelity to the King of England, viz.

His Oath to King Henry. I James Steward, King of Scotland shall be true and faithful unto thee Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, the Noble and Superiour Lord of Scotland, and to thee I make my Fidelity for the said Kingdom of Scotland, which I hold and claim of thee; and I shall bear you my Fidelity and Faith of Life and Limb and Worldly Honour against all Men, and faithfully I shall acknowledge and do you Service for the Kingdom of Scotland aforesaid. So God me help and these Holy Evangelists.

His Treachery. With these Ties of Friendship was he dismissed and sent Home, but nothing could oblige him to desert the French Interests; for soon (i) after his Return Home, either thro' a natural Affection to that Nation, or else desirous to rescue himself from all Badges of Subjection to the English, he entred into a strict League with the French King, and seal'd it with the Promises of a Marriage between his Daughter Margaret and Lewis the Dauphin.

Sir John Mortimer accused of Treason, and Executed. In the Month of February, and while the Parliament was yet sitting, one William King a Servant of Sir Robert Scott, Keeper of the Tower of London, accus'd Sir John Mortimer, a Prisoner in the Tower, upon the Act of the last Parliament concerning Escapes, alledging many other Articles against him, viz. 1. That the said Sir John Mortimer had contriv'd with him to break out of his Imprisonment, and had promis'd him immediately a Reward of Forty Pound a Year to be aiding and assisting to him in his Escape, and afterward an Earldom. 2. That the said Sir John told him, that after his Escape he would go into Wales to the Earl of March, and having rais'd 40000 Men would enter the Kingdom again and cut off the Heads of the Protector and Bishop of Winchester. 3. That he had told him, that the Earl of March was rightful Heir to the Crown of England, and that after him he was the next Heir; wherefore if the Earl of March refus'd to recover his Right, he himself would take upon him the Regal Power as his due. 4. That when he came into Wales, if the Earl of March would not accept his Service, nor engage in his Cause, he would then fly into France and assist the French King against King Henry, and did not doubt but in the End he should gain his Design. This Impeachment was brought against the said

Sir John Mortimer before the Lords and Commons assembl'd in Parliament, and was so fully prov'd against him by the said William King, that he was found Guilty of High-Treason, and condemn'd for it to be hang'd and quarter'd, which Sentence was accordingly Executed upon him at Tiburn, and his Body was bury'd in St. John's Church at Clerkenwell. The Earl of March tho' nothing of a Conspiracy could be prov'd against him, yet was sent into Ireland with some others, to secure the Kingdom from Danger, and dy'd there soon after.

While the Parliament was thus busied, the Protector made it his Care to get Supplies for France to reinforce the English Army there, which tho' Successful in all its Achievements almost, yet was much diminish'd, and by his Industry rais'd an Army of 10000 able Men, which he sent over in the beginning of the Spring well arm'd and provided. This prov'd a seasonable and happy Recruit, for Charles began to overpower the English, and get some Advantages against them, for he had lately taken Compeigne and Crotoy from them. But the Arrival of these fresh Men reviv'd the Spirits of the discourag'd English; for the Regent putting them under the Command of the Valiant Earl of Salisbury and Earl of Suffolk, sent them out to recover their late Losses, and oppose the further Progress of the French King, which they did so effectually, that within a small time not only Compeigne and Crotoy were regain'd, but many other Places taken from K. Charles, viz. Basile, Riol, Rula, Gyronde, Basyl, Mermond, Milham, Femal, Maunon, Daras, and many other Towns and Castles of no small Strength and Importance. Some small Skirmishes in other Places had pass'd between the French and English, which being to the Disadvantage of the latter, did something abate the Glory of their Conquests; for Sir John de la Pool Brother of the Duke of Suffolk, Captain of Auranches in Normandy having assembl'd to him all the Garrisons in the Marches of Anjou, made an Assault upon the City of Angiers, plunder'd and burnt the Suburbs, and pillag'd all the adjoining Country, carrying away as many Prisoners and as much Cattle as they could conveniently. The Earl of Aumerl, and Viscount Narbon were then the Governours of the Town and Castle; and though they could not prevent the Mischief the English had done by reason of the Suddenness of it, yet seeing them retreat in much Disorder and clogg'd with the Prisoners and Spoil they had taken, they resolv'd to revenge their Loss, and redeem both their Credit and Captives: Whereupon Sallying out with 6000 French Men they pursu'd and fell upon them. The English were in so great Confusion that they could make no considerable Resistance, and so were easily routed and overthrown, 300 being slain, all their Spoil lost, and above 600 taken Prisoners, among whom were Sir John de la Pool himself, Sir John Basset, Sir John Anfort, and several other Commanders and Persons of Note. But in these Petty Skirmishes the Advantage was not always on the French Men's side, for Sir Matthew Gough with a Party of English routed the Bastard de la Baulm, and the Lord Craignac who with a good Body of Men had made an Assault

(b) She was Daughter to John, Earl of Somerset, and Sister to John, Duke of Somerset, and Cousin-German to Henry the Fifth, the King's Father: The Scots King marry'd her in the Second Year of his Reign, and before he return'd Home he did Homage to the young King of England in the Castle of Windsor in these Words.

*I James Steward King of the Scots shall be true and faithful unto you Lord Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, the Noble and Superiour Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, which I hold and claim of you; and I shall bear you my Faith and Fidelity of Life and Limb and Worldly Honour against all Men, and faithfully I shall acknowledge and shall do you Service due for the Kingdom of Scotland aforesaid. upon Masconnois, and took the said Bastard Prisoner with his own Hands, whom he presented to the Earl of Salisbury, but receiv'd him again of the Earl for a Gift, with an Horse of great Value: So that the former Losses abated little of the Victories of the English. Yet the Regent was not contented with the Success of the Arms of his Men, who though they gain'd something daily, yet the Competitor of the Crown being yet alive, and rather increasing in Strength and Interest, than declining, he knew there could be no safe Enjoyment of what they had, nor any Hopes of a Cessation of Arms; whereupon he contriv'd all he could to bring Things to a Conclusion by drawing the French King to a pitch'd Battel, and either Conquer or be Conquer'd; for a State of continual Wars damps all the Comforts of Victory, and makes Conquest it self no Pleasure. To effect this the Regent could find no better way than to lay Siege to Verneuil (k) in Perche, a most important Place belonging to the French King, which all his Interests were engag'd to defend, and accordingly the English Army sat down before it in the beginning of August. The Captain of the Town, Monsieur Gyrand held out a while Valiantly against the English, but at length came to a Capitulation, and promised to resign the Town if it were not reliev'd by a Day appointed, and immediately sent King Charles Word of the Agreement. The Relief of the Place was thought necessary, and an Army of French and Scots was dispatch'd thither to raise the Siege with all convenient Speed under the Command of the Duke of Alençon, Earl of Boughan, Constable of France, Archibald, Earl of Douglas, Viscount Narbon, Lord Ventadour and others; but before they could get thither the City was reliev'd into the Hands of the English according to the Capitulation, because the Succour came not time enough. The Resignation of the Town being known to the Duke of Alençon put him into some doubt, whether he should not Retreat without Battel, since the Town could not be sav'd; but entering into Consultation with his Commanders, it was resolv'd to go forward and give the English Battel, since they could not retire without Danger to themselves, and a Brand of Cowardize upon their Persons; wherefore they march'd toward the English, and on a fair Plain near the Town drew into a Form of Battel. The Duke of Bedford glad of this Opportunity of deciding the Quarrel, which he had long desir'd, and now sought, advanc'd towards them from the Town in great Order, and on August 28. gave them Battel. The Dispute was very sharp and furious, as though the Fate of either side depended on the Success of that Combate. Equal Courage, and equal Strength appear'd on both Parts, so that the Victory was long dubious, till at length the English prevail'd and utterly routed the French Army, slaying, as our English Writers relate (l) 10000, but as the French say, but 5000, and taking Prisoners the Duke of Alençon, the Lords Tajet and Hornit, Sir Peirce Harrison, and other Gentlemen to the Number of 200 besides Common Soldiers. The Viscount Narbon, though slain in the Fight, was after hang'd on a Gibbet, because he had been One of the Murderers of the Duke of Burgundy. The English lost 2100 Men, but none of Note, which made the Victory the greater, because the French lost not only most of their Men, but most of their best Commanders, as well Scotch as French, viz. the Earls of Aumerl, Douglas, Borghen, Ventadour, Forest and Marie, the Lords Graville, Fountains, Ambois, Gaules, Touars, and Poisy with above 300 Gentlemen more, a Loss much harder to be recover'd, than that of the Common Soldiery. This Victory reduc'd the French King to very great Streights, as well of Fortune as Mind. He was extreamly troubl'd at the Defeat, but more at the Effects of it, which render'd him unable to defend himself or the Countries that adher'd to him, (m) yet he was resolv'd to hold up his State as well as he could; and tho' he fear'd every Day to be turn'd out of all, yet he kept up something of a Majestick Grandure at Poitiers, having his Nobles about him in form of a Court and his Parliament, Chancery, and other Courts for the Administration of Justice, and Management of his Revenues, and other Affairs of the Crown, as if he were in the highest Dignity.

The Regent after this signal Victory having punish'd several Deserters for their Baseness and Treachery, which he apprehended after the Fight, and settl'd his Affairs in Normandy return'd to Paris, where he was receiv'd by the Duke of Burgundy and his own Dutcheffs with great Joy, and continu'd there all the Winter. The good Effects of this Victory which were easily foreseen, fill'd the Regent's Mind with so much Easiness, that he gave himself a little more Liberty than usual to enjoy his Pleasures, and spent his Christmas in making great Feasts for the Nobility of France, and the English Commanders. In one of them he feasted the Old Queen of France, Duke of Burgundy, Earl of Salisbury and Suffolk, with many other Persons of divers Nations, and to divert them, he was pleas'd himself to just, which he never did before. The Duke of Burgundy also, who was a Person of a very amiable Feature, and graceful Behaviour, much pleas'd the Company with Dancing and Justing, though the extream Civility which he shew'd to the Countess of Salisbury kindled such a Disgust in her Husband's Breast, that he ever after bore him a Grudge. But these Days of Jolity were kept within their due Limits, by the Regent, who wisely knew how to use Pleasure without any hindrance to his Business; and therefore as soon as his Mind was a little refresh'd with innocent Divertisements, he returns again to his Care of his Charge, and the first thing he enter'd upon was to make the best Advantage of his late Success, before Charles could recruit his Losses, and to that End he sends out the Lord Scales, Sir John Montgomery, and Sir John Falstaff with an Army of 2000 Men to take in such Towns and Castles in Anjou and Main, as still held out against the English. This Army had no sooner began their March into those Countries, but such a Terror seized upon all the Inhabitants, that they yielded all up to them, as though it were a thing impossible to withstand

(k) 'Twas Jury that the Duke of Bedford besieg'd. Verneuil was in the Hands of the English, and the French took it by sending a false Message to the Garrison, that they had routed the Duke of Bedford's Army, and rais'd the Siege of Jury, upon which the Duke of Alençon and his Troops were receiv'd into the Town. In the mean time the English took Jury, the Duke of Bedford march'd immediately to give Alençon Battel, and it appears by this Account that the English and not the French were those that first offer'd the Battel. Hol. p. 588.

But Mans, the Principal City of the Province of Main, being a Place well Peopled and strongly fortified refused to accept the English, and therefore the Earl of Salisbury was sent with an additional Force of 8000 Men to besiege and reduce it into Subjection. This Town though very strong held out but a little while, because the Earl made not use of the common battering Engines, but of Guns, which with their Shot soon laid their Walls and Towers flat, and brought the Inhabitants to a Capitulation to surrender the Town upon these Articles.

The City of Mans besieged, and surrendered upon Articles.

I. That all Persons, as well Soldiers as others that would abide and continue still in the Town, should be suffered to remain without any Harm or Damage either to themselves or Goods.

II. That such as would depart, especially of the Soldiers, should have Liberty to leave the Town with their Horse and Harnes. And

III. That all Persons in the Town who were any ways guilty or consenting to the Murther of the late Duke of Burgundy should be delivered up to the Earl to be punished for it: And so this City was surrendered to the English.

The Town of St. Susan taken.

The Earl of Salisbury being now at the Head of a puissant Army able to carry on the Progress of his designed Victories, thought this a fit Opportunity to enlarge the English Conquests, and therefore immediately lays Siege to the Town of St. Susan, of which one Ambrois de Loire a valiant French Man was Governour, who so well defended it, that in many Assaults the Earl was rather a Loser than Winner; whereupon he was forced to make use again of his great Guns to batter and beat down their Walls. These new Engines of Death, which no Valour nor Strength of Man can be a sufficient Defence against, made the Besieged change their Counsels, and contrive the safest way for their Preservation by agreeing to resign their Town. The English having receiv'd some Damages by the Garrison held them to the harder Terms, so that they could not gain their Lives, but upon Condition, that besides resigning the Town, they should pay them 200000 Crowns, and then they should have Liberty to depart the Town in their

Doublets only, which they submitted to; and so the English became absolute Masters of it, and Sir John Popham was made Captain of it. From this Place the Earl carrying on his Victories, went and laid Siege to the Castle called La Fert Barnard, but deferred to assault it by reason of the News brought him of the Danger that the Town of Alençon was in to be lost on this Occasion. The French King's Party being so weakened by their late Overthrow were not able to recover their Losses by Strength, and therefore were constrained to use Policy and Stratagem, for which they had an Opportunity at Alençon thus. One Charles de Villiers a French Captain had an intimate Acquaintance with a Gascoigne, who was a Soldier in the English Garrison there, and having by him discovered how the Town was guarded by the Soldiers by turns, agreed with him for a present Reward of a considerable Sum of Money in Hand, and Promises of future Preferments and Advantages, to let him with a Body of Men into the Town, upon a certain Day appointed, but the Gascoigne countermining the French Men, as soon as the Bargain was made, gave the Earl of Salisbury Notice of it, that he might secure the Town and seize the French. The Earl hereupon sent the Lord Willoughby and Sir John Falstoff with 2000 Men to effect it, who lying in Ambush for them at their coming, who were not above 300 Foot-men, and 200 Horse, suddenly encompassed them on all sides, and falling upon them slew all of them, but 25 Men, who in the Scuffle escaped by the Strength and Swiftnefs of their Horses. Alençon being thus secured, and the English Army return'd, the Earl of Salisbury went on with the intended Siege of La Fert Bernard and took it, which striking Terror into the adjoining Garrisons induced many to yield to the Earl without Resistance. The Regent, who was not a little affected with the good Services of the Earl, made him Governour of all the Places and Castles he had taken, that the Growth of his Honour might encourage him in brave Actions. The News of the great Successes of this Year being carry'd over into England, was not received with greater Joy than Thankfulness to God, who had blessed the English Arms, and according to the Manner of those Times a solemn Procession was celebrated with all serious Demonstrations of Praise to God for it.

The Earl of Salisbury takes Fort Bernard, and is made Governour of all the Places and Castles he had taken.

On the last Day of April the Parliament met at Westminster, and because the King's Presence, though but an Infant, was thought necessary, he was carry'd through the City upon a great Horse toward the Parliament-House on the First Day of the Session. The People flock'd in great Multitudes to behold him, and imagining with themselves that they could easily discern the Virtues of his Father to be transplanted into him by Nature, loaded him with loud Acclamations of Divine Blessings, and Hearty Wishes of a long and happy Life. The Parliament having their Infant-King in their Eyes (for he was often carry'd to the House this Session) was very careful and earnest to do every Thing that could be thought necessary for the Support of his Honour and Majesty, being the more industrious to act for him, by how much he was less able to shift for himself. Several Acts were made for the Publick Benefit, of which the Chief were, 1. Against the Exportation of Sheep beyond Sea without the King's License, because by carrying of Sheep into Flanders and other Parts, the Wool of England would at length become of little Value, and the Woollen-Manufacture of the Nation be diminish'd to the Damage of the Realm, to prevent which they laid an heavy Tax upon Exported Wools, of Forty Three Shillings by the Sack, Ten Shillings more than ever was paid in England for the like quantity. 2. For the Exportation of Butter and Cheese to encourage Husbandry, giving the Chancellor of England leave to grant Licenses at his Discretion to such Persons as shall desire them to sell and vend the same in all Foreign Parts, as well as at the Staple of Calais. 3. That all Merchants, Strangers, within 15 Days after they are landed in any Port of this Kingdom, shall take up for themselves Lodgings, or some other Habitation in the Town or Place, where the Port is, under some English Man, and shall not make any Sale of any Goods or Merchandizes till they are so settled, and then shall Sell all their Merchandizes within 40 Days next ensuing, and if any Goods after that time shall remain unsold, they shall be forfeited to the King's Use. This Act was intended for a double Benefit, 1. That the King might not be defrauded by Strangers of his Customs: And next, That Strangers might not by keeping of their Goods and Merchandizes understand the Wants of the Nations, and so raise the Prizes. After these Acts the Parliament gave

And then they were dismissed into their several Countries.

Duke of Gloucester and Jaqueline his Wife go to recover her Inheritance in Henault and Holland.

Soon after the Parliament was risen, the Duke of Gloucester, who had ever since his Marriage been making Preparations of Ships and Men to recover his Wife's Inheritance in Henault and Holland, went over with his Dutcheſs, and an Army of English Men of 12000 at the least, all of known Courage and Ability, and well accoutred. He landed at Callis, and passing through the Duke of Burgundy's Country with all his Force without doing any Damage arriv'd at Mons in Henault; and being there receiv'd and welcom'd as their Lord, many of the Nobles and Towns came and submitted themselves to him. The Duke of Brabant, who was in Possession of those Countries was highly displeased with this Action of the Duke of Gloucester, and since he not only had cohabited with Jaqueline as his Wife for Ten Months, and Pope Martin V. had declared the Marriage of the said Jaqueline with the Duke of Gloucester to be utterly unlawful and sinful, he was resolv'd to dispute his Title with him by Arms. Great part of those Countries adhered to him, and many of the Nobles employ'd their Interests to support him in the Possession, but he most depended upon the Assistance of the Duke of Burgundy (n) his Brother, who stood much upon the Justice of his Cause, and had promised him all his Assistance he could make, by which means an Army of 50000 Men appeared in Opposition to the Duke of Gloucester under the Command of Philip, Earl of St. Poll, and Pierre de Luxemburg, Earl of Commarſon his near Kinsman. The Duke of Gloucester seeing such an unexpected Union against him, too great for him to conquer, sent an Herald to the Duke of Burgundy to expostulate with him about his assisting the Duke of Brabant, charging him with Treason against the King of England, and challenging him to a single Combat. The Duke of Burgundy made his Defence, 'That he could not think himself guilty of any Breach of his Fidelity to the English, in opposing his Injustice in depriving another Man of his Wife, contrary to the Ordinance of God, and Rules of Holy Church; and to clear himself of this Charge he sent the Duke of Gloucester Word, That he would accept the Combat. The Duke of Gloucester being thus disappointed of his Design, which was by this Message to have brought off the Duke of Burgundy, drew off his Forces and departed with them immediately into England upon Pretence of making Preparation for the Combat, leaving his Dutcheſs behind him at Mons. His Departure left a way open to the Duke of Burgundy's Designs, who so wrought with the Citizens of Mons, that they delivered up the Dutcheſs into his Hands, who convey'd her to Gaunt, and there kept her. The Dutcheſs being thus betray'd Politickly carry'd her self without any Resentment of the Treachery, and pretending her self very happy in falling into his Hands, promised to be govern'd by him in all Things, saving that she would not be perswaded to return to her Husband again. The Duke not spying the Deceit of the Woman, gave her a Civil Entertainment, and made her Confinement very easie, which she no longer endured than she could get a fair Opportunity to escape, which she did in a little time, and fled into Holland. Here she was joyfully receiv'd by divers Lords and Persons of Interest, by whose Assistance she was able to maintain a defensive War against the Duke of Burgundy; and that she might depose her Husband, sent to the Duke of Gloucester to aid her. The Duke, tho' now little valuing her, yet thinking himself in Honour oblig'd not utterly to forsake her, sent over to her Assistance 1000 Men, under the Conduct of the Lord Fitz-walter. The News of these Aids roused the Duke of Burgundy, who fearing least Jaqueline should resign the Country of Holland into the Hands of the English, assembled all his Forces he could, and going into Holland possessed himself of all he could, and resolv'd to hinder the Landing of the English Troops. On the other side Jaqueline and the Lords on her part sought all the Means they could to secure them a safe Landing, and posted themselves near Brussels; but the Duke of Burgundy falling upon them before they could unite for mutual Defence, routed both the English and Hollanders, slaying above 800, taking many Prisoners, and putting the rest to Flight, the Lord Fitz-walter himself hardly escaping. This Defeat put an end to this Quarrel; for the Duke of Gloucester gave over all Hopes of those Countries, and knowing his Marriage to be unlawful with Jaqueline, marry'd Eleanor (o) the Daughter of Reginald Lord Cobham, and the Crafty Dutcheſs Jaqueline seeing her self unable to stand out longer against the Duke of Burgundy pretended her self to be perswaded by him, and so was reconciled to her Husband. Nothing of all these Wars remained, but the Combat of the Dukes. Honour oblig'd both not to shrink from their Engagement, and therefore they both made the necessary Preparations for it: But the Regent of France considering that it might be of very ill Consequence to the English, became a Mediator between them, and made a friendly Conclusion of all.

About the latter end of this Year of the King's Reign, the Earl of March, who had been sent into Ireland above a Year before, died there at Trimmes, leaving no Issue, and left his Honour and Estate to Richard Plantagenet, Earl of Cambridge, his Sister's Son, who being thereby Heir to Lionel, Duke of Clarence entertain'd many aspiring Thoughts of the Crown of England, which he after put into Action, as we shall in the Sequel of this History have a sufficient Evidence of.

Earl of March dies.

About Michaelmas, Peter, Duke of Coimbra, eldest Son of the King of Portugal, came into England, and finding a kind and generous Entertainment from the Protector and Nobles, stay'd the whole Year to inform himself of the Customs, and enjoy the Pleasures of the Country. (q) In the time of his Abode here there happen'd a fierce and mighty Quarrel between the Protector and the Rich Bishop of Winchester Henry Beaufort, the King's Great Uncle, the English Pope, who in his Magnificence and Grandure seem'd so much to out-shine the Protector himself, tho' on the Throne almost, that he drew his Odium and Hatred upon him, which was so increased by the haughty Spirit of the Bishop, who being the Protector's Uncle and Pope's Legate carry'd himself as if he were much above him both in Nature and Grace, that the Prote-

The Bishop's Dependances, Money and Church-Power making him able to contend with the Protector himself. The Duke of Coimbra, and the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury interposed themselves to reconcile them, and were so Zealous to heal this dangerous Breach, which would, if continued in, prove a fatal Damage to Church and State, that they went from the one Party to the other Ten Times in One Day: But all proved to no purpose. No Mediations could pacifie the Mind of the Protector, and Winchester would yield no further than was becoming his Place and State, though he was willing for the Good of the Nation, that the Difference might be composed without Arms; and therefore wrote a Letter into France to his Nephew the Duke of Bedford, that he would come over and heal Matters between them. By the Copy of the Letter it may be discerned how great the Quarrel was, and how far it had proceeded; and withal how desirous the Bishop was to have it made up, though he counts himself not to blame, and therefore it is set down in the very Words, and Old Language it was written. Duke of Bedford goes into England to reconcile them.

This Letter, which was sent over to the Regent by his Chamberlin Sir Robert Butler, was received by him with no small Grief, because he knew the Advantage his Enemies would make of it, for a Civil War in England would utterly ruin the Conquest of France, and therefore resolved with all speed to pass into England to put an end to it if possible. Richard Beauchamp the Famous Earl of Warwick was lately come into France with a Recruit of 6000 Men, which much favoured his Design, being a Person for his Courage and Fidelity every ways fit to be entrusted with the greatest Charge: Whereupon he constituted him Regent of France in his Absence, and took his Journey to England, with his Dutcheffs, and a Train of 500 Men. He arrived there on the Tenth of January. The Bishop of Winchester with a numerous Train met him at his Landing, and attended him towards London. At Merton he was met by the Mayor and Citizens of London, who joyning with the other Company honourably conducted him to Westminster, where he was lodged in the King's Palace, and the Bishop of Winchester in the Abbot's Lodgings. The next Day the Mayor presented the Regent with a pair of Silver Basons gilt, and in them a Thousand Marks of Gold from the City, which he accepted very kindly. But these Ceremonies were unequal to the Regent, who came over upon a more important Matter, and therefore as soon as Decency would permit, he obtain'd that a Council of the Nobles might be called to examine and determine the Causes of the Differences between these two great Men, and accordingly it met on the 21st of February at St. Albans, where were many hot contests between both Parties, but nothing being concluded it was adjourned to Northampton, and there met, but to as little Purpose; whereupon it was put off to the Meeting of the Parliament, which was appointed to be on March the 25th following at Leicester.

In this Parliament little was done for the Publick, only an Act passed for granting the People Liberty to transport Corn into all Places beyond the Seas, unless to the King's Enemies, with some other of particular Concern for Sheriffs and Justices, because it pleased the whole Assembly to look into the Dissention between the Protector and the Bishop of Winchester, which was grown so high, that no less Means could pacifie them, and the Authority of this Court was irresistible; wherefore they were allow'd to debate all Causes of Quarrel between them fully and freely. The Protector was the Person aggrieved as he pretended, and therefore he brought a large Accusation in Six Articles against the Bishop, and the Bishop was allow'd to give his particular Answer to them; which because they were thought not unworthy of the Parliament's Notice, may not be beneath the Reader's Perusal, and are as follows.

1426.
Reg. 4.

The ARTICLES of Accusation presented to the Parliament by the Duke of Gloucester, against Henry, Bishop of Winchester, with his ANSWERS to them severally.

I. THAT Richard Woodville, Esq; Keeper of the Tower of London, did by the Instigation and Encouragement of the said Bishop of Winchester deny Admittance to him the said Duke of Gloucester, then being Protector of the Kingdom, into the Tower contrary to Reason and Duty, and in Derogation to the King's Authority.

To this Article the Bishop answer'd, ' That while the Duke of Gloucester was gone into Henault, it happen'd, that many Pamphlets and Reports being dispersed up and down the City of London tending to Rebellion, it was order'd by the Lords of his Majesty's Council, that Richard Woodville, Esq; should with a sufficient Number of arm'd Men have the keeping of the Tower, and should not permit any Man to come into the Tower stronger than himself without the special Commandment of the King, by the Advice of his Council. After this strict Charge the Duke of Gloucester returning out of Henault, and not approving the fortifying the Tower, told the Citizens, who were dissatisfied at it, That had he been in England it should not have been so, and immediately going to the Tower demanded Admittance, but Woodville not daring to give him Entrance came to the Bishop of Winchester for Advice, who told him, That the Duke of Gloucester took upon him greater Authority than he ought, and that before he admitted him into the Tower he ought to provide himself a sufficient Warrant of the Council and King for his so doing contrary to the former Order.

II. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester without the Advice and Consent of my Lord Duke of Gloucester, or of his Majesty's Privy-Council contrived and purposed to lay Hands of his Majesty's Person, and to have remov'd him from Eltham, the Place that he was then in, to Windsor, there to put him under the Government of such Persons as he pleased.

The Bishop's Answer to this Article was, ' That he never could propound to himself any Advantage by removing the King, or taking him into his Custody or Charge, nor did ever intend to meddle with any Thing about the King's Person without the Advice of the Privy-Council, as in Time and Place he could prove.

III. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester knowing, that the Duke of Gloucester had resolv'd to prevent his Design of seizing the King's Person at Eltham, laid wait for him, by placing arm'd Men at the End of London-Bridge, and in the Windows of the Chambers and Cellars in Southwark to have kill'd him, if he had passed that way, all which is against the King's Peace, and Duty of a true Subject.

The Bishop's Defence to this heavy Charge was this, ' That true indeed it is, that he did provide a certain Number of arm'd Men, and set them at the Foot of London-Bridge, and other Places, without any Intention to do any bodily Harm to the Duke of Gloucester, but merely for his own Safety and Defence, being inform'd by several credible Persons, that my Lord Duke of Gloucester had purposed bodily Harm to him, and gather'd together a company of Citizens for that End.

IV. That the late King Henry the Fifth told him, That when he was Prince, a Man was seized in his Chamber, who was hid behind the Hangings, and confessed after his Apprehension, that he was set at Work by the Bishop of Winchester to kill the Prince in his Bed. He was deliver'd to the Earl of Arundel, who drown'd him in a Sack in the Thames.

To this Accusation the Bishop reply'd, ' That he was ever a true and faithful Subject to his Sovereigns, and never purposed or contrived any Treason against any of their Persons, and especially against his Sovereign Lord King Henry the Fifth. And this he thought was sufficiently evident to any that consider'd the great Wisdom and Courage of the said King, and the great Trust he reposed in him so long as he remain'd King; which he would not have done had he found him Guilty of such Unfaithfulness to him while he was Prince.

V. That the Bishop of Winchester in the Sickness of King Henry the Fourth, advised his Son Prince Henry, to assume the Government of the Nation before his Father's Death, as the said Prince himself told him.

The Bishop reply'd, ' That this was mere Calumny, which could not be prov'd, and he hop'd the Parliament would appoint them Judges, that he might vindicate his Honour, or else leave him to sue out his Right before suitable Judges.

VI. That my Lord Bishop of Winchester had in his Letter to the Duke of Bedford plainly declared his malicious Purpose of assembling the People, and stirring up a Rebellion in the Nation contrary to the King's Peace. (r)

The Bishop's Answer to this Accusation was, ' That he never had any Intention to disturb the Peace of the Nation, or raise any Rebellion, but sent to the Duke of Bedford to come over in haste to settle all Things that were prejudicial to the Peace; and though he had indeed written in the Letter, That if he tarried, we shall put the Land in Adventure by a Field, such a Brother ye have here, he did not mean it of any Design of his own, but concerning the Seditious Assemblies of Masons, Carpenters, Tilers and Plaisterers, who being distast'd by the late Act of Parliament against excessive Wages of those Trades, had given out many seditious Speeches and Menaces against the great Men, which tended much to Rebellion, and yet the Duke of Gloucester did not use his Endeavour, as he ought to have done in his Place, to suppress such unlawful Assemblies, so that he fear'd the King and his good Subjects must have made a Field to withstand them: To prevent which he chiefly desir'd the Duke of Bedford to come over.

A. D. 1426. This Charge, and the Answers to it being thus deliver'd into the Parliament, the further Examination of it was by the Houses devolv'd upon a select Number of Lords, viz. Henry, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Thomas, Duke of Exeter, John, Duke of Norfolk (s), Thomas, Bishop of Durham, Philip, Bishop of Worcester, John, Bishop of Bath, Humphry, Earl of Stafford, Ralph, Lord Cornwall, and Mr. Abnewicke, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, who having thoroughly examin'd all

The Protector and Bishop of Winchester made Friends.

Matters, acquitted the Bishop, and by a formal Award enjoy'd them to be firm Friends for the future, and by such Inducements wrought upon them, that they shook Hands, and parted with all outward Signs of perfect Love and Agreement, which gave a mighty Satisfaction to all people both of the Clergy and Laity. And the King by the Advice of his Council made a magnificent Feast at Whitsuntide to rejoyce for this happy Reconciliation. At this Feast the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, Knighted King Henry, who immediately made Richard Plantagenet, Earl of Cambridge, Duke of York, and restor'd John, Lord Mowbrey, Earl-Marshall, Son of Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, who was banish'd by Richard the Second, to the Title and Stile of Duke of Norfolk, and made above Forty others Knights. After this the Parliament sat till June the 15th following, but did nothing more than raise a Supply of Men and Money to carry on the Conquest of France, which were gather'd out of the great Cities and Towns of the Kingdom chiefly.

Several remarkable Accidents.

The Parliament being dissolv'd, the King now about Five Years of Age, went to Killingworth-Castle, and the Nation remain'd in great Peace. Several remarkable Accidents happen'd after it. Henry Chicheley, Arch-Bishop of Canterbury founded a College at Higham-Ferrers in Norhamptonshire of Eight Fellows, Four Clerks and Six Choristers, and an Hospital for poor and impotent Folks of the said Town, for which he also obtain'd many Immunities and Priviledges. His Two Brethren, Robert and William Chicheley, Aldermen of London, afterward gave very considerable Revenues to the said Foundations. This Summer also died that wise and faithful Statesman Thomas, Duke of Exeter, great Uncle to King Henry, at his Mannor of Greenwich, and was buried at St. Edmunds-Bury in Suffolk, whither he was carry'd with great Ceremony to be interred, and not long after him the said Duke's half Sister the Lady Elizabeth, own Sister to King Henry the Fourth, who had been married to the Lord John Holland, Duke of Exeter, and after to the Lord Fanhope, died and was buried in the Black-Fryers in London. John Fortham, sometime Treasurer of England, and Bishop of Durham and Ely at the same time died, and Pope Martin put into the See of Ely Philip Morgan, translated from the See of Worcester thither. The King and Nobility had recommended to the Choice of the Convent William Abnewicke, Doctor of both Laws, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, and the King's Confessor, but they neglecting that Proposal elected Peter the Prior of Ely: The Pope seeing this Disagreement between the King and Convent, set up his own Usurpations, and put in Philip Morgan. While the Regent continu'd in England the Earl of Warwick was very active, and carry'd on the English Victories in France with great Success, for he entred into the Country of Main and besieged and took several Places of Importance, as Chasteau de Loire, of which he made Matthew Gough Captain, the Castle of Maiet, into which he put John Winter, Esquire with a sufficient Number of Men, the Castle of Lade, which he gave to William Gladesdale Gentleman, the Castle of Montdublean, which he committed to the Lord Willoughby, by which Achievements his Name became a Terror to the French, inso-much, that when the French in the Country of Beauvais were gather'd into a Body to have set on the English, the very Fame of his Approach caused them to disperse themselves. And so having no Enemies to oppose him: He return'd to Paris full of Honour and Victories.

Earl of Warwick's Actions in France.

A. D. 1426. Reg. 4.

On Saturday being the Eve of St. Michael in the Morning between Two and Three a Clock began a very dreadful Earthquake, which being accompany'd with Thunder and Lightning struck Terror into all Creatures. It continu'd in great Violence for Two Hours, and as it was afterwards found, was general over the whole World, so that Men thought the World would then have been at an End, and the Judgment have follow'd according to the Prognosticks our Saviour himself hath given us. The Beasts of the Field were terrified with this unusual Motion, and roaring for Fear drew near to the Towns and Houses to protect them: Nor were the Birds of the Air unsensible of it, who by their Shreeks and Cries shew'd their Fears of it. By so great a Judgment did God endeavour to awaken secure Men, that if they did not repent even the Birds and Beasts might witness against them, and condemn their Hardness and Impenitency. About the same time was John Rainwell Fishmonger chosen Mayor of London, a Person of a publick Spirit, a good Magistrate, and a great Benefactor to the City; for he gave certain Lands and Tenements for the Use and Benefit of Three Wards in the said City, viz. Bishopsgate Ward, Dowgate Ward and Aldgate Ward, to pay the Parliament-Taxes for the poor House-keepers of the said Wards for ever (provided they did not exceed Three Fifteens in One Year:) He also began the Building of the Tower at the Draw-Bridge of London, Works both of great Charity and general Use.

Reg. 5. A violent Earthquake.

J. Rainwell chosen Mayor.

The Duke of Bedford, Regent of France yet remaining in England, the Duke of Burgundy, now disaffected to the English, but still pretending a strict Alliance and Friendship with them, made his Request to the Regent to permit the Duke of Alençon, who had been taken at the Battel of Verneuil, to be redeem'd, and by his Interests obtain'd, that upon the Payment of Two Hundred Thousand Crowns (or as others, Scutes) or Fifty Thousand Marks, he should be released. The Regent and Protector were very fearful of the ill Consequence of his Liberty, being a zealous promoter of King Charles's Interests, and an experienced and valiant Commander, and therefore required, that he should first acknowledge Henry the Sixth, the rightful and lawful Heir and King of France, but he absolutely refused it, which might have been sufficient Cause to have continu'd him Prisoner in England, but because it was thought necessary to gratifie the Duke of Burgundy, who pretended himself a firm Friend to the English, and had been long at Enmity with the Duke of Alençon about his Father's Death, and by this extraordinary piece of Kindness might gain so much upon his Affe-

A. D. 1427. Duke of Bretagne and his Brother relinquish the English Interests. The Regent having kept his Christmas with the King, prepared for his Return into France, where some Changes, to the no small Disadvantage of the English had hapned in his Absence; for tho' nothing was wanting in the Earl of Warwick, either of Vigilancy, Care, or Courage, yet the Alliance with the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, began now to be broken by the Departure of the Duke of Bretagne, and his Brother Arthur of Richmond, over to the French King's Interests, of whom they were joyfully received; and the latter was made Constable of France. This Change was a great Loss to the English, and required a speedy Care to prevent the ill Consequences of it. The Regent therefore about Candlemas departed England, and landed at Callis, Feb. 5. The Bishop of Winchester accompanied him, and at Callis in our Lady's Church, received a Cardinal's Hat from the Pope. The late King Hen. V. who foresaw what a Prejudice the Pride and Covetousness of this Prelate would prove to the Nation, if he were put into that Dignity, withstood his Promotion, and prevented it all his Life; but now the King himself being young, and the Duke of Bedford his Friend, he was at Liberty to obtain his ambitious Purpose, which by the Pope's Legate, he was enstated in at Callis on the Feast of the Purification; and soon after purchased himself a Bull-Legantine, by which he was made the Pope's Legate in this Nation, and by his Authority as such, raised such a Mass of Money out of the Spiritualities of the Kingdom, that he became almost the only wealthy Man in the Nation, and was commonly upon that Account called The rich Cardinal of Winchester. The Regent stayed a while at Callis to see this Ceremony over, and honour the Bishop with his Presence at his Inauguration, which being ended, the Regent taking him by his right Hand, conveyed him with mighty Respect to his Lodging, and there gave him and the Lords with him a magnificent Banquet, and then within a few Days left Callis, and passing thro' Picardy, went to Paris. His Arrival put an End to the Authority of the Earl of Warwick in France, but brought him the News of a more honourable and greater Charge, which the Nobles and Council of England had thought fit to impose upon him, viz. to be Governour of the Person of King Henry in the Place of the Duke of Exeter, lately deceased. This Service the noble Earl could not refuse; but the Revolt of the Duke of Brittain having occasioned some Troubles to the English, which he was about to remove before the Regent arrived, he resolved first to see them settled before his Departure. The greatest Molestation this way, was by the Fortifying of Pontorson, a Town on the Confines of Brittain, into which the Lord of Rustinian, Marshal of Brittain, with a Body of a 1000 Men was put to defend it, and ravage the adjoining Country of Constantine, which they did without Mercy; but at length being encountered by the Garrison of Auranches, a City in the Possession of the English, they were after a long Fight put to flight, and forced into the Town with Loss, the Captain himself being taken Prisoner. The Duke of Bedford hearing of this, and knowing, that tho' the English had the better in this Skirmish, yet how prejudicial the Garrison would be to their Territories, if not restrain'd, he sent the Earl of Warwick and Lord Scales, with an Army of 7000 Men to besiege it, who so streightly beset the Town, that none could go into it, or out. The Besieged held out very valiantly a long time in hopes of Relief from the French King as was promised them, so that Provision began to be very scarce in the English Camp, and they were forced to seek Forage in the adjoining Parts with much Loss and Hazard from the Garrison of St. Michael's Mount. The French King at last sent the Lord Raix, his Lieutenant-General, with an Army of 3000 Men to relieve it, who in his March took two small Castles, Malicorn and Lude; but when they came, hearing that the Earl of Warwick and the English were resolved to fight him, if he attempted to raise the Siege, he drew off his Men, and returned to King Charles, whereupon the Besieged came to a Capitulation to resign the Town upon Condition, that they might have Liberty to depart with Horse and Arms only; which being granted, the English had possession of the Town given them, and the Earl made the Lord Rosse and Lord Talbot Governours of it, with a convenient Garrison, and then returned to the Regent to Paris. This Success of the English brought the Duke of Bretagne again to a Treaty with the Regent, in which he agreed not only not to molest the English for the future, but to demolish the Town of Pontorson, and St. James de Beauron; and so the Duke of Bretagne was made, if not a Friend, yet afraid to be longer an Enemy; and the English for the present were eased of his Oppression, which would have proved very troublesome.

The Regent having thus removed this new and unexpected Enemy, turned his Arms again into the old Current to subdue all the Towns, that still adhered to Charles, the pretended King of France; and sent his Captains out to subdue such Places, as refused Subjection to the English; and reduced several of them. For Christopher Hanson, Philip Gough, and Martin Godfrey took the Castle of St. Laurence de Mortois by Surprise. Sir H. Falstaffe, the Governour of the Countries of Anjou and Maine, having assembled a strong Body of Men, got by 10 Days Siege the Castle of St. Owen Distais near the Town of Lavall. Then he laid siege to the strong Castle of Graville, and assaulted it 12 Days, at the end of which, the Garrison came to a Composition, and gave Pledges to resign it upon a certain Day, if it were not relieved by the French King. Sir John immediately signified this Agreement to the Regent, who raising a great Force of 20000 Men, came attended with the Earls of Mortaign and Warwick, the Lords Rosse and Talbot, to encounter the French, if they should attempt the Rescue of it; but they dare not appear, tho' they were sent for that Purpose, because they were afraid of the English Army, whereupon the Regent immediately ordered Sir John Falstaffe to require the Delivery of the Castle; but the Besieged having furnished themselves with Provision and Ammunition, and well mann'd it in the Time of Truce, refused to surrender it, and so the Hostages were brought out, and hanged in their Sight. After this the Lord Talbot was made Governour of Maine and Anjou, and Sir

A. D. 1427. Reg. 6. John Falstaffe removed to another Charge. This Lord being of as great Courage as Birth, carried on the English Conquest so fast in these Parts, that his very Name became a Terror to the French, and his Fame spread almost over the World. The Duke of Bedford also hearing that the Town of Montargis in the County of Orleanse, was but weakly furnished, and carelessly kept, sent the Earl of Suffolk, his Brother Sir John Pool and Sir Henry Bisset, with an Army of 6000 Men to beset it by Land, and the Earl of Warwick with a good Number of Men of War to stop up the Port by Sea, (u) that no Assistance of Men or Victuals should come into it; but they found the Places strongly fortified, and provided that they held out 2 Months and more, so that the French had time to provide for its Relief; and accordingly, Arthur, Earl of Richmond, Constable of France, coming suddenly upon a Party of the Besiegers in the Night, defeated them without Resistance, killing above 1500, Sir John Pool and Sir Henry Bisset hardly escaping themselves, and so caused the Siege to be raised. This Victory was received with great Joy by the French King's Party, and had been triumphantly magnified, had not their Losses upon the Coasts of Brittain, by a Party of English, under the Command of Sir Nicholas Burdet, sent by the Duke of Somerset thither, equalized at least, if not surmounted the Advantage they had at Montargis, so that the French had little Reason to rejoyce at the Successes mixed with so much ill Fortune.

Duke of Alençon takes Mans by Treachery of the English.

The Duke of Alençon lately come out of his Imprisonment in England, after some Months Converse in France to learn the Estate of the French King's Affairs, and settle his own, now enters upon the Stage of Action. The good Opinion that the French had of his Abilities and Experience put new Life into their Cause, and drooping Minds, and so much the more, because he began with an Action, which had very much of a promising Advantage, as well as Success in it, which was the Recovery of the City of Mans. Several of the Chief of the Inhabitants of that City, as well as of the chief Magistrates as Clergy, being well affected to the French King, entered into a Conspiracy to betray the City to him, which they signified to him by Letters conveyed by certain Friars. The French King immediately sent 500 Men under the Command of the Lords De la Bieth and Faiet to take possession of the Town, which was accordingly delivered up to them by the Conspirators, and the English Guards at the Gates, were all slain. The French being thus Masters of the Town, fell upon the English, and slew many of them, scarce any of them understanding the Matter, but only supposing that the Citizens had in general rose up against them. The Earl of Suffolk, the Governour of the Town, had gotten knowledge of the Matter by some that had escaped; and with what English he could got into the Castle, then under the Command of Thomas Gower, Esq; but they were so crowded, that they could make little or no Defence for themselves, wherefore they sent a Message to the Lord Talbot, then at Alençon, to desire his speedy Assistance, declaring their Case to him. The Lord Talbot being as diligent a Commander as valiant, immediately attempts their Relief in the Night, and with 700 Men marches to Mans, where finding the French secure, he falls upon them, recovers the Town, releases the English, takes above 400 French Gentlemen Captive, and returns again to Alençon. The Earl of Suffolk being thus resettled, made a strict Search and Enquiry into the Authors of this Treason, who being found to be 30 of the chief Citizens, 20 Priests, and 15 Friars, were all upon Conviction hanged, and so received the just Reward of their Merits. Mans being thus happily recovered, and the English every ways on the winning Side, Fortune's Frowns soon clearing up into Smiles on them, the Earl of Warwick, whose Valour would not suffer him to leave his Country-Men in any Danger, began to think of Returning into England to take care of the King, whom the Nobles had committed to him. He had done so much in France the last Year, that the Council did not think that Nation could be kept without a Man of equal Value in his Place, and therefore Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, commonly called in England, The good Earl, was sent into France with 6000 choice Men well accoutred, to supply his Room, and secure those Places with equal Valour, with which he had gotten them.

Soon after the Earl of Salisbury's Arrival at Paris with his fresh Men, the Regent called a great Council of all the Nobles and Commanders of the English Army, and entered into a long Consultation, how they should proceed for the most speedy and effectual Way of subduing France; and the Earl of Salisbury, who was a Person of both approved Judgment, as well as Valour, propounded to them the Siege of Orleanse, as a certain Step to it, it being the principal City which adhered to the French King, and by the Conquest of it, would probably let them into all the rest, and particularly to Bourges, the French King's Residence. Some Debates were in the Council about the Difficulty of the Enterprize, but at length they all yielded, and the Siege of Orleanse was resolved on. The Earl of Salisbury himself was thought by all of them, to be the fittest Person to command at the Siege, and accordingly was sent, accompanied with the Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Talbot, and an Army of 10000 Men well furnished with Artillery, Provision, and Ammunition for so great an Attempt. While Preparations were thus making, the French had got Intelligence of the Design of the English, and put in a strong Garrison of French and Scots under the Command of the Bastard of Orleanse, and the Bishop of the City, who not only made strong Fortifications about the Town for their own Defence, but destroyed all the Suburbs, in which were 12 Parish-Churches, and 4 Monasteries for as many Orders of Friars; and cut down all the Vines, Trees and Bushes within 5 Leagues of the City, that the Enemy might find no manner of Support or Refuge in the Country. But all this did not discourage the English, tho' it made the Siege more difficult, yet nothing seemed impossible to such brave Minds, as those of Salisbury and Talbot, who, notwithstanding marched towards it, and fate down before it in the Beginning of September, and planted the Siege on the one Side of the River Loire. Both Parties were full of Courage and Resolution, because the Fate of France depended upon this Siege, as was thought, whoever got Orleanse, got all France. The English made several fierce Assaults, and the French as strictly repulsed them. Three Weeks passed without any considerable Advantage on

Reg. 6. either Side; but at length the Bastard of *Orlean*ce making a vigorous Sally out of the Gate of the Bridge, was after a sharp Dispute beaten back with great Loss, and pursued so close, that the English entred the Gate with him, and took the great Bulwark upon the Bridge, with a Tower standing at the End of the same, which by its advantageous Situation, was a great Help to take the Town, because from it was a free Prospect into all Parts of the City, so that the English Commanders might easily observe the best Places for their Assaults, which they were not wanting to improve; for the Earl of Salisbury caused several Bulwarks to be raised round about the Town, planting Ordinance, where he could perceive any likelihood to batter down the Walls. The French within were as busie to defend themselves, and make good the Walls against the English Guns, raising Guns against Guns, and Forts against Bulwarks, and making new Rampiers as strong as might be. The French King, who knew how much his Welfare depended upon the Success of this Siege, was extremely troubled at this first Advantage gotten by the English, fearing now the Loss of all, and despairing almost of any future Success, and tho' the Town held out well, yet he looked upon his Destruction not less certain, tho' longer in coming, and could almost have wished the Fates to hasten his Ruin, the Fears of which were as great a Torment to his Mind, as the suffering it self could be. But while he remained in this despairing State of Mind, Providence was pleased not only to give the Besieged at *Orlean*ce some Advantage, but to raise them up (as the French Historians say) a special instrument of Deliverance, by inspiring Joan d'Arc, afterwards commonly called *Joan of Orlean*ce, both with a certain Perswasion of Restoring him to his Kingdom and Throne, and with a manlike Courage to effect it, and so revived the fainting Hopes of that King, whose Courage and Patience was almost invincible. And indeed, as if Divine Justice had taken sufficient Vengeance upon the French Nation for their former Sins, he began to give them some glympse of his Favour again, by the Misfortunes of the English, and Success of the French, which began to shew it self in the Death of the Earl of Salisbury, a Person of that Wisdom, Courage and Conduct, that the Fortune of the English Armies seemed to live and dye in him. He was both the Adviser and chief Actor in this Siege, and knowing perfectly, that the Fate of France depended upon the Success of this Attempt, he was very diligent to improve, and carry on all Advantages for the effecting of it, and cared not to entrust almost any Man without his own Presence, lest they should Miscarry. The Tower, which the English had taken on the Bridge, was much made use of by him, for observing where the Town might most successfully be assaulted, and in an upper Room, where the Prospect of the City lay from a Window, he often entred into Consultations with his Commanders about Taking the Town. The Citizens were sensible of it, and had taken notice, that there was much looking out of the Window, and had thereupon planted a great Gun full upon it, to shoot at an Advantage, and a Gunner always attended upon it to discharge it as Occasion served. On the Nine and Fiftieth Day after the Siege began, the Earl of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Gargrave and William Glasdale, with divers others, were in a deep Consultation in the said Room, and being observed by the Gunner frequently to look out at the Grate, he fired his Gun at them, which Shot so shattered the Bars of the Window, that one of them struck the Earl of Salisbury on the Face, and put out one of his Eyes, and struck off a part of his Cheek; Sir Thomas Gargrave also was so grievously bruised and wounded, that he died within Two Days. The Earl of Salisbury was conveyed to Meun, on the Loire, and all possible Care taken for his Recovery; but his Wound was past Cure, so that he died at the End of 8 Days; and his Body was soon after carried with much Solemnity into England, and buried by his Ancestors at Bissam in Barkshire. He left only one Daughter, who was married to Richard Nevil, Son to Ralph, Earl of Westmerland, who was after Earl of Warwick. The Loss of this great Man, was received with much Grief by all the English, but by none so much as by the Duke of Bedford, who was more sensible of his Worth, while living, and so of the Damage to the English by his Death; yet he would not seem to want him, and therefore appointed the Earl of Suffolk to be his Lieutenant, and Captain of the Siege; and with the Lord Scales, Lord Talbot, Sir John Falstaffe, and some others, to carry it on with all Vigour and Courage possible; who accordingly left nothing unattempted that Policy could devise, or daring Boldness atchieve. But the Town being strong of it self, and filled with a good Garrison, held out till Lent was almost past without any Signs of Yielding, putting the English Camp to very great Streights for Provision, which they were forced to fetch as far as Paris, because the Country round about them was depopulated and destroyed. At length the Besieged beat for a Parley, and came to a Treaty to save themselves. The English accepted it, but the Besieged would not agree to resign it to the Duke of Bedford, but only to the Duke of Burgundy to be kept for the Duke of *Orlean*ce, or his Brother the Duke of Angoulesm, hoping either to obtain more Favour from their Country-Man if it were granted, or if not, to beget a private Grudge between them, which indeed came to pass; for when he had sent to the Duke to signifie the Conditions upon which the Town offered to yield, tho' he was advised to agree to the Conditions, and suffer it to be resigned to the Duke of Burgundy, yet the Regent would by no means, but returned Answer, 'That it was neither convenient nor honourable, that a City so long besieged by the King of England, and defended with so much Obstinacy and Resolution, should be surrendered upon their own Terms, or to any other than King Henry himself, or his Deputy, and therefore would not assent to any other Terms. This Answer the Duke of Burgundy took very ill from the Regent, conceiving that the English envied his Honour and Interest, and kept it deeply laid up in his Mind.

The Regent refusing to accept the Proposals of the Besieged the Surrender of the Town was delay'd, and by that Means gave time for the wonderful Deliverance, which after follow'd after this manner. A young Maid nam'd Joan d'Arc, the Daughter of James d'Arc and Isabel his Wife, a poor Country-Man, who inhabited in a small Village in Berry call'd Domremy, aged about Eighteen Years, asserted with great Zeal and Confidence, 'That she had a Revelation, that she should deliver King Charles from his present Troubles, and drive the English from Orleans, and having caused him to be crown'd at Rhemes restore the whole Kingdom

This Revelation she first discover'd to her Father and Mother, and Neighbours, and after was perswaded to relate it to the Sieur Baudricourt, Provost of Voucouleurs, which she did with a great deal of Seriousness and Resolution. The Provost being a sage and discret Person, and knowing, that Pretences of Revelation were not easily to be credited at first, look'd upon her to be possessed with a deep Melancholy, and told her, 'That it was very unlikely, that she being a Woman should be an Instrument of their Deliverance, when all the Attempts of the most illustrious and brave Personages had proved in vain: But when he saw her unmovable Resolution, and consider'd the Gravity and Prudence of her Discourse, he thought fit to carry her to the King for his own Discharge, who lay then with his Court at Chinon. She was brought into that Town March the 6th, and the News of her Arrival was receiv'd by the King and his Council with much Pleasure, and because she had always been educated in the Country, and had never seen the King, it was contriv'd, that the King should put on a Country-Man's Habit, lest she should know him by his Regal Ornaments and Diadem, and by this Experiment try, whether she were inspir'd or no. When the young Woman was brought into the Chamber she went directly to the King, though in Disguise, as if she had been brought up in the Court all her Life. The Courtiers that stood about her, told her, that she was mistaken, but she constantly averred, that it was he, though she had never seen him before, and then immediately began to discourse with him and assure him, that she had a special Command from the God of Heaven to revive the sinking Fortune of the King and Kingdom. This Action turn'd their Scorn into Admiration, and what they derided at first, they began to believe, so that now her Words were thought worthy of more serious Consideration, and that there might be no Mistake about so great a Matter, it was referred to the Judgement both of the King's Council, and of the most eminent Divines of his Party, who after many Debates resolv'd, 'That in Cases desperate the Providence of God did often make use of extraordinary Remedies, and in like Revolutions of State, when the Courage of Men was lost, he rais'd up Women for its Deliverance, as Deborah and Judith, who by their Valour rescu'd the People of Israel from the Tyranny of two Heathen Kings, Jabin and Nebuchadnezzar: That Necessity made it lawful to use all sorts of Remedies for their own Defence and Recovery, and so to try whether what this Maid has so confidently asserted, be true, yet with so much Caution as to run no Hazzard. These Resolutions being assented to by the King, all Things were submitted to her Conduct, as far as was Safe and Convenient, which she easily yielded to, being as modest and reasonable in her Actions, as in her Proposals. The News was no sooner brought to her, but she began the Work, which she said she had a Command from God to execute, and as inspir'd by God manfully entred upon those Actions, which a mere Womanish Valour would not dare to think on. She arm'd her self with all Warlike Habiliments, and mounted her Horse as a Man. The Spear which was laid up in Touraine in a Place call'd St. Catherine de Fieribois was given her upon her Request, and the Admiral of France and Marshal, who were with a sufficient Strength to carry a Supply of Victuals into the Town, had a special Charge given them to take care of her Safety, and conduct her without Hazzard into it. She being thus arm'd and equipp'd took her Leave of the King with a Deportment befitting a great Captain, and in April the 12th left Chinon, and arriv'd safely at Orleans, where she was receiv'd as a Messenger sent by Heaven for their Deliverance, with such a Joy as People reviving from Despair do shew, having Faith to believe, as much as she could promise them, because in God's Name. Joan being gotten safe into the Town behav'd her self without any Insolence or extravagant Boasting, making Proposals of Peace, before she would begin any Warlike Enterprize, and to that End sent this following Letter to the Chief Commanders of the English Army by a Trumpet.

King of England,

Give an Account to the King of Heaven for his Royal Blood. Surrender up to the Virgin the Keys of all the good Towns, which you have taken by Force. She is come from Heaven to vindicate the Royal Blood of France, and is very ready to make Peace, if thou wilt submit to reasonable Terms, and (as Equity and Justice requires) restore what thou hast taken from him. King of England, if thou wilt not do thus, I am the Captain of the Wars, and in whatsoever part of France I shall find any of the English Nation, I will drive them out whether they will or no; but if they will submit, I will take them to Mercy? I am come from the King of Heaven to expel you out of France, and if you will not obey, I will make such a slaughter and stir among you as hath not been this Thousand Years in France. Believe me, The King of Heaven will give me and my Forces such irresistible Courage and Strength, as you shall not be able to oppose. Go in God's Name into your own Country, and be not obstinate to your own Opinions, for ye shall not hold France of the King of Heaven, the Son of the Virgin Mary, but Charles the true Heir of it shall again possess it and be King of it, for God hath given it him, and he shall enter Paris with a goodly Train. You William Pawlet, Earl of Suffolk, John, Lord Talbot, Thomas, Lord Scales, Lieutenants of the Duke of Bedford, and you Duke of Bedford, who callest thy self Regent of the Kingdom of France, be sparing of innocent Blood, and give Orleans its Liberty. If you will not do Justice to those whom you have wronged, the French will do the noblest Exploit that ever was done in Christendom. Mind this wholesome Advice given you by God and His Virgin.

This Letter being carry'd to the Earl of Suffolk was receiv'd with great Laughter, and King Charles and his Council were derided, as Persons transported with an extravagant Folly, who would make use of such irrational Means for their own Defence, and the English from this Time began to promise themselves a certain Victory, since the French had no better ways to secure themselves, than such groundless Projects. The Trumpeter, who brought this Letter was imprison'd, which though the French complain'd of, as contrary to the Laws of Arms, yet the English justified it by the madness of the Message, and thought such an Enthusiastick Defiance ought not to be treated in the common Methods. Joan the Virgin seeing her Letter disregarded, and no way left to carry on her Work but by open force of Arms, advises

A. D. 1428. Reg. 6. advises the Chief Governours of the Siege, the Earls of Dunois, Pothon and Xantrails to prepare for an Assault, and to sally out upon the English with all their Force, saying: 'God is for us, and the English cannot escape our Hands. Let us but put on an answerable Courage to the Assistance God intends us, and we shall defeat all the Rascals of that Army. The Commons, who putting Confidence in her had flock'd about her in great Numbers, promised themselves mighty Success in the Attempt, and readily attended her Motions; but the Commanders had little Hopes of a Victory against those Enemies, which ever conquer'd them, yet resolv'd to follow her Advice for once, as an Oracle. All Things therefore being well prepared, the Besieged with Joan in the Head of them made a vigorous Sally at the Gate of Burgundy, and first set upon the Fort of St. Lupe adjoining to it, which was defended by 400 English. The French, as inspired with an unusual Courage, assaulted it with such Fury, that no Opposition the English could make, could keep them from Scaling it, which so affrighted them, that they left the Castle to the French, and fled, but were slain many of them, and others taken Prisoners. This successful Beginning raised the Opinion of the Virgin in the Minds of all, and the People at her Return to her Lodging ran in Flocks to meet her, crying, Blessed be the Holy Virgin sent by God to deliver us. Victory seem'd to be now come over to the French; and though the English Generals did all they could to keep up the dying Courage of their Soldiers, yet the French every Day got some Advantage of them, and at length on May the 8th, obliged them to raise the Siege, which they did in good Order, and retreated part under the Earl of Suffolk to Jargeaux the next English Garrison, and part under the Lord Talbot to Mehun. The French flush'd with this Victory had no sooner put Orleans into a Posture of Defence, but they pursu'd the English to Jargeaux, and after a short Siege made themselves Masters of it July the 12th, taking the Earl of Suffolk and his Brother Prisoners, with many others.

Siege of Orleans raised by Joan's Conduct.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

While the Siege of Orleans was thus carry'd on, little was done in England, save that about the 14th of October in the beginning of this Year a Parliament met at Westminster, and provided for the good of the Nation by enacting several Laws, and for the Defence of it, by giving a large Tax for carrying on the War with France. The Acts were of good Benefit to the Publick: As,

1. That whereas by reason of the quick Return of Capias's in the King's Bench, Exigents were granted and awarded, whereby divers Persons being by base and fraudulent Practices outlaw'd, their Goods and Chattels were immediately seiz'd, as forfeited to our Lord the King, and so divers of the King's faithful Subjects were utterly undone, as by the Complaints of the Commons in Parliament doth appear, Before any Exigents shall be granted for the future, every Capias shall be directed to the Sheriffs at least six Weeks, and if upon the Return the Judges shall think fit to grant an Exigent, they may proceed as formerly, but if any be granted before the Return of the Writ, it shall be void.

2. That Sheriffs shall be oblig'd under the Penalty of Forty Pound to deliver to all Plaintiffs, Tenants or Defendants a true Copy of their Pannels six Days before the Assizes, when they shall be so requir'd by the said Plaintiffs or Defendants.

3. Whereas Sheriffs by corrupt Juries were wrongfully endited to the Justices of Assize for making false Returns of the Knights chosen in their several Shires to serve in Parliament, by which Means the Sheriffs were liable to pay an Hundred Pounds Forfeiture, and the Knights lost their accustom'd Wages in Parliament without Remedy; therefore it was enacted, That Sheriffs and Knights against whom any Inquests or Offices of undue Elections are found shall for the future have their Answer, and traverse to such Inquests and Offices, and shall not be endamag'd till duly convicted.

4. By this Parliament also it was appointed, that several Commillions of Sewers should be issu'd out by the Chancellor of England into all Parts of the Realm to cleanse and repair all Walls, Ditches, Gutters, Bridges, Wears, &c. to prevent the great Inundations of the Sea and Rivers which had happen'd in divers Parts of the Nation. And a Form of Commillion was compos'd on purpose, that it might be the more effectual, which is annex'd to it, and an Order, that for Ten Years next ensuing they should be strictly executed, that all Water courses should be cleansed, and the Nation freed from the Prejudices it had suffer'd a long time by frequent Inundations.

This Parliament in Consideration of the King's Expence in carrying on the War in France, which grew very dubious, and more chargeable, granted very large Taxes, viz. a Subsidy of Three Shillings by the Tun for all Wine imported, and Twelve Pence by the Pound for all Merchandize, except Wool, Wool-fells and Cloth, which had a Tax before laid upon them. But besides these a kind of Poll-Tax, tho' not general was laid upon several Parishes, viz. In every Parish where the Living was worth Ten Mark per Annum, it was enacted, That Ten of the chiefeft Parishoners should pay Six Shillings and Eight Pence per Head; and in such Parishes as the Living was worth Ten Pounds per Annum, a like Number of the chief Inhabitants should pay a Mark; and in all Corporations it was order'd, that every Person worth above Twenty Shillings besides his Household-Goods and Apparel, should pay Four Pence by the Head to the King, and so proportionably for every Twenty Shillings all Persons were worth, by which means the Tax was much increased in Cities and Boroughs.

In this Sixth Year of the King, Wickliff and his Memory was solemnly condemn'd at the Council of Constance (or rather Sienna) held under Pope John, after this manner. Proclamation being first made, and Commandment given, that if any Person or Persons could or would defend Wickliff or his Memory, they should immediately appear and be heard; none daring to be his Advocate, the Council proceeded to examine several Witnesses, whom they had brought to prove, That John Wickliff in his Life-time held and taught many Heretical and Heterodox Doctrines, contrary to the receiv'd Tenets and Practices of the Christian Church in all Ages, and that he dy'd in an obstinate and wilful Impenitency of those Opinions, for which he ought to be condemn'd and curst by the Church: Whereupon the Synod at the Request of the Steward of the Pope's Treasury proceeded to give Sentence against the said Wickliff and his Memory. 'That the said John Wickliff being a notorious obstinate Heretick, and dying in his Heresie, his Body and Bones, if they might be discern'd from the Bodies of other faithful People, should be taken up out of the Ground, and

The Execution of this Sentence which was approv'd by the whole Assembly, was committed to the Bishop of Lincoln (x) Richard Flemming, in whose Diocese the Parish of Lutterworth, of which Wickliff was Parson, and where he lay buried, was. The Bishop as zealous as the Council against what they call'd Heresie, as soon as he had receiv'd his Orders, sends his Officers, viz. his Arch-Deacon, Officials, Commillaries, and other Servants to Lutterworth to take up Wickliff's Bones, and remove them out of Christian Burial, who were so far from coming short of their Commission, that they exceeded; and having taken his Bones out of his Grave one and forty Years after his Burial, burnt them, and cast them into a Brooks adjoining, call'd Swift, which carrying them into the Sea was a Prefage of the spreading of his Doctrine into all Parts of the World.

Reg. 7. About the Beginning of September the Bishop of Winchester lately made Cardinal of St. Eusebius in France return'd into England, and in his Journey to London was met by the Mayor, Aldermen, and many of the chief Citizens of it on Horse-back, and by them honourably conducted unto his Palace in Southwark; but his Return with so great Dignity, and a Legantine Power, was not at all pleasing to the Duke of Glocester, who by this Time understood of how ill a Consequence his Promotions might prove to the Nation, being a Man of a very insolent and high Temper, and very rich, which would make him troublesome, and intolerable. And to prevent the ill Effects of them, as soon as he heard he was landed, he caused an Instrument to be published in the King's Name, declaring, That whereas the most Christian King Henry VI. and his Progenitors, Kings before him of this Realm of England, have been heretofore possessed time out of Mind with a special Privilege and Custom used and observ'd in this Realm from Time to Time, that no Legate from the Apostolick See shall enter this Land, or any of the King's Dominions without the Calling, Petition, Request, Invitation or Desire of the King; and forasmuch as Henry, Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal of St. Eusebius hath presum'd to enter as Legate from the Pope, being neither call'd nor desir'd by the King; therefore the King by his Procurator Richard Caudray doth protest by this Instrument, that it standeth not with the King's Mind or Intent by the Advice of his Council to admit, approve or ratifie the Coming of the said Legate in any wise in Derogation of the Rights and Customs of this Realm, or to allow and assent to any Exercise of his Legantine Power, or to any Acts attempted by him contrary to the said Laws. This Proclamation being only intended against his Power as Legate, the Bishop seem'd for the present to wave his Authority in that Kingdom, and kept on his way homeward without any Opposition farther from the Duke of Gloucester, who was willing to wink at any Submission thro' the fear of displeasing the Pope, who certainly would have thunder'd aloud if he had seen his Authority openly resisted, tho' in the Cardinal's Hands.

A. D. 1429. The French King having Fortune now on his side summon'd a Council of his great Lords to his Court to consult, how, and by what Methods they should pursue their Victories (for this Occasion was not to be slipped) and at last it was

resolv'd, that it would be most for his Advantage to recover such Places from the Hands of the English, as were situate upon the River Loire, and to that end it was thought fit, that a large Army should be rais'd, and marching to Orleans should from thence pursue the good Fortune which had first began there. John de Valois, Duke of Alençon, was made the King's Lieutenant in this Expedition, and had the Conduct of an Army of 14000 Men under the Command of the Duke De Vandosme, a Prince of the Blood, Joan the Virgin, Guy de Laval, Marshal Loeac his Brother, Chivagnes de Tour, and Vidame de Chartres. The first Thing that they attempted was the Siege of Mehun or Mean, which tho' a small Town, was an Annoyance to them in their March from Orleans; whereupon they besieg'd it, till they had taken the Bridge and Castle, by which means being freed from any Trouble from it: After they had put in a French Garrison, they march'd forward to Beaugences a more important Place, where they were met by Arthur of Brittain, Constable of France, accompany'd with the Lord D'Albret, Beaumenoir, Marshal of Brittain, and many others, who brought them a Reinforcement of 1200 Horse, and 1500 Foot, who joyning with them they most straitly besieg'd the Place. The Lord Talbot in the mean time was as busie for the Advantage of the English, as the French were for their own, and took Laval, a Town formerly in Possession of the English, but upon the good Success of the French at Orleans it had Revolted, and set up King Charles's Standard. Talbot's Courage would not endure their Inconstancy, and therefore falling upon it with Scaling-Ladders made his way directly into the Town and took it with a rich Spoil. The Castle still held out against him, and though it could not hope to stand out long, yet was Andrew Laval, Lord of Loeac sent to maintain it if possible, till they could gain an honourable Composition, which at length he obtain'd, viz. That all that were in the Castle, himself not excepted, should pay for the Ransom of their Lives 25000 Crowns, and he remain a Prisoner among the English, till it was either actually paid, or sufficient Security given for the Payment of it. The Lord Talbot immediately placed a strong Garrison in it to keep the Inhabitants in Subjection, and went forward to the Regent to Paris, but could make no stay there, because the News of the Siege of Beaugences being brought thither soon after his Arrival, the Regent dispatch'd him, and the Lord Scales with an Army of 4000 Men to the Relief of it. These Lords fear'd no Attempts, though never so Desperate or Hazardous; but coming to Beaugences, they found it so straitly Besieged, and the Army of the French so strong, that Prudence engag'd them not to hazard themselves and Men to no purpose, and so they retir'd towards Mehun, intending to force the Bridge and Castle there, and secure themselves in that Town. Beaugences by the Departure of the English seeing their Hopes of Succour gone yielded upon these Conditions, That the Garrison should march out with their Arms, Horses and Baggage (but the French Historians say, That they were to pay a Mark a Man for the last) and that the English Soulders should not bear Arms for Ten Days against the King of France. The French being thus Masters of the Town, and seeing their Army so much greater than the English, pursu'd them with all speed,

They endeavour'd to recover Janville, but were so closely follow'd by the French Horse, that they were oblig'd to make a stand at Patay in Beausse to guard themselves with Stakes against their Assaults, but before they could do it the whole Army came upon them, and they were forced to engage in fight, tho' very unequally against them, the French being at least four times their Number. Talbot seeing the Necessity of a Battel encourag'd his Men with all the Arguments he could to conquer or die bravely, and gave them Command to keep themselves close together, lest being surrounded by the Enemy, they should open a Gap to their own Ruin. The French assur'd of Victory fell on them very furiously, and the English as resolutely for Three Hours maintain'd their Ground against them, but at length their brave Captain Talbot having receiv'd a dangerous Wound upon his Back, and thereby being so disabled, that he could make no Resistance, fell into the Hands of his Enemies, and was made their Captive: This unfortunate Accident so disheartned the rest of the Army, that they betook themselves to Flight, but were so closely pursu'd, that they were almost all slain, the English Garrisons not daring to receive them, because they were mingled with so many of their Enemies, that they had been in Danger of falling into the Hands of the French to save them. The Lords Scales and Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampstone with some others of less Note were taken. Sir J. Falstoff tho' a Person of great Valour, yet seeing the inevitable Fate of this Battel, withdrew without giving or receiving a Blow (as judging it mere Rashness to fight at such a Disadvantage) but the Regent was so incens'd with him for it, that he took from him his George and Garter, which he had given him but the Year before for his former brave Actions; but thro' much Mediation of Friends, and his own alledging of some Excuses (which were at that Time judg'd reasonable) they were again restored to him, tho' much against the Lord Talbot's Will and Consent. This Victory caused great Triumph among the French, chiefly because they had gotten their bravest Captain and Commander, without whose Conduct they believ'd the English would not be able to do any thing of Consequence in France for the future; yea, and the English themselves despair'd of any of Fortune's Favours hereafter, since the Two great Pillars of their Cause were lost. And indeed they had no small reason for their Fears, because several of their Towns yielded themselves up to King Charles, viz. Gergeau, Baugence, Janville, Mean, and all Beausse, so that by a sudden turn of Fortune they lost in a few Days, what they had been getting many Months at a great Expence of Blood.

The English routed at Patay, and the Lord Talbot taken.

Orleans being thus deliver'd according to Joan's Promise and Prediction, she pressed for the Coronation of King Charles at Rheimes, which according to her Train of Prophecies was next to follow in order to the compleat routing the English out of France. Many of his Nobles, who were tender of his Safety, were extremely against it, alledging, 'That a Coronation is but a mere Ceremony, and did neither add to, nor take from a King's Title to his Crown. All the Use of it was only to make the King known to his People, which the War had so fully done, that none of his Natural Subjects were ignorant of his Person or Title. But if it were necessary in it self, yet the present Time, and the design'd Place were so inconsistent with the King's Safety, that it was in no wise to be attempted: For besides, that Rheimes was in the Possession of the English, there were so many English Garrisons on both sides the way thither, viz. on the one side Auxerre, Troyes and Chaalons, and on the other side Laon and Soissons, that it was almost impossible to get thither: So that at least the Ceremony ought to be forborn for a Time; and so much the rather, because the English had not yet thought it necessary to crown King Henry. These Reasons, tho' very rational and certain, yet satisfi'd not Joan, as being contrary to One of the Three Things which were pretended, that she had a Commission from God himself to execute, and therefore insist'd upon the Performance of it without delay, assuring them, That these imaginary Difficulties would vanish in the Attempt. King Charles having seen the Success of the Former, was easily sway'd to comply with the Latter; and therefore resolv'd to proceed to his Coronation at Rheimes. All his Nobles, tho' with unwilling Minds, attended him in his Voyage, except Arthur of Brittain the Constable, and Count Fedriac his Friend, whom Tremville was unwilling to be troubl'd with; but least thro' some Discontent they should disturb the Prosperity of their Affairs, he caus'd the King to send them, one with a sufficient Force to defend the Frontiers of Normandy, and the other to be his Lieutenant in Guienne, which Stations they accepted without any seeming Dislike, though not insensible of Tremville's Artifices. Things being thus settled, Charles took his Way with an Army of 12000 Men towards Rheimes, and with little or no Difficulty arriv'd there; for the English Garrisons fearing a Siege demand'd only time for Succour, which not coming they surrendred. Troyes indeed stood out Twelve Days, or as others say, but Two Days, the French partly making fierce Assaults, and the English under Sir Philip Hall thro' Famine making little or no Resistance. Chaalons and Rheimes were forced by the Inhabitants to surrender to King Charles, who thereupon made his solemn Entry into the City, and was crown'd there in the Presence of the Dukes of Lorrain and Barr, and all his Nobles. This successful Voyage rais'd Joan's Reputation very much; and tho' a Woman of no good Credit, yet confirm'd their Belief of her, as a Person sent by God for their Deliverance, which supported their Courage. And indeed the Ceremony, tho' of no Value in it self, yet produced such real Effects, as if it had been a material Circumstance by the Divine Decree in the Relief of France; for it was no sooner over, but the People who judge by Appearance only, flock'd to him to do him Homage, and many Cities, as if that Action had conferred a just Right upon him, which before he had not, own'd him for their lawful and only Sovereign. Laon sent Deputies to him to do him Homage, and Soissons, Chasteau-Thierre and Province yielded to him with many adjoining Towns.

The Duke of Bedford, a wise and experienced Governour was not an unconcerned Spectator of all these Actions, and with no small Grief of Heart revolv'd with himself the ill Success of his Party. Every Revolt was a Wound to him, but he knew not how toward off the Strokes of an inevitable Fate. Something he knew was to be done, but he was long in doubt what would be best. At last he resolv'd to try another Field-Battel, and stop the Current by force, and to that end leaving Paris with an Army of 10000 English, and some Norman Troops march'd into the Country of Brie, from whence he sent a Challenge in Writing to King Charles by an Herald to this Purpose, 'That whereas, he had contrary to the final Conclusion made between his noble Brother King Henry V. and his own Father King Charles VI. and the Kingdom of France, by the Allurement of a Devilish Witch, taken upon him contrary to all Laws and Right, the Name, Title and Dignity of King of France, and had by Murther, stealing, Craft, and other deceitful Means violently gotten, and wrongfully kept divers Cities and Towns belonging to the King of England his Nephew, pretending a rightful Claim to them, which he utterly deny'd, He was come down from Paris with his Army into the Country of Brie to prove by dint of Sword and stroke of Battel his Challenge, and Cause true, requiring him to appoint the Place of their Meeting, and he would not fail to come to decide this Controversie with him. The French King was now come from Rheims to Dampmartin, where the Herald found him, and deliver'd this Writing to him. Charles was not a little astonish'd at it, but putting on a brave Resolution, told him, That his Master should not need to come to him, nor invite him to a Battel, for he was determin'd with all speed to seek out his Master, and by Battel put an end to all Disputes between them. The Duke of Bedford hearing this kept on his March towards him, and at length (tho' the French King declin'd meeting as much as in Honour he dare) met his Army at a Town near Senlis, which notwithstanding it was much bigger than his own, he was resolv'd to fight almost at any Disadvantage, yet to secure his Rear from the French Horse, he encamp'd himself as strongly as he possibly could, and put his Archers in the Fore-front of the Battel. The French King also drew up his Army by the Advice of his Captains into very good Order, and faced the English two Days without any Action, except a few Skirmishes between Parties. On the third Day it was debated in the French Camp, whether they should assault the English or no, Joan was irresolv'd, and would by no means encourage them as at other Times, which made the greatest part of the Soldiers, who look'd upon her Determinations as Divine, against a Battel. The other Commanders thought it very irrational to hazard their former Victories by one Battel, which if unfortunate, might utterly ruin them, and 'twould be folly to tempt their kind Fortune by venturing needlessly. These Arguments so prevail'd with King Charles, that in the dead of the Night he broke up his Camp, and withdrew to Bray. The Duke of Bedford had much ado to keep his Army in the Morning from pursuing the French; but because he fear'd the Fidelity of the Citizens of Paris, he was afraid to give them Liberty to do it, and so he return'd thither again to wait another Opportunity.

Bishop of Winchester provides to go against the Hussites in Bohemia.

While these Things were transacting in France, Pope Martin V. who having excommunicated the Followers of Wickliff in Bohemia, commonly call'd Hussites, from their Chief Preacher John Hus, at the Council of Florence, sent his Bull into England to the Rich Cardinal Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, imploring him by the Wounds of Christ, his Zeal to the Church, and as he tender'd his own Salvation, to contribute his utmost Assistance to extirpate these Hereticks, which had so long withstood the Arms of the Emperour, and other Princes of Europe, and to encourage him to be industrious in the Undertaking he made him his Legate in the Army, which he should raise for that End, and gave him the Tenth Part of every Dignity, Benefice and Promotion in the Kingdom. The Cardinal's Ambition, or, if you will Zeal, made him very Active in his Work, and that he might proceed with the greater Success he propounded the Letters of the Pope to the Parliament, and obtain'd their Approbation, either out of the same Principle of Hatred to the Hereticks, or perhaps rather, because they would rid the Kingdom of this Turbulent Prelate, who was to be the Captain of the Army in so Religious a War. But whatever was the Reason, the Cardinal glad of this publick Ratification of his Commission proceeded with all Expedition to gather the Money of the Clergy, (who notwithstanding the Goodness of the Cause, were not a little discontented at it, having been much impoverish'd of late with Tenths and other Taxes for the Wars of France) and with it he rais'd an Army of above 4000 Men, whom having well furnish'd with all Things for the War, he about the Beginning of June intended to have transported into France, and so march'd into Bohemia; but when he had drawn them up to Dover for that end, Letters came with all speed from the Duke of Bedford to his Brother the Protector to send him over some Recruits forthwith, because the French King's Affairs were come to that Ripeness, that unless a speedy stop were put to his Victories (which he had not Men enough to do) he would soon become Master of all France. The Duke of Gloucester startled at this Message was very solicitous to answer his Brother's Desires, but not being able to do it so soon as was requir'd, and really necessary, he earnestly intreated the Cardinal to assist his Brother in France with his Army for the present, and so soon as he could provide other Supplies he should be dismissed to proceed on his Journey. The Cardinal very unwillingly harken'd to the Protector's Request, tho' next to a Command; but being no impolitick Person, and considering, that if the King's Affairs in France should miscarry thro' any neglect of his, it was not the Zeal he had for Religion, nor the Pope's Command could excuse him, either to his own Conscience, or to the King and Parliament for thus forsaking the Kingdom's Interests; whereupon he immediately transported his Forces into France, and joyn'd them with the Regent. With this Reinforcement the Regent march'd out again with a Resolution to fight his Enemy the French King, who (as he had receiv'd late Intelligence) was march'd into Champaigne and Beauvais, where having many Friends he hop'd to have had many of the Towns of those Countries yielded to him; but ere he could arrive there, the Regent, who pursu'd him with great speed, overtook him, and found him encamp'd upon Mount Piliol between Senlis and Champaigne, himself pitching between Senlis and Monmair at a convenient Distance from them. The French being thus in prospect of a daring Enemy, tho' much the greater Number, yet would not venture to assault the Camp of the English, and the Regent not thinking it safe upon better Thoughts to fight them at such Disadvantages, as the Place and their Numbers gave them, they waited several Days to come to a fair Battel, but at length being both tired with Expectation they retreated, the one to Cressie and the other to Paris, and so nothing was done, save that in some small Skirmishes the English and Normans had

The Bishop of Winchester having waited with some Impatience for a Battel in vain, and finding his Delay unnecessary, went forward with the Regent's Leave into Bohemia with his Army, but having had ill Fortune there against the Hereticks, he returned Home soon after with as little Honour as Gain, and the Pope being not well pleased with his ill Success or bad Management, recalled his Legantine-Power, and put Cardinal Julian into his Place, to the no small Vexation of the Cardinal, who, tho' unfortunate in his Achievements, yet expected a better Requital for his Zeal and Charge.

Reg. 8. King Henry's Coronation. King Henry being now entred upon the Ninth Year of his Age, and shewing a great Pregnancy of Wit and Parts, it was thought fit to admit him, as it were, into his Regal Dignity by a Coronation, which was accordingly performed upon St. Leonard's Day, Nov. 6: in St. Peter's Church at Westminster with great Solemnity, and a Joy suitable to the Occasion. Robert Fabian in his Chronicle, gives a very particular Account of the magnificent Feast made in Westminster-Hall, when it was ended, to which I refer the Curious. At this Coronation the King made 36 Knights of the Bath, and in the conclusion of it, Resolutions were taken by his Council, for his Coronation in France in the Spring, and in the mean Time all necessary Preparations were ordered for his Journey thither.

The French take several Places, and court Burgundy his Friendship. King Charles being freed from the Molestation of the English, kept on his March slowly in those Countries about Cressy, and was received into the Towns of Compeign, Senlis and Beauvais, by a Submissive Surrender to him, as their lawful Sovereign. The Castle of Aumerle stood out, but was surprized by the Lord Longueville, who slew all the English which he found in it. The French also took Castle-Galliard from the English, and found the Lord Barbason kept close Prisoner in a Dungeon in it, enclosed within a Grate of Iron like a little Chamber. He was thought to have been long dead, and there was found with a Joy as great almost, as if he had been raised from the Grave, by his Countrymen, who immediately broke open the Grates for his Deliverance: But he was made a faster Prisoner by his Oath to the Captain, one Kingstone, by which he engaged himself to be his true Prisoner, than all Iron-grates and Shackles could make him, inasmuch, that he would not come out of the Dungeon, until the French-Men had sent to the same Kingstone (who was departed out of the Castle upon the Covenants agreed on for the Surrender) and obtained from him a Discharge from his Oath. But all this Success was not enough to satisfy the French King, so long as the Friendship of the Duke of Burgundy with the English continued; for as he had found by Experience, that it was that, which had settled the English Power in France, so he did not doubt, but if he could break it, and bring over the Duke to his Natural Duty and Allegiance, it would be a Means to rout the English totally out of the Kingdom; and if he could not effect it, his Success hitherto would come to nothing. He resolved therefore to send Embassadors to that Duke, who excusing the Death of his Father, might represent to him, how misbecoming it was for a Prince of his Quality, and of the Blood-Royal, to joyn with the Enemies of the Regal Dignity and Kingdom, to which himself, or his Posterity might thro' a Failure of Succession in the nearer Branches, ascend; and offering him what Conditions he pleased, if he would submit to him. But Philip being a very politick Prince, and sensible that neither Party could well subsist without him, as he was courted by both, answered them only in general Terms, which gave them little Hopes, yet did not quite deprive them of them, and made some Demands of Things impossible to be granted, yet with such an Indifferency, as shewed he stood not so much upon his Will as his Advantage, which he sought from both Sides, and would accept the biggest of either; and so dismissed them to their Master. The Regent being certified of these Things by the Duke of Burgundy himself, who at the same time let him know, he resented his Denial that Orleans should be resigned to him, gave him many Thanks for his kind Notice, promising him, that his Fidelity for the Future should be more fully rewarded by him, because he had so firmly withstood the insinuating Proffers of his Natural Sovereign, and had not suffered any former Disobligations to draw him from his League with the English. However, he could not but observe, how fast the French King pushed forward the Ruin of the English, and with Policy seconded his Fortune, which put him upon the Use of such Means as might prevent, if possible, the worst, and if he could not keep all France, might at least secure Normandy, which was a Province that of Right belonged to the Crown of England, and lay the most convenient for it of all the rest; wherefore leaving the Bishop of Terrouen and Ely, Lewis of Luxembourg then Chancellor of France, for King Henry, with a competent Number of English-Men to defend and guard Paris, he went into Normandy, and being arrived at Roan, called a Parliament of the Three Estates of the Dutchy, and declared unto them, That tho' he was confident, that the Inconstancy of their Neighbours in Revolting to the French King, contrary to their Oaths and Allegiance due to King Henry, was detestable to them in it self, yet lest bad Example should infect them, he thought fit to let them know, how much it was their Interest, as well as their Duty to continue firm to the English: That as to the former, so long as a firm Friendship continued with England, their Freedom would be enlarged, and their Riches increased every Day; for as England would be always ready to receive their Wines and Linnens, so on the other hand it would be continually importing to them their Wool, Lead, and other staple Commodities; whereas on the contrary, if they revolted, they could hope for nothing but Slavery from the Arbitrary Power of Charles, the French King, and continual War from the English, who would very unwillingly lose the Dutchy, being the Inheritance of the English Crown, for tho' other Parts of France might of Right be thought to belong to King Charles, yet Normandy was undisputably his Nephew King Henry's, being descended to him in a direct Line from the first Duke of Normandy, Rollo the Hardy; wherefore since both Right and Interest concurred together to joyn their Loyalties to King Henry VI, he hoped that no Temptation would be able to allure them from their Faith and Allegiance so often sworn and promised to King Henry V. his Brother, in which so long as they persevered, they might be assured of Protection and Defence from the English against all their Opposers. The Normans being represented to him by his Friends, as very much inclined to their lawful Sovereign, if they could have a fair Opportunity to declare for him with Safety to themselves, King Charles thought the Regent's Absence much favoured that Purpose, and therefore soon after his Departure, leaving Senlis, he marched with his whole Army to St. Dennis, which being yielded without Resistance, he presented himself before the Walls of Paris, but not meeting with the Reception he expected, which was to be admitted into the City by his Friends without Delay, he ordered an Assault to be made, and did not doubt of a speedy Success, because Joan pretended a Revelation for the Taking of it. John, Duke of Alençon immediately began the Assault, and the chiefest Part of the Army, which were lodged at La Chapelle, levelled their Artillery against the Gate of St. Honorius, and took the Outworks of it. Joan also threw her self resolutely into the Ditch, contrary to the Advice of the Duke of Alençon, and all the Rest, and expected the Army should follow her to take Possession of the City, but the English Captains and Soldiers kept their Stations so firmly, and being assisted by the Parisians, defended the City so manfully, that they beat the French, and threw Joan, more forward than wise, into the Town-Ditch, full of the Filth and Excrements of the City, and had certainly taken her, had not a Servant of the Duke of Alençon, pulled her out. King Charles, seeing this unexpected Resistance, founded a Retreat, and so with some Loss, but more dishonour, left the City, not taking so much as his wounded Captains along with him, and marched by Touraine into Berry. The Duke of Bedford arrived at Paris soon after the French were gone, and understanding by his Soldiers, how faithfully and bravely the Parisians had behaved themselves in the Defence of the City, by which they had freed themselves from all Suspicion of Disloyalty, he gave them publick Thanks for their good Service, and promised them all the Felicity which might be expected from the Favour of a Prince, who loved nothing more than the Good of his Subjects, and would study to reward the well Deservings of a faithful People: Which grateful Return of their Services, the Parisians took so very kindly, that they declared a perpetual Friendship and Subjection to the King of England, making publick Acclamations in these Words. Friends to King Henry, Friends to the Parisians, Enemies to England, Enemies to Paris. But their after-Actions made the Sincerity of this Profession questionable.

A. D. 1430. The Regent recovers several Places taken by the French. Not long after the Regent was come to Paris, Philip, Duke of Burgundy, with a great Number of armed Men arrived; and the Regent, who was under some Disturbance of Mind for the late Losses of the English, entred into a long and grave Consultation with him, how to proceed most effectually to recover them; and it was at length agreed between them, that the Duke of Burgundy with his Men should remain in Paris for the Defence of it, while the Duke of Bedford and his Army should recover St. Dennis, and the adjacent Places which had lately revolted to the French. The Duke of Bedford therefore without Delay marched from Paris on this Expedition, and having regained St. Dennis, and the other adjoining Fortresses, with as little Labour as they were lost, he returned again to Paris, and sent out several Parts of his Army to recover other Places which he feared would prove more obstinate, viz. The Bastard of Clarence to besiege the Castle of Torci, a very strong Fortification, as well for its Site, as for the Artificial Strength of it; but by the Valour of the English, it was taken after Six Months Siege. The Earl of Suffolk to take the Town of Ammarle, which had resigned to King Charles a little before; Monsieur de Romburris was made Governour, who so resolutely held it out, that the Earl of Suffolk made Twenty-five Assaults upon it, before it would yield, and then at last surrendered, not for want of Will, but Strength to oppose, all their Men being lost. The Earl of Suffolk, who took it without Conditions, hanged 30 of the Chiefest of the Inhabitants upon the Walls of the City, for their Perjury and Treachery to King Henry; fined the Rest of them, and sent Monsieur de Romburris a Prisoner into England, who did not recover his Liberty till Six Years after, and then by Exchange. Sir Thomas Kiriell also about the same Time, issuing out of Gournay in Normandy with 400 Men, ravaged and wasted the Country as far as the very Suburbs of Clermont, which the Earl of that Country seeing with Sorrow, drew out the Garrisons of that Town, and the neighbouring Places to chastise his Boldness, and repress his Insolency. The English retreated into an advantageous Ground near Beauvais, where the French Horse could prove of no Use to them, and there pitching, resolved to give them Battel. The French-Men being egg'd on with the seeming Flight of the English, and their smaller Numbers were eager to engage them, and because their Horses could do them little or no Service, the Earl commanded them to dismount, and engage them on Foot. Upon this a very fierce Skirmish followed, and the Advantage was a long while dubious on which Side it would fall, but at length, by the Valour and Force of the English Archers, the French were forced to give Ground, and in the End fly, having lost 300 of their Company. The Pursuit was close, so that the French could not recover their Horses again, but they falling into the Hands of the English, were made use of to overtake them, and so 200 of them were taken Prisoners, the Earl of Clermont himself, being saved only by the Swiftnefs of his Horse. The French in the mean while were not un-

On S. George's Eve, April 23, he came to Dover; the next Day being Sunday, he landed at Calis, and after a (y) short Stay, marched slowly to Roan, where he passed all the Summer.

Duke of Burgundy's Marriage. While King Henry remained at Roan, the Marriage of Philip, Duke of Burgundy with Isabel, Daughter of John, King of Castile, and Philippa, Daughter of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster (in Honour of which Marriage, the King (z) instituted the Order of the Knights of the Golden Fleece) was solemniz'd. And soon after, that the English might try their Fortune under his auspicious Presence, as well as signalize their Courage and Conduct to him, they undertook several advantageous, but hazardous Enterprizes. One Captain Franquet, or as the French History, Franchetto d'Arras, made an Assault upon the Town of Laignie, wherein Joan, and divers other good Captains were, who seeing Franquet's Men, but few, summoned the Garrisons adjoyning together, and fell furiously upon them, resolving to beat them down at the very first Onset with their Multitude. Franquet was a Man of exceeding Courage, and his Company, tho' but 300, were resolved never to desert him in the greatest Dangers, whereupon a long Conflict happened between them, and the English repulsed the French with great Loss in the Two or Three first Onsets; but at last they were overpowered with Multitudes, and forced to give ground, but being unwilling to suffer the Shame of a Flight, they chose to die by the Sword, and so were almost all slain. Franquet himself was taken, and presented to Joan, as to a Commander in Chief in the Town; he was required to humble himself to her on the Knee, which because he refused to do, she fell into a great Fury, and contrary to the Law of Arms and Reason, commanded his Head to be cut off, and all the English that were taken Prisoners with him to be slain. While this Enterprize was unsuccessfully carried on, a greater was begun, which was the Siege of Compeigne. This was a great Town, and well mann'd, victualled and fortified, and therefore the Regent sent his best Captains, the Duke of Burgundy, Earls of Suffolk and Arundel, and Lord John of Luxemburgh, to besiege it with a Body of many Thousand Men. In their Way thither, they took Soissons, which the French Historians say, was betrayed to them by a Captain of Picardy, who had the Command of it, and so having cleared their Way, sat down before the Town. There was very little Hopes of gaining it by Force, and therefore these wise Captains raised Batteries, made Trenches, and built Forts round it, partly for their own Safety, and partly to necessitate the

A. D. 1430. Reg. 8. Besieged, hoping by length of Time, and inward Streights, to force them to surrender. William de Havie was Governour of the Town, a very valiant and prudent Man, who by Sallies and Skirmishes kept the Besiegers almost in continual Exercise, especially after Joan, with a Reinforcement of 500 Men came into the Town from Laignie. On the Night of the Ascension of our Lord, the Besieged having Intelligence, that the Lord Bardo de Noielles, who kept one of the Castles against them, was sent out by the Duke of Burgundy to Marigny upon some special Service, Poitou de Saintrailles, and Joan the Virgin, with a Party of Six Hundred Men, made a vigorous Sally out of the Town by the Bridge toward Montdidier, intending to master it, but being perceived as they were in the Action by the Lord John de Luxemburgh, he came upon them with a strong Force of English and Burgundians, as they were cutting down Tents, overthrowing Pavillions, and killing Men in their Beds, and beat them back again into the Town. In the Retreat, Joan to save her Men, kept the Enemy in continual Skirmishes, being her self one of the last that entered (a), but the Bars thro' which they got into the Town, being kept very streight, lest the Enemy should enter with the Besieged; Joan was left at last with a few, or as some relate, shut out on Purpose by the Malice of the Governour, who envied her the Glory of Defending the Town, and so fell into the Hands of the Lord John of Luxemburgh, who sold her to the English for (b) Four Thousand Crowns in present Money, and an Hundred and Fifty Crowns annual Rent, who sent her a Prisoner to Roan. After this Success the Siege of the Town still continued, and the Duke of Bedford, that he might hasten the speedy Taking of it, sent a Recruit of a Thousand Archers, under the Command of the Earl of Huntington, and Sir John Robfert, Two Gentlemen as expert in all warlike Affairs, as valiant in all bold Attempts. These Men were so active in carrying on the Siege, that the could be no doubt of gaining the Town in a short Time, had not the Death of Philip, Duke of Brabant happened in the very Interval, by which the Duke of Burgundy, who was next Heir to his Dutchy, was obliged to leave the Siege, that he might go and take Possession of it, before any Competition were started. The Lord John, of Luxemburgh, was by the Duke constituted General of the Siege, a Person of small Valour, and as little Conduct, who being discouraged at some brisk Sallies of the Garrison, and the Loss of some of his Men, entertain'd Thoughts of raising the Siege, and propounded it to the English Captains; but they would by no means consent to it, telling him, that the Town being so closely begirt outwardly, that no Relief could get in, and so afflicted within with Pestilence and Famine, could not hold out many Days longer, or if it did, yet it would be a mighty Disgrace to them, to leave the Place after so long a Siege. But no Reasons would prevail with him, he would hearken to no Intreaties, he would be gone, and accordingly

Enough for the Head of a Witch, or what is more probable a Whore; as she confess her self when she was condemn'd to be burnt, pretending she was with Child to save her Life, but that was a Trick, and did not do her Business.

Joan examined before the Bishop of Beauvais.

Soon after the Siege of Compeigne was raised, the Regent being now a little at Leisure caused Joan the Virgin to be examin'd and try'd before Peter Cauchon, Bishop of Beauvais, in whose Diocese she was taken, being requested thereto by the University of Paris, who put up a Petition to King Henry, that she might be deliver'd up to the Ecclesiastical Courts, because she had been a Cause of much Scandal among the People, to the Prejudice of Religion and the Catholick Faith. She was accused upon Seventy Eight Articles, the chief of which were these, viz. That tho' she was indeed found a Virgin, yet she had shamefully rejected her own Sex, imitating a Man both in her Actions and Apparel; That she had like a faithless Wretch been a damnable Instrument of Slaughter and Blood-shed, partly committed by her, and partly carry'd on by her Directions; That she had greatly seduced the People, by pretending, that she was sent from God, and vending many false Revelations in his Name; That she was a Sorceress and a Witch, foretelling Things to come by her Diabolical Arts and Skill; That she had dissuaded Charles the French King from Peace with England, and so had been the Cause of the Wars for several Years; That she had boasted, that she knew Things to come, and particularly had published the certain downfall of the English Power in France; That she had asserted, that the Saints conversed with her, and had been seen with her by the King of France himself, Duke of Bourbon, and two or three other Lords; That she had so seduced the People, as that many abused by her Hypocrisie and fained Devotion worshipped her as a Saint. To these Articles of Accusation she made her Answer, sometimes very gravely and soberly, and sometimes foolishly. Her chief Advocate, one Giles, a grave and prudent Man said. That though in Visions and Revelations she had shewed herself too Superstitious, and in the Levity of her Answers had discovered the Weakness of her Sex, yet he could not think that the Siege of Orleans was raised, or King Charles brought to his Crown by any means of the Devil. But neither this Man's Opinion, nor her own Defence was sufficient to clear her from the greatest part of the Charge, which when she saw was likely to fall heavy upon her, she with much seeming Sorrow confessed her Wickedness, and begg'd Mercy, which the Judge willing to grant, mollified the Sentence, and only inflicted this Punishment on her for the present, viz. That from thenceforth she should cast off her unnatural wearing of Men's Garments, and other Habiliments, and keep herself to such a Garb as is suitable and proper to her Sex; That she should abjure her pernicious Practice of Sorcery and Witchcraft, and all the other Evils, which she had committed contrary to the true Religion; That she should be kept in perpetual Imprisonment, being fed with Bread and Water, that she might with a strict Penance bewail her former Misdeeds. This Sentence being much milder than what she had reason to fear from an Enemy, to whom she had done so much Mischief she gladly submitted to it, and took a solemn Oath punctually to perform it. But the Devil had too great a Power upon her, to be so easily vanquish'd: What she had promised was only for fear of Suffering, not thro' Conscience of her Wickedness; and therefore as soon as her Fear was remov'd, she fell again to her Old Tricks of pretending Revelations, and foretelling future Events, by the familiar Converse she had with Evil Spirits, which she call'd by the Names of our Lady St. Katherine and St. Ann, who (as she said) brought her them from God. These Things being heard of by the Regent, he caused her again to be brought to the Bishop and tried as a Person relapsed into the former Wickedness; of which being found guilty she was resign'd to the Secular Power, and condemn'd to be burnt as a Witch. This unavoidable Sentence of Death fully discover'd the Falseness of her Pretensions to any Divine Inspiration: For whereas such Persons have joyfully suffer'd Death rather than save themselves by the least Sin, she did not stick to bely her self, by affirming, that she was with Child, and consequently, (not being married) to be guilty of Whoredom, that she might put off the Execution of so severe a Sentence. The Regent, tho' he look'd upon it as a false Pretence, which might have been easily remov'd by the common Methods, yet chose rather to respite her Punishment for Nine Months, that this Lye being discover'd, he might convince the World, that she was actuated by a lying Spirit all along; for so indeed it happen'd, that she was not with Child: Whereupon at Eight Days end, her Sentence of Condemnation being again pronounced upon her, she was in the Old Market-Place of Roan burnt to Ashes, which being cast up into the Air were dispersed by the Wind. Valeran Veran, a French Poet relates two Miracles in her Death, which as he imagines clear'd her Innocency, viz. That her Heart remained unburnt in the Flames, and that a White Dove came out of her Ashes and flew up towards Heaven; but as they are not related by any Historian of Credit, either French or English, so they seem a mere Poetical Fiction invented long after to justify the Pope's Absolution of her from the Sentence of Condemnation the English had laid on her, which K. Charles obtain'd of Pope Calixtus Twenty Six Years after her Death, when the English were quite expell'd France, because though her Actions were too Scandalous to bear a Canonization, yet he thought it not fit to let her lie under so ignominious a Brand, who must not be deny'd the just Praise, That she was a brave and valiant Amazon, the Restorer of the French Monarchy, who if she did not drive out the English, as she vaunted her self, yet certainly was the chief Cause that the English lost France.

About November King Henry went from Roan to Paris in order to his Coronation there, for which great Preparations had been making great part of the Summer. Many Princes and Lords, as well French as English accompany'd him, of which the Chief were the Cardinals of Winchester and York (e) the Dukes of Bedford, York and Norfolk, and of the French, the Dukes of Burgundy, and Lewis de Luxemburgh, Cardinal and Chancellor of the Kingdom, the Bishops of Beau-

He was crown'd in the Church of Nostre Dame on the 7th or 17th Day of December by the Cardinal of Winchester, which much disgusted the Bishop of Paris, who thought that honourable Office belong'd to him, as Bishop of that Diocese. The King return'd to his Palace with the Crown on his Head, and Scepter in his Hand, another Crown and Scepter being born before him to signify his Kingdom of England, and was there receiv'd with sumptuous Feasting. He stay'd no longer, than till the whole Solemnity was over, and the Noblemen of France and Normandy had paid their Homage, and then return'd to Roan, where he kept his Christmas, and a little after by the Advice of his Council went to Calis from whence after a short stay he took Ship for England and landed at Dover, February 11. In his Journey to London he was met by the Gentry and Commons of Kent on Barham-Down, which lies between Dover and Canterbury, who congratulated his happy Arrival, and conducted him thro' their County to Black-Heath, where he was met by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London, who attended him thro' the City, which was adorn'd with many rich Pageants and Shews to give him an hearty Welcome to his Palace at Westminster.*

Divers Skirmishes between the French and English. While these Things were transacting at Paris, divers Things of Moment were perform'd by the English Soldiers in several Places of France. In Normandy Sir Francis Surianes, call'd the Argonnois, a Captain of the English Side surpriz'd Montargis by corrupting a Woman that belonged to Monsieur De Villiers the Governour of the Town, to whom he gave 2000 Crowns to resign it to him, which she accordingly did, and so he became Master of that Place by Policy, which he could not get by Force. The French troubl'd at the Loss sent an Army under the Command of the Messieurs de Graville, and De Vitry to regain it, who took the Town, but not being able to obtain the Castle by a long Siege of six Weeks, they were forced to forsake the Town, and leave it to the English, who reformed it, and held it, till with it they were constrain'd to relinquish all thereabouts. About the same time the Earl of Arundel having received certain Intelligence that the Lord Boufay, Admiral of France was come to Beauvois with a Design to invade the Coasts of Normandy, gather'd a Body of 2300 Men, and laid an Ambush near the Town, into which that he might train the French, he sent a choice Troop of his Horsemen to brave them even at their Palisadoes. The French not suspecting the Snare laid for them, sally'd out, and set upon the English with great Fierceness and Violence, but they retir'd and fled, as if they had been afraid and beaten, till they had brought them into the Ambush, which encompassed them so close on every side, that they were almost all slain except some that fled back into the Town, and some few that were taken Prisoners, of whom the Valiant Captain Ponton de Santrail, Monsieur St. Raigle, and some others were the chiefest. The Lord Talbot who was taken at the Battel of Patay was exchange'd for the former of these, or as others say, for the latter. Before the Town of Gournay also Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick met a Party of French, and after a sharp Skirmish vanquish'd them, and having slain many of them took Forty Horse-men Prisoners, all of them Persons of Name and Worth. About the same time there having happen'd a Quarrel between Renatus of Anjou, Duke of Barr, Count de Province, and by his Pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples, call'd King of Sicily, and his Kinsman Anthony, Count Vaudemont, who being Brother to Charles, Duke of Lorrain claim'd the Dukedom of Anjou for his own by Succession. It caus'd a War between them, and to strengthen themselves one against the other Renatus engag'd the French, and Anthony the English to their Assistance. Renatus was the more powerful of himself, and before Anthony could get sufficient Forces to encounter him in open Field, besieg'd Vaudemont; which Anthony being chiefly oblig'd to secure, left his Men to defend for the present with the Help of the Citizens, and fled to the English at Paris to beg their speedy Assistance to raise the Siege. The Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy readily granted his Petition, and sent with him 600 Archers under the Command of Sir John Falstaff, and 1500 others under Sir Anthony Toulougon, the Duke of Burgundy's Marshal. Renatus hearing of this Design, and that Count Anthony was coming towards him to raise the Siege, he like a valiant Captain leaving a part of his Army to carry it on, went to meet them, and encountred them at Valleamont not far from Nanci. The Battel was fierce and long, but at length the English Archers so gauled the French Horse, that they were forced to give Ground, and at length fled. In the pursuit there were 3000 slain, and 200 taken Prisoners, among whom were Duke Renatus himself, the Bishop of Metz, the Lord of Roquedemaque, Vicount Darcy, and Sir Everard de Salsenburg, who were imprison'd at Bracones upon Salin. This Defeat of Duke Renatus's Men struck such a Terror into the rest of his Army which carry'd on the Siege before the Town, that they immediately rais'd it, left all they had and fled away, but the Besieged pursuing them, took many of them, slew many, and took others Prisoners. The whole Camp then became their Prey, which they ranack'd; and being loaden with the Riches and Spoils of it, return'd into their City. Thus the English attended by a good Fortune, not only were Victorious themselves, but made their Allies Successful.

Yet their good Fortune was not without some Mixture of Ill thro' their own Carelessness and Security; for the Lord Willoughby and Sir Matthew Gough besieging St. Severine a strong Castle in Anjou in the Absence of the Lord Ambrose de Lore, who was the Governour of it, this Lord fearing the Skill and Courage of his Deputy made all the haste he could to the Relief of it, and King Charles sent along with him certain Noblemen with a considerable Body of Men to raise the Siege, who not following him with the Speed desired, the Lord de Lore tarry'd for them at Beaumont. The English about the Town having Intelligence of the Intentions and Motions of the French, Sir Matthew Gough was sent with part of the Army to surprize De Lore and his Forces before the rest came up to them, while the Lord Willoughby maintain'd the Siege with the other part of the Army. Gough march'd with Expedition, and in the Night entred

The French thro' the Confusion they were in, made small Resistance, but despairing of Safety, fled towards the Noblemen, who were hastning up with another Body of Men to De Lore. The English in the mean Time plundered the Camp, and having taken some Prisoners, among which was De Lore himself, were returning to the Town, but slowly, being loaded with Prey and Prisoners. The French, who were coming, hearing of the Defeat of their Fellows, halted up to their Relief, and tho' too late to preserve them, yet they resolutely pursued the English, and set upon them with great Fury, who being in Disorder, and cumbered with their Baggage, were unable to resist, and so fled to the Town, leaving their Captain, Sir Matthew Gough, and divers others in the Hands of the French, with all their Spoil that they had taken a little before, yet could not they recover De Lore again, but he still remained in the Hands of the English. The Lord Willoughby, who lay still before the Town, was much troubled at this Misfortune, and having lost much of his Strength, thought it not safe to continue the Siege, and so he departed unwillingly from it, and in his Retreat was pursued so close by the Belieged, that he lost many Men in his Rear.

The Pope endeavours to make a Peace between the French and English.

Charles taken.

The Wars in France between the English and French thus holding on with almost equal Success, and with small hopes of a Conclusion, it much grieved the Pope, who was then Eugenius IV, to see and consider of the great Effusion of Christian Blood made thereby, and therefore that he might put an End to so great Cruelties, and establish a Peace, he sent his Legate, Nicholas, the Cardinal of St. Crucis, or the Holy-Cross, into France to make a Peace between them, but to little or no effect; for tho' the Cardinal was very earnest and industrious to compose all Differences between the Two Parties, yet he found them so obstinate in their Enmity one to another, that he could obtain no more of them by all his earnest and long Importunities, than a Truce for Six Years, which being very unwillingly granted, lasted scarce so many Months, and so was never ratified; for the Bastard of Orleans, lately made Earl of Dunois, having an Army of 3000 Men about him, surprised and took Chartres, a considerable Garrison belonging to the English, after this manner. A Servant of one of King Charles's Financiers had several Relations and Friends among the Inhabitants of Chartres, and among the Rest, a Brother, who having obtained Liberty by his Means to buy Provisions out of the Town, and sell them to the Garrison within, had a free Passage thro' the Gates with his Cart to carry it in, and because he often gave the Keepers of the Gates some of his Provisions gratis, could easily gain Admission at any Season. This Servant being instigated by the Bastard of Orleans, to tempt his Brother by large Rewards to betray the Town to the French, by many Requests and Promises prevailed with him, that upon Pretence of carrying a Load of Fish into the Town fresh and fair, he might be admitted thro' the Gate at Midnight, and it was contrived, that with him an Hundred Men, whom he had laid ready in a Cellar, which he had hired near the Gate for a Warehouse, should rush in, and having killed the Watch, let in the Rest of the French Detachment which lay in Ambush, and at a Sign given, were ready to fall in with them. This was all successfully carried on, and the English Garrison, which was no more than an Hundred and Twenty Men, because they trusted to the Fidelity of the Inhabitants, seeing the Enemy in the City escaped out of the Gate that opens towards Eureux, and so saved themselves. The Inhabitants, who having always sided with the Duke of Burgundy, knew that they could expect no Mercy from the French, stood to their Defence, but being too weak, especially in that Disorder, to encounter so great a Force, were most of them slain, and among them the Bishop, who with Eighty more, was killed upon the Stairs of his Cathedral Church. After this the whole City was treated as conquered, the Clergy, and chief Magistrates that survived, were made Prisoners of War, never to be released, but for large Ransoms; their Goods were plundered and carried away, their Women were ravished, and all Persons put to Death, who had acted as Magistrates, or Officers under the English. This Breach of the Truce so lately made much offended the English, and so much the more, because the Bastard of Orleans defended it, as lawful by the Law of Arms to steal or buy a Town without Invasion. And so the War was again renewed with fresh Hostilities on both Sides. The French having been so successful in taking the Town of Chartres by Treachery, made a like Attempt upon the Castle of Roan, by corrupting the Captain of it, one Peter Andebee with Promises of giving him the whole Revenue of the Castle; which, tho' Andebee did as much as in him lay to perform, yet partly thro' the Cowardize and Backwardness of the French, and partly thro' the Courage of the English, who made a brave Defence, tho' surprized, by reason of the Earl of Arundel's Presence, they missed of their Design, most of the French being either slain in the Attempt, or taken Prisoners. This ill Success quelled the French a little, and the Truce took effect a while.

In England there was great Rejoycing for the late Coronation of their King, yet, as if the poor Followers of Wickliffe were to be their Peace-Offering, the Bishops prosecuted them with the greatest Severity. Richard Hoveden, a Woolwinder, and Citizen of London, was burnt for Heresie on Tower-Hill, and Thomas Bagley, Priest, Vicar of Monenden, or Munden, not far from Maldon in Essex, suffered the like Punishment in Smithfield for the same Crime. In the Diocess of Norwich, Nicholas Canon of Eye, and several others were forced to abjure their Opinions, and undergo Penance, and so in other Places of the Kingdom. These Cruelties much incensed the Commons against the Clergy, who were always the most zealous and forward in such Prosecutions, and begat a Rebellion; for William Mandevile, Bailiff of Abington in Oxfordshire, a Man who favoured the Opinions of Wickliffe, and much disliked the Cruelty of the Clergy to them, having a great Interest in the Commons, stirred them up to Revenge against them, and getting a Multitude of People about him, took upon himself to be their Captain, under the Name of Jack Sharp of Wigmoreland, in Wales, giving out, That he would make the Heads of Priests as cheap as Sheep's Heads, which were then Three, or as others say, Ten a Penny. Some Historians make his Designs to be levelling, and affirm, That he held, that Priests ought not to have any worldly Possessions, and that Christians,

These Opinions were at that Time thought to be dispersed abroad by their Enemies, to make them more odious to the People, and 'tis not at all probable, that he should attempt such an impossible Thing, as to take away all Title of Possessions. His Hatred was to the Clergy, and 'tis like, that as he would have destroyed many of that Order, if his Design had been successful, so he would have made such as survived poor enough: But his seditious Attempt was no sooner known, than it was suppressed; for the Duke of Gloucester, a watchful and good Governour, having Notice of this Insurrection, immediately sent down a sufficient Force to disperse the Rebels, which was soon effected, several of them were taken Prisoners, and among them the Captain himself, who being punished with Quartering, the Rest upon their Submission, were pardoned and dismissed.

Parl. V. its Acts and Taxes.

About the Time of this Rebellion, the (e) Cardinal of Winchester, a warlike and politick Prelate, who had staid behind in France to assist the Regent, in managing Civil Affairs, there came over into England for some fresh Recruits, both of Men, and Money to carry on the War, which by the late Breach of Truce was likely to be renewed. The Duke of Gloucester, being sensible of the Necessity of a present Supply, immediately called a Parliament, which ordered, That in the first Place a sufficient Number of Men and Money should be raised, and transported with all convenient Speed into France, and after spent some Time upon other Affairs of State. The Principal Matters Enacted were,

1. That whereas under the Colour of Outlawryes, sued out against certain Persons, Occasion was taken to molest others of the same Name, and to seize their Goods and Chattels, especially when they were dead, because there was no Remedy at Common-Law for Executors to recover such Seizures, wherefore it was enacted by this Parliament, in Favour of Executors, that in Defence of the Testator's Goods, a Writ called Idemitate Nominis, should be granted to them, and should be as maintainable by them, as by any other Person living.

2. That whereas the Welsh-Men assembled in great Numbers, armed, and did in a riotous and rebellious Manner, intercept, and stop, the Boats, Trowes, Floats, called Drags, carrying Wares and Merchandizes to Bristol, Gloucester, Worcester, and other Places, upon the River Severn, and broke the said Vessels, to the end, that the Traders might have their Boats and Vessels of them only; therefore it was enacted, that all the King's Liege People should have free Passage upon the said River, to carry their Goods and Chattels as they please, without any Molestation from the Welsh, and if for the future they any Ways molested them in their Traffick, the Party or Parties aggrieved should have their Action according to the Course of the Common-Law. But that which made the greatest Noise in this Parliament, was a Case of Bastardy, alledged against Eleanor, the Wife of James, Lord Audley, who claimed the Inheritance of Edmund, Earl of Kent, as being his Eldest Daughter, and a Legitimate Issue, or Mulier, by Constance his Wife; for which she had gotten a Certificate from the Ordinary. Against this Claim, the other Daughters of the said Edmund, Earl of Kent, put in their Petition to the Parliament, alledging, that the said Eleanor was a Bastard, that her Mother Constance, the late Wife of Thomas, Lord Despen- cer, was never married to the said Earl, and that the Certificate brought from the Ordinary was obtained by Fraud. This produced an Act of Parliament, and by which it was ordained, 3. That in all Pleas, wherein Bastardy is alledged against any Person, Party to the said Plea, the Judge, or Judges of, or in the Courts where the said Plea is depending, shall certify it to the Chancellor of England, for the Time being, to the intent, that Proclamation be made in the said Chancery, by Three Months, once in every Month, that all Persons that have any Thing to object against the said Mulier, or Person pretending himself a Legitimate-Issue, may put in their Allegations and Objections before any Certificate be given by the Bishop.

In this Parliament also a Peace was concluded with James, King of Scots, who sent his Ambassador to the Duke of Gloucester to desire it. The Duke not willing to determine so important a Matter without the Consent of the Nation, referr'd it to the Three Estates, who after some Debates, settled a Peace with them, and then the Parliament rose.

The Bishop of Winchester, who had all the Session been very active to raise both the Men and Money appointed by the Parliament for the Service of France, was ready to pass thither about the same Time, and accordingly departed. The Duke of Bedford, having accompanied the King to Calis, remained still in Picardy, ready to receive the Cardinal; in the mean Time he having Information of a Mutiny among the Soldiers at Calis, partly because the Staple of Wool was removed from thence, and partly because in the Time of Truce they had been restrained from pillaging and ravaging the Neighbouring Countries, whereby their Prey grew too narrow to uphold their Extravagant Expences. The Regent knowing the dangerous Effects of such Discontents among the Soldiers, hastned thither, and having diligently examined the Matter, put Four or Five of the chief Mutineers to Death, and cashiered an Hundred and Ten more, banishing them from the Town and Marches of it, and so settled the Garrison in Peace.

While the Duke of Bedford was in these Parts, his Dutcheß, the Lady Anne, Sister to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, departed this Life at Paris. She had in her Life-time been the Cement of that firm Friendship and Love, which had so long continued between her Husband and Brother, by which the English Interests in France had been chiefly maintained and upheld, and by her Death it was much abated, and in a short Time was utterly dissolved by a second Marriage, which this wise Duke not very prudently made, with Jaquet, the Daughter of Peter de Luxemburg, Earl of St. Poll and Niece, to Lewis de Luxemburg, Bishop of Turain and Ely, and Chancellor of France, for King Henry, by whose Perswasion this Match was effected. Philip, Duke of Burgundy had never embraced any Friendship with this Family, and had he been consulted about the Marriage, would certainly have been against it, as being not only inferior to the Duke of Bedford's Greatness, but his own; besides, he was not at all acquainted with it, contrary to the usual Custom among Princes, especially of so great Intimacy, which he interpreted as a Contempt cast upon him, and

(e) This Rebellion, the Calling of the Parliament, and the Cardinal's Return to France, happen'd all before the young King's Return to England.

A. D. 1432. grew every Day more and more cold towards him, till upon other little Occasions of Disgust offer'd, they became open and professed Enemies, which was a chief Cause of losing France. But however this was not discern'd till some time after, and the Duke of Bedford very well pleased with his New Spouse passed into England, and tarry'd there among his Friends, from whom he receiv'd many Congratulations of Happiness, and other Expressions of Love and Kindness, till the latter end of Aug. 1433. when he return'd again to his Charge in France.

The Dauphin's Soldiers break the Truce.

While the Duke of Bedford was Absent and in England, the Dauphin's Soldiers, who by reason of the Truce were almost starv'd, having no Wags, and not being allow'd to live upon the Spoil of others, as they had done in the Time of the War, began again to plunder and rob both the English and Burgundians as they pleased, and taking many Prisoners would not release them but upon great Ransoms. These open Breaches of the Peace being observ'd by the Duke of Bedford at his Arrival so awaken'd his Thoughts, and stirr'd up his Vigilancy, that he prepared an Army to repress the Insolencies of the French, or to renew the War, as occasion should offer; for it seem'd to him unreasonable, that the French should under the shew of a Truce do King Henry's Subjects as much Mischief as they pleased, and make the War cease in the French Dominions only. The News of the Duke of Bedford's Preparations, tho' really no more than what was necessary, was receiv'd by the French as a Prefage of the Continuance of the War; and therefore having gotten a Pretence for their desir'd Arms, they invade the English Territories immediately, before the Duke of Bedford could get an Army together, and by a sudden Surprise took St. Valery, a Town in the Confines of Normandy, lying upon the Mouth of the River Some, and another Party of French under the Command of Sir Ambrose de Lore wasted and destroy'd all the Country about Caen. The Invitation to this Attempt was the great Fair, which was kept on St. Michael's Day in the Fields adjoining to the Town, about St. Steven's Church, which if they could seize upon without any Impediment from the Garrison, would be a great Booty for them. De Lore therefore thus contriv'd the Business. He himself with 100 Cross-bow-men, and 50 Horse went between the Fair and the Town to beat back the Garrison if they should fall out upon them, sending a Party of 500 Men to seize the Booty in the Fair in the mean Time. The Garrison of Caen had not the least Suspicion of this Attempt, and so came not forth to hinder them; whereupon the Merchants and Traders of the Fair became a Prey to the French, who took them all Captives with their Goods, and passed over the River Orne with them, where their Captain made a Scrutiny of the Prisoners, retaining such only in their Hands as could pay a Ransom, which were about 800, and suffer'd the Rest to depart Home, being in Number about 2000. These Hostilities of the French roused the English, who that they might draw them from their ravaging at a Distance, resolv'd to besiege the Town of Laignie upon the River Marne, which being a Place of Importance to the French, and a great Annoyance to the English in hindring their Commerce to Paris, would engage the French wholly upon its Defence, and accordingly sent the Earl of Arundell, the Earl of Warwick's Son, and the Lord Lisle Adam with 1200 Men, and all suitable Arms and Ammunition to besiege it. Laignie was well stored and fortified with Men and Victuals, having 800 Men of Arms, besides other Soldiers and Townsmen in it; so that they were of equal, if not greater Strength than the Besiegers. This did not at all discourage the English, but counting it a greater Honour to conquer those that were superior in Strength, they made many fierce Assaults, and by their Cannon-shot broke down one Arch of the great Bridge laid over the Marne, and burnt the Ravelin; but Winter coming on, and the Besieged making a Vigorous Opposition, they broke up the Siege for the present, and left the Town.

The Duke of Bedford disappointed of his Design in besieging Laignie resolv'd in the Spring to attack it more vigorously in Person; and having gather'd an Army of choice Men for Courage put it under the Command of such Captains as he counted most Valiant and Experienced, viz. Robert, Lord Willoughby, Sir Andrew Ogard his Chamberlain, Sir John Salvin, Bailiff of Roan, Sir John Montgomery, Bailiff of Caux, Sir Ralph Nevill, Sir Ralph Standish, and many others, by whose Conduct he did not doubt of Success. The French were much terrified at the Approaches of this strong Force, which to them as well as to all others seem'd almost irresistible. The Duke led it in Person, and drawing near to the Town fortified himself in a Park adjoining; and having made a Bridge of Boats over the Marne brought his Ordnance so near the Walls, that he might batter them down for an Assault speedily, by which he intended with a full Resolution to make himself Master of it. The Earl of Dunois, commonly call'd the Bastard of Orleans, was not at all terrified at their Attempts; but having animated his Men to stand valiantly to their own Defence, repulsed the English with some Loss several times, inasmuch that the Duke of Bedford not thinking it safe to conquer it by Force, which would cost him the Lives of so many Men, chose rather by Delays and Watchfulness to starve it. The French King seeing the great Danger the Town was in, and knowing of what Importance it was to him to preserve it, being as the Key to the three Territories, Burgundy, the French and English part of France, sent the Count Dunois a Recruit of 6000 Men with Store of Victuals under the Command of Monsieur de Rieux, Marshal of France, Monsieur de Coulant, Admiral of France, the Lords Poitou, Le Hire, and Gavcourt intending by this Force to raise the Siege, or else to victual the Town so, that it should not be reduced by Famine. This Army at their first coming breathed Revenge, and being equal to the Besiegers assur'd themselves of a Victory with the Help of the Besieged. The Duke of Bedford was sensible of the Advantage the French had of him, being fresh Men, and kept himself close in his Camp, which the French gave out they would assault, but the Regent's Courage would not suffer him to wait for that which would have been a Disgrace to him, tho' he had repulsed them, and therefore within a Day or two of their Arrival sent an Herald to them to bid them Battel, but they deny'd, maintaining only some small Skirmishes with the English, till their Men convey'd thirty Oxen and some other Provisions into the Town, and that with no small Damage to themselves; for in the Skirmishes the French lost above fifty noble and valiant Men, among whom were the Lord Saintrilles, and the Lord Gavcourt's Brother. The Town however having receiv'd some Relief, the Army remov'd in the Beginning of August to a Place call'd Fort-underayer, and by a Bridge

Laignie valiantly defended and held against the Duke of Bedford.

The Duke of Bedford raises the Siege.

A. D. 1433. Reg. 10. of Boats passed into the Isle of France, where meeting with no Resistance they took many Castles and Towns. The Duke tho' very desirous to get Laignie, which after the Departure of the Army could not hold out ver long, yet consider'd the various Disposition of the Parisians, and fearing least that City should revolt to King Charles when the Army drew near to them, raised the Siege in haste, leaving all his Engines, Pavilions and Provisions behind him: The Besieged pursu'd him in his Retreat, slew some of his Men, and took others Prisoners; but the Necessities of War obliging him to save Paris, he was forced to undergo that Loss rather than a greater. At Paris he sent the French another Challenge to fight, but they answer'd, They had done what they came for, and would fight him when they saw their own Time; and so retir'd without Battel.

Reg. 11. S. Valery regain'd from the French. The French being retreated, the Regent sent Peter de Luxenburg, Earl of St. Poll, and Robert, Lord Willoughby with a sufficient Force to besiege and retake the Town of St. Valery which the French had gotten in the Beginning of the last Year; for the Regent was of that Disposition, that he could hardly sleep till all Losses sustain'd by the English were regain'd. Mesfieurs de Vaucourt, De la Torre, and De Verfeil defended the Place, and did for three Weeks space manfully and bravely maintain their Posts against the Besiegers, but at length yielded upon Condition, That the Garrison might depart with their Horse and Baggage. The Earl of St. Poll after their Departure put in a Garrison of English, of the valiantest and stoutest Men, made Sir John Aubmond Captain of it, and then with the Lord Willoughby return'd to the Regent at Paris, where they were joyfully received by the Army. Not long after their Departure there happen'd a very terrible Pestilence among the Inhabitants, whether by the Infection of the Air, or by any corrupt Victuals, which the Towns People during the Siege had eaten, is uncertain, but it raged so violently, that within a little Time it consum'd two Parts in three of them. The Success of the Earl of St. Poll in taking St. Valery was an Encouragement both to the Regent and himself to attempt other Places; and accordingly the Duke sent him to besiege the Castle of Manchas, which he readily undertook; but being in his March toward it he encamp'd near the Town of Blangie, where he was seiz'd with a very violent Distemper, of which he died suddenly, leaving his Title and Possessions to Lewis de Luxenburg his Son and Heir. His Obsequies after his Death were solemniz'd with great Devotion both at London and Paris, because he was Father-in-law to the Duke of Bedford; with him died the Design of the besieging the Castle of Manchas, and the Town of Rombarres.

Sixth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. On the 8th of July the Parliament assembled at Westminster, and sat till Aug. 1. when it was adjourn'd to St. Edward's Day, Octob. 13. and then compleated the Acts, which they had began before, in the former part of the Session, and being most of them about Matters of great Use to the Publick, they may not be unworthy our Observation.

1. It was provided by an Act, That such Persons as were Keepers of the Stews or Whore-Houses in Southwark, should not be impanell'd upon any Jury, nor keep an Inn or Tavern in any other Places, lest Men of such vile Consciences and Practices should corrupt Justice, and propagate their Villanies over the Nation.

2. It was enacted, That even Disseisors should not be put out of Possession by any Collusive Tricks of Law, as was then usual, by making the Sheriff the Disseisor, and then entering upon the Lands for the Default of the Tenant's not answering: Wherefore it was ordain'd, That all such Writs shall be abated and quashed: And,

3. In the Behalf of the Person disseised wrongfully of his Lands, whereas before the Law was, that the Disseisee might sue the Disseisor in his Life-time, if he took the Profits at the Time of the Suit commenced, which to avoid the Disseisors, made over the Land by Feoffments to others, and so avoided the Suit: Whereupon it was enacted, That the Disseisees should have their Action as well against the Feoffee, as Disseisor himself, if either of them take the Profits of the Land.

4. And because divers Tenants of Lands for term of Life and Years, made over the said Lands to other Under-Tenants to the End that they might not be liable to Writs of Waste, for the Damages done upon the said Lands by their Order and Connivance before the Grant of the said Leases; It was hereupon enacted, That the Tenant in Reversion might have his Action against the Tenant for Life or Years, for the Damages done, as well before as after the Lease made to any Under-Tenants, and recover treble Damages for the said Waste, provided that it were prov'd, that the said First-Tenants took the Profits of the Land to their own proper Use at the Time of the Waste done.

5. Whereas divers Suits and Inducements as well for the King as his Subjects were discontinued by making of new Commissions for the Peace, to the great delay of Justice, and wrong of the Subject, it was enacted, That no Pleas, or Processes should be discontinued by any new Commissions, but the Justices so made should have Power and Authority to continue all Pleas depending and determine the same.

6. An Abuse also being crept into the Nation about Measures contrary to the Statutes, and Purveyors, Bakers, Merchants, and Buyers of Corn, taking Nine Bushels for the Quarter; it was enacted, That the Statutes for Weights and Measures should be proclaim'd in every Market-Town, and that there should be a Bushel, common Ballance and Weights in every Market-Town, City and Borough kept by the Mayor and Justices according to the Standard in the Exchequer; and if any Person shall presume to Sell or Buy by any other Weights or Measures, they shall forfeit Five Pound to the Person that shall sue for it, and Five Pound to the King.

7. Recognisors having found out a way to defeat the Executions of such Persons as they were indebted to by Recognizance, by bringing their Writs De Corpus cum causa out of Chancery, and giving Sureties to the King only, are deliver'd out of Prison, and their Creditors are defeated of their Debts; it was therefore ordain'd, That Sureties should be given as well to the Party as to the King, that their Debts may be surely paid.

Other Acts also of less Importance were also made this Session, as about the Measure of certain Cloths, call'd Sreights, for the punishing of such as shall dare to assault any Person coming to the Parliament or Council by the King's Command: And lastly, For setting a Price upon Wax-Candles, Images and Figures: But these Acts being only Temporary, and long since out of Use deserve little Regard. We

A. D. 1433. read not of any Taxes, that this Parliament gave the King; but perhaps it was because the Reg. 11. Duty of Tunnage and Poundage, which was given the King in his Third Year, was still continu'd: And whereas before they were granted for certain Years only, they were now indefinitely given him for the Charge of the War, and from thence as Stow says, They received the Name of Customs, i. e. usual and constant Payments.

Customs why so called.

The Council of Basil, and its Decrees.

The Council of Basil, which, tho' call'd by Pope Martin V. and after his Death confirm'd by his Successor Eugenius IV. in the Year 1431. was scarcely settled by reason of the Turbulency of Eugenius, who took upon him to dissolve it, and bring it to Ferrara, began now to assume a Power of acting without the Pope, and in their Eleventh Session, February the 27th, made these Decrees or Canons.

1. That the Bishop of Rome ought under the Pain of Suspension and Deposition to be present, either by himself, or his Legates chosen by the Consent of the Cardinals, at General Councils, with all other Ecclesiastical Persons.

2. That the Pope cannot lawfully hinder any Man, not so much as a Cardinal from coming to such a Council, but ought to give a License to all that desire it; and that the Pope cannot call a Council, dissolve it, or remove it from one Place to another, without the express Consent of the Council.

3. That the Council of Basil cannot be dissolved without the Consent of all the Bishops assembled at it.

And then they proceeded to consult about Ecclesiastical Matters, and made divers Constitutions for the better ordering of the Church, viz.

1. That no Person should be made a Bishop, but such as have been in Holy Orders a considerable time, are of fit Age, and are eminent for their Piety, Holiness and Learning.

2. That Bishops should hold a Diocesan Synod once a Year in their Diocesses about the Octaves of Easter, and diligently inspect into the Manners of the Clergy, and amend all the Corruptions of their Diocese.

3. That all Monks and other Religious Persons should carefully observe the Three Substantial Vows of their Profession.

4. That in such Places as the Jews inhabited, all Bishops should take a particular Care to settle such Pastors, as may be able to convince them of their Errors, and by their Authority draw them to hear the Word of God; with many Canons of like Nature: But the Three chief Canons which they most strongly asserted against the Pope and desired, to be believ'd by all, as the most infallible Truths, calling them, Veritates Fidei, were these, viz.

The Canons called, Veritates Fidei.

I. That a General Council is above the Pope, and any other Person.

II. That the Pope cannot dissolve or remove a General Council lawfully call'd without their Consent, by his own Authority, or at his own Pleasure.

III. That whosoever opposes these Assertions is an Heretick.

This Council sat many Years after this, and stoutly maintain'd its own Power against Eugenius, who sought to dissolve them, and by its Authority the Christian World hath armed itself against the Pope's Supremacy, as usurped and against the Word of God.

The Death of Peter de Luxemburgh, who after certain Funeral Ceremonies perform'd at Paris was sent over into England, and enterred with much Solemnity in St. Paul's Church in London, causing some short Cessation of Arms on the English Part, gave an Opportunity to the French, who watch'd all Advantages, to commit some Outrages upon them and their Allies. Into Burgundy they entred with a strong Body of Men, and burnt, took and destroy'd many Towns. The Burgundians much enrag'd at their Losses gather'd a great Army to revenge their Quarrel, and recover their Towns, and the Duke of Bedford being much troubl'd for the Loss of his Friends, sent the Lord Willoughby and Sir Thomas Kiriell with a good Force to their Assistance. These joining the Burgundians fell upon the Enemy in Lyonnois, and after a long Battel vanquish'd them, and recover'd all the Places to the Duke of Burgundy, which they had gain'd from him. Le Hire also accompany'd with many Gentlemen and 1500 Soldiers at the same time acted his Part with great Violence, taking the Town of Somme, and in it a great Number of Prisoners, by whose Ransoms he maintain'd his Soldiers, better than by their Pay. He afterwards divided his Men into two Parts, sending one of them into the County of Cambray, and conducting the other himself in those Parts. The former being inform'd of a great Concourse of People, met at Hapsre at a Feast, set upon them unawares in the midst of their Mirth, took many of them Prisoners, (the rest of them which were of better Condition saving themselves by getting into a strong Tower adjoining) and having plunder'd the Town, and burnt the Church and Abby, with many Houses they retreated to Mount St. Martin, where Le Hire and his Men expected them, who in the mean time had not lain still, but done as much or more Mischiefs; for they burnt and plunder'd the Town of Beaurevoir, and La Motta, an House of Pleasure belonging to the Countess of Laigni near by it, secur'd all the Champion Country about it, and having gotten much Booty went to Laon to divide it; which done he dismissed them to their Garrisons laden with spoil without the Loss of so much as one Man, because they met in all their March with no Opposition. John de Luxemburgh, Count de Laigni, to whom the Defence of those Parts belong'd, being otherwise busied at that Time by reason of the Death of the Old Count Peter his Brother. The Success of Le Hire encourag'd

Pawn-sach, the Captain of Laon, who envy'd his good Fortune, to make the like Attempts, that he might enrich himself and his Garrison; and to that end he march'd with 400 Soldiers towards Marle intending to surprize Vervins, a Town belonging to Giovanna de Barr, Daughter-in-law to John of Luxemburgh above-nam'd. Passing by Marle he burnt the Suburbs, and plunder'd them, but stay'd not to attack the Town, being mindful of his richer Booty at Vervins. John de Luxemburgh, who was before alarm'd at the Insults of Le Hire; having now gotten to his Charge again, and rallied his Men, set upon them, and gave them Battel. The French scarce suspecting any Opposition soon fled, leaving 160 of their Brethren slain upon the Place, and 80 Prisoners. It is said, That John de Luxemburgh himself fought with that daring Courage and Resolution, as if he would have conquer'd them alone, and slew many of them with his own Hands. He had with him in this Skirmish a young Nephew whom he was training up for War, for whose sake he was the more ven-

A. D. 1434. Whilst these Things passed in France, the Valiant Lord Talbot, who had been some time in England among his Friends, was very busie in gathering a Recruit of fresh Men to carry with him into France, and having gotten a Body of Eight Hundred, march'd thro' London, March the 9th, in order to his Journey with them thither. He landed in Normandy, and took his Way by Rouen to Paris, but the Active Spirits of both Captain and Soldiers could not be idle in an Enemy's Country; and therefore passing by a strong Castle, call'd Joing belonging to the French King, and lying between Beauvais and Gisors, he besieged it, and having taken it hanged up all the French he found in it, razed the Castle, and then proceeded directly in his Journey to Paris, in which he had an hearty Welcome from the Duke of Bedford and the English. The Lord Talbot having rested himself and his Men at Paris a while, and consulted with the Regent and other Nobles, which way it was best for him to proceed against the Enemy without prolonging Time, was at length sent with the Lord Lisle-Adam, and 1600 Men in their Army to besiege the Castle of Beaumont upon the River Oise, of which Sir Amadour de Veignolls, Brother to Le Hire, was the Captain: But whether the French were terrified at the News of the Approach of the English Forces, or whether they found themselves too weak to oppose them is uncertain; for they had left the Castle, and were all withdrawn to the next French Garrison at Creil. The Lord Talbot follow'd them thither, and laid close Siege to it; but Sir Amadour the Captain of it being slain by the English in a Skirmish, the Town and Castle soon yielded it self upon a Composition, and the Terror of it so awed the adjoining Towns, as Pont St. Maxence, Neuville and Rouge-Maison, that they all submitted without any Resistance at all. Crespi in Valois made a small Opposition, but was soon forced to surrender, and Clermont follow'd their Example; which Towns having been formerly subject to the English, but revolted, were used the more severely by the Soldiers, who plunder'd many of the Inhabitants, with whose Spoils they return'd Rich to Paris.

The Earl of Arundell takes several Places. The same Success had the Earl of Arundell at the same time in propagating and enlarging the English Power, by taking several Towns then in the Possession of the French; for he besieged the Castle of Bommolins, and took it by Surrender, and least it should harbour the like Enemies for the future, he demolish'd it. From thence he march'd to Orle in the County of Mayne, and after a sharp Attack with his Cannon brought it to a Composition, which being put in Order he set forward toward St. Selerine, of which Town the Lord Ambrose de Lore was Captain. This Man being a Person of signal Valour, and not willing to bring the Place to the Hazzard of a Siege, fall'y'd out with a considerable Body of Men, and fell so eagerly upon the English, that he made them give back a Bow-shot; and as the French History relates, slew about 100 Men, and got their Artillery, Victuals and

Tents into his Possession: But the Earl of Arundell encouraging the English Soldiers to return and retrieve their Honour by Fight, which would be irrecoverably lost if their Artillery remain'd in the Enemies Hands, so raised their Courage, that they made Head again, slew a great Number of them, and drove them back into the City, recovering all they lost in about an hour's Time. Though he resolv'd to besiege the Town, yet thinking it also convenient to take some Places adjacent, because he thought it would cost him some Time, he pass'd it by and besieged Louviers. Le Hire and his Brother Amadore de Vignolls were Captains of it, and there were many other Persons of Valour and worth in it, who defended it very bravely; but the French Historians say, the English Army was 12000, much too great for the Garrison to grapple with, and therefore they yielded the Place; and the English being in the Possession of it, broke down the Walls and Fortifications. Having reduced Louviers the Earl of Arundell returned to St. Selerine and closely besieged it; but the Besieged defended themselves so valiantly for Three Months together, though the Earl every Day almost attempted somewhat, that he was at last forced to take the most desperate Courses he could, and by Assault make himself Master of it. In entering the Town John D'Almain, and William De St. Albin, two of the chief Captains, and 800 Men of the Garrison were slain. The Children of the Lord De Lore were taken Prisoners. The Earl put in a new Garrison of the English, and made Sir John Cornwall Captain of it. This Success stirred him up to try his Fortune further; and thereupon he went to the Town of Silly, and pitched his Camp by it. The Terror of the Fate of St. Selerine had seized the Inhabitants so much, that they immediately offered him Hostages to submit to him within thirty Days, if they were not relieved, their Lives only saved. This Agreement the Besieged advertised the King of France of, that they might have Succour within the Time appointed, and were not only promised it, but as if that King had been as Zealous to save it, as the English were to take it; he appointed the Duke of Alençon, Arthur, Earl of Richmond, Charles D'Anjou, and a Marshal of France, who at the importunity of the Lord De Lore had gotten together a considerable Body of Men to succour St. Selerine, but too late to undertake the Rescue of Silly, and with all convenient haste to march thither for that End. These Orders were readily obey'd, and the French Army within the Time appointed presented it self before the Town, and incamped so near the English, that only a small River parted the Camps. The English seeing this Bravery returned their Hostages and prepared for a Battel; but the French, though to rescue the Town they ought to have refused no small Dangers, finding the English posted to Advantage, only entertain'd them a few Days with smart Skirmishes, and then in the Night broke up their Camp and departed. The Besieged in Silly being mightily disappointed of their Hopes immediately after their Retreat surrendered the Town to the Earl of Arundell according to their Agreement, and were well received by him, who restor'd them to their Houses and Possessions, and leaving a Garrison with them departed towards Mans, and in his Passage having taken the Castles of Millay, and St. Laurence, and clear'd the Country of Main of some straggling Enemies which much infested it, as soon as he was arrived, dismissed his Men to

About the same Time the Lord Willoughby, and Sir Thomas Kiriell returned out of Normandy with Honour and Victories, and with their Men supplied Louviers, a Town lately brought into Subjection to the English with a sufficient Garrison and Ammunition.

While these open Hostilities were maintained by both Sides, one against the other, the French King was busie Under-hand to disturb the English Settlement in Normandy, and by his Instigation raised a formidable Rebellion there; for a great Number of the common People about the Sea-Coasts, discontented at the English Yoke (and the French never could heartily love the English, or patiently live in Subjection to them) took Arms, and under the Conduct of the Marshal de Rochfort, Walter de Brusack, and Charles de Mares (who were laid with some Troops to joyn with them, and form them into some Military Order for their Enterprize) march'd to the English Garrisons, publishing and proclaiming it in all Places where they came, That it was their Resolution and Interest to expel the whole English Nation out of their Country and Coasts; and pursu'd this their Design so furiously at first, that in a few Days they took the English Garrisons of Deip, Fescamp, Harfluer, Montrevilliers and Tancherville, with all the Country of Caux, except Arques and Candebece. This Success increased their Boldness, and they went on to Caen, a chief City on the Sea-Coasts, purposing to make themselves Masters of that Place, to the End, that they might not only increase their Numbers, but have a fit Rendezvous from whence to pursue their Enterprize. The Dukes of Somerset and York, who commanded in that Province, and lay there with an Army, having Intelligence of their Proceedings, sent the Earl of Arundell and the Lord Willoughby with 6000 Bow-men, and 1300 Horse to lie in Ambush for them in their Passage. The Lord Willoughby accordingly with 2000 Archers, and certain Horse-men went before, and lay with his Men in covert by the Way which they were to pass, the Earl of Arundell pursuing them at some Distance behind with the rest of the Forces, a Sign being agreed to between them, when they should both set on them. The Rebels were ignorant of the Design, and securely march'd toward Caen; but when they came at the Lord Willoughby's Ambush, the English under his Command having shot off a Gun, which was the signal for the Earl of Arundell's Men, fell on the Rabble both behind and before with that Fury, that the poor Wretches unable to withstand their Forces threw down their Arms and begged Mercy and Pardon. The Earl knowing them to be instigated to this Enterprize by other Heads, and much pitying their Ignorance gave command immediately to his Soldiers to stop their Hands from Slaughter, and apprehending such as were thought the Incentives of this Rebellion, he permitted the rest to depart to their Houses; but such was the Fury of the Soldiers, that before they could be recalled to their Standards they had slain above 1000 of the Rebels. The Authors of this Insurrection being upon a strict inquiry found out, were put to most cruel Torments, as their Crimes deserv'd, and the Places which had been taken by them being badly treated by the Commanders, who were left in them, revolted, and recall'd the English, and so this Storm, which made an huge Blustering for the present, was soon blown over and quiet. The Earl of Arundell having thus successfully settled the Disturbances of Normandy return'd to the Earl of Bedford to give him an Account of it, who much fear'd the ill Consequences of it, and by the good News of the Victory was so much refresh'd and pleas'd with the Earl, that as if the English Affairs could thrive in no other Hands, he immediately dispatch'd him upon another Enterprize of almost equal Importance, viz. the Recovery of the Fort of Rue, lately taken by John de Bressay, Lieutenant to the Marshal de Rieux. This was a Loss of very great Consequence to the English, because the Garrison put into it by the French very much annoy'd the Countries of Ponthieu, Artois and Bolonois, and therefore the Recovery of it was absolutely necessary. The Earl of Arundell willingly undertook it, and with 800 Men began his March to besiege it; but being come as far as Gournay he alter'd his Resolution for a little time, upon this Reason. There was an Old Fort near Beauvais, call'd the Castle of Gerberoy, which had been lately dismantled and demolished, but being observ'd by the French King to stand very commodiously for a Garrison against the English on those Frontiers, he commanded Sir Stephan de Vignails, commonly call'd Le Hire, to repair and newly fortifie it. The Earl of Arundell in this Expedition taking Notice of the Building, and knowing that it would be very prejudicial to the English, resolv'd to dispossess the Enemies of it immediately; thinking, that in so short a Time as it had been built, it could be in no Condition of Defence, or if it were, it would be easier and better gained now than hereafter. Upon this Presumption, which was badly grounded, he march'd up to it only with 500 Horse, leaving his Foot behind him to follow him at Leisure, and question'd not to take it with small Resistance, but it prov'd a very fatal Mistake; for Le Hire, who was there himself in Person, and had a Body of 3000 Men, which the Earl was ignorant of, observing, that the Earl's Force was small, and his Horses tired, resolv'd to set on them before they could refresh themselves, or the Foot could get up to them to their Assistance, and to animate them in the Attempt, he sent out to them Fifty Horse, as if there had been no more in the Castle. Sir Ralph Standish with an Hundred Men was sent by the Earl to encounter them; but before the Battel between them was begun, the rest issued out of the Castle, and having slain Sir Ralph and his Men, they set upon the Earl and the Horse-men about him, who fought very manfully in their Defence; but Le Hire ordering three Culverins to be discharg'd in the midst of the English as they were fighting, many were swept away by that means, and at the second shot was the Earl's Leg broke a little above the Ankle, which so pain'd him, that he fell from his Horse in a Swoon, and the French pursuing the Advantage, put the English to Flight, taking the Earl himself, Sir Richard Woodville, and 120 others Prisoners with their Horses. 200 were slain, and the rest escaped. The Earl himself was carry'd to Beauvais, where he dy'd within a few Days of his Wound, and was buried in the Church of the Friers-Minors. His Death was much lamented by the English, being their Glory in present, and Hope for the future. He was the Fifth Earl of the Noble Family of Fitz-Allen.

The Breach between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy.

With this Year concluded the long Friendship and Confederacy between those Two Great Princes, John, Duke of Bedford, and Philip, Duke of Burgundy, which had been slacken'd for some time before by the Death of the Duke of Bedford's Lady, and new Marriage, but at this Time was quite dissolved by many fresh Distastes and Grudges taken one at another, which had been rais'd and fomented to so high a Pitch by the Tales of Court-Parasites, that they both thought it dishonourable for them to hold any League or Amity longer one with another: But some there were, who being sensible how fatal this Breach would prove to England, as well as mindful of King Henry the Fifth's Charge given to his Lords upon his Death-Bed, viz. That by all means they should be very careful to retain the Duke's Friendship and Amity; used their utmost Endeavour to make up the Breach, by bringing them to an Interview, that by producing the Causes of their Displeasure, they might, if possible, be removed, and they made Friends. St. Omer's was the Place appointed; a Town, which being in the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy, might seem a Condescension, and an Earnest of the Duke of Bedford's Desire to be reconciled, for him to meet at it. The Duke of Burgundy ought in Compliance, when the Duke of Bedford had stoop'd thus low, to have visited him first, and gave him a Welcome into his Dominions, since it hath been always accounted Rudeness to affect Priority in our own Houses and Territories; but Burgundy's Mind was so inflamed, that he would be first visited, as the Lord of the Town, and Sovereign in that Place, a Punctilio, which when the Duke of Bedford consider'd, he began to think with himself, that he was not only the Son, Brother and Uncle of Kings, but being Regent of France, he sustained the Person of one of the greatest Monarchs of Europe, and 'twould be a Disgrace for his Master, if not to himself, to stoop to the Humour of a petty Prince, especially since he had obtain'd Hennault, Holland, Zealand and Frisland, by the Aid of the English only; and for these Reasons he would not give him the first Visit. Burgundy was not insensible of these Reasons, yet would not bend: However, to end the Dispute, propounded, that the Matters in Difference might be discuss'd by Third Persons, which the Duke of Bedford not hearkening to, they departed without the Sight one of another, in great Anger and Discontent, and lived ever after it, as if there never had been any Affinity or Friendship between them, in the most inveterate and implacable Enmity, which though indeed it had been Bedford's Prudence and Policy, by any Acts of Condescension, to have prevented, (and that he did not do it was thought highly blame-worthy) yet it may bear a Dispute, whether any thing would have prevail'd, since that Duke had given many wide Proofs of his good Inclination to the French Side, by allowing his Brother-in-Law, the Earl of Richmond, to be Constable of France, and consenting that his Sister Agnes should marry the Duke of Bourbon, a great Friend of King Charles; so that it is to be thought, the Breach was unavoidable.

While this Treaty was on Foot between the Dukes, the Earl of Dunois, commonly called the Bastard of Orleans, the Lord Rochfort, Marshal of France, and some others, having had Information from one Reginold de S. John, a Gentleman born in the Isle of France, but a Soldier in S. Dennis, with whom they had a Correspondence, how they might surprize the Town, sent Captain Deinville with a sufficient Number of Troops thither, who scaled the Walls by Night, and made himself Master of it, turning out the English Garrison, commanded by Sir Matthew Gough and Sir Thomas Kiriell. This Action is interpreted by Some, as if the Duke of Burgundy, tho' he pretended a Willingness to be reconciled to the Duke of Bedford, never really intended it, because the King of France at that Time so highly courted the Duke of Burgundy's Favour, that he would never have permitted such an hostile Action in the Time of Treaty without his Leave, tho' this may be allowed only conjectural, yet 'twas suspicious in the Duke of Bedford's Absence. However that be, 'tis certain the Loss was very great to the English, being upon the very Gates of Paris, and if kept by the French King, it would be a perpetual Molestation to that City, especially, since the French would be obliged to keep a very strong Garrison in it. These Thoughts induced the English to resolve upon the speedy Recovery of it, which Sir Matthew Gough and Sir Thomas Kiriell, whose Honour was much impaired by the Loss of it, were ready to undertake, and accordingly did by the Assistance of the Parisians. The Bastard, who yet continued at St. Dennis, had Notice of the Design of the English, and being sensible it was as much the Interest of his Master to keep it, as of the English to regain it, left the Marshal De Rieux to defend it, if the English besieged it, while he went himself to raise greater Forces for the Relief of it. The English soon after his Departure began the Siege under the Command of the Lord Talbot, Sir Matthew Gough, Sir Thomas Kiriell, the Lord Lisle Adam, and others, with a full Resolution to take it; and tho' the Bastard joining with the Forces of the Counties of Champagne and Valois, took the Towers of Houdan, and Montmeulan (f) to draw them from it, yet the English held on the Siege, and would not be drawn from it. The Constable of France, the Bastard of Bourbon, Monsieur de Loheac, and others were sent with a great Army to raise the Siege, but seeing the Resolution of the English, they dar'd not to set upon them, which when Marshal de Rieux saw, he yielded up the Town to them upon as honourable Conditions as he could: Reginald de S. John, who had betrayed the Place, and Dionegius de Voucourt, a Person of great Valour and Conduct, upon whom the Governours chiefly relied in the Siege, were both slain. The Walls of the Town were all beaten down, unless on the Side next the Abbey, and the Tower of Veneno, which remained all the while in the Custody of Simon de Morior, Son to the Provost of Paris, with the English Soldiers with him, and so the English recovered but a very shattered Place of it.

The Business of this Session seems to be only to regulate some Abuses of other Acts of Parliament, or interpret them, for it was therein enacted,

1. That the Judges in their Circuits, shall have Power to give Judgments in all Cases of Felony and Treason, as well upon Persons acquitted as attainted, and award Executions according to that Judgment.

2. That all Wools and Woolfells, that shall be shipped to be transported, shall be carried to Callis only, and no License shall be granted to the contrary, but by the King, with the Advice of the Council.

3. That the Justices of Peace in Cumberland should hold their Sessions Quarterly at Carlisle only, and in Middlesex only twice a Year, because of the Terms.

4. That all Wool and Woolfells, and other Merchandizes of the Staple, which shall be shipped in any Creeks or Ports, clandestinely to cheat the King of his Customs and Subsidies, shall be forfeited to the King.

5. That all Persons, who shall dare to disturb any Foreigners, in selling Fish, or other Victuals, either by Whole-sale or Retail, shall forfeit Ten Pounds, one Moiety to the King, and the other to the Person, that shall sue for the same.

These Acts being finished, the King had a Fifteenth given him to carry on his Wars with France, and they were dissolv'd. During the Sitting of this Parliament, on the Eve of St. Katherine, November the 24th, began a Frost, which lasted to the Feast of St. Scholastica, February the 10th, and held with so great Violence, that the Thames was frozen over, so that the Merchandizes and Provisions brought to the Thames's Mouth, were conveyed to London by Land thro' Kent.

A great Frost, by which the Thames was frozen over.

A. D. 1435.

The Council of Basil endeavours to make a Peace between England and France.

In the Council of Basil, which still continued Sitting, there was a Motion made by Sigismund, the Emperor, and assented to by the Rest of the Christian Princes, who were all present to compose the Difference between the Scismatical Popes, Felix and Eugenius, That a Mediation should be made for a Peace between France and England, since so much Bloodshed among Christians was a great Scandal to their Holy Profession, and this they had a great Encouragement to do, because the Duke of Burgundy, who had been the Support of the Quarrel from the Beginning, was now willing to be reconciled to the French King upon honourable Terms, provided that it could be so managed, as that it might seem not so much his own, as that King's Desire. The Settling a Peace at this Juncture between Two such great Nations, was indeed a Work worthy the Endeavours of the Council, and the great Danger that all Christendom was in, from the Arms of the Turk, whose Emperor, Mahomet the First, having not many Years before made Adrianople in Thracia his Royal Seat, left Amurath, his Son, an ambitious and aspiring Prince, to propagate his Victories further into Europe, made it necessary, if possible, for all the Christian Princes to unite among themselves, and join against this common Enemy: And to this End, Nicholas D'Albergat, a Carthusian Frier, Cardinal de Sancta Cruce, or the Holy Cross, and Hugh de Lassignan, a Cypriot, Bishop of Praneste in Italy, were sent to the Princes at Difference, to come to a Conference in order to a Peace, and obtained by their earnest Sollicitations, that they would send their Ambassadors to an Assembly at Arras, a Town in Artois to conclude all Matters in Controversie between them. The Commissioners sent by Henry, King of England, were Henry Beaufort, Cardinal and Bishop of Winchester, John Kemp, Archbishop of Tork, William de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, John Holland, Earl of Huntington, the Bishops of Norwich, St. Davids, and Lysieux, with divers other Knights and Gentlemen. For the French came Charles, Duke of Bourbon, Arthur of Brittain, Constable of France, Lewis, Earl of Vendosme, the Archbishop of Rheims, Chancellor of France, for the French King, with many other Persons of Note. The Emperor, the Kings of Cyprus, Portugal, Castile, Sicily, Navarr and Poland, sent also their Ambassadors to assist at it, and further the Agreement, as Occasion should offer. Nicholas also Cardinal of the Holy-Cross was ordered by the Bishop of Rome, to perswade an Union in the Name of his Master, the Vice-gerent of the Prince of Peace. The Duke of Brittain had also his Deputies, the Earls of Alençon and Barr. But the Duke of Burgundy was there in Person, attended by the Duke of Guelders, his Chancellor, the Bishop of Cambrays, with divers other Earls and Barons, and a gallant Train of Courtiers. The Cardinal of Holy-Cross opened the Assembly with a pathetick Speech to the Parties in Difference, representing to them the great Mischiefs that had redounded to all Christendom, by the continual Wars between Two such potent Kingdoms, and exhorting them by the Honour of God, and for the Love they had to Religion, that they would lay aside all Enmity one to another, and embrace such a Peace and Union, as might be for the Glory of God, and the eternal Advantage of their Souls; which Speech being ended, Consultations were entred into by the several Ambassadors to bring in their Demands and Proposals. The English Ambassadors brought in their Demands first, and urged, 'That King Charles should lay down 'his Pretences to the Kingdom of France, and 'should enjoy no Part of it, but what the King 'of England should out of his mere Favour allow him, and those should hold of him, as 'his Homager and Feudary. The French Ambassadors on the contrary, as positively 'Demanded the whole Kingdom of France, as their 'Master's Right, and required, that the King 'of England should lay aside the Name, Arms, 'and Title of the King of France, and relinquish Paris, and all the Towns which he 'held in France, being content with the Dukedoms of Aquain and Normandy, with such 'Part of Guienne as they were now in Possession 'of, yet to pay homage for them to the King 'of France, as the Supream Sovereign of them. These Propositions seeming more to incline to a War than Peace, the Cardinal of S. Cross endeavoured to mitigate them on both Sides, and bring them to more near Terms, but all proved in vain; and because he saw, it would be next to impossible to make a Peace between them, he offered them reasonable Conditions for a Truce, but this was also rejected on both Parts, and the English displeased with the great Demands of the French, whose Spirits they supposed to have been more humble, departed to Callis, and so returned into England. The Cardinal de Sancta Cruce, seeing all Hopes of Concluding a Peace between England and France to be to no Purpose, turns all his Endeavours to work an Accommodation between the French King and the Duke of Burgundy, which he did with

A. D. 1435. Reg. 13. with no great Pains, the former being ready to stoop almost to any Terms to win him, and the latter ready to embrace any Thing honourable and advantageous, so that a Peace was immediately agreed on upon these Conditions, viz.

I. That King Charles, tho' he excused himself from the Murther of the Duke of Burgundy, his Father, yet should make Satisfaction for his Death, by punishing all that were found guilty of it, if they could be discovered and apprehended, by Death, if not, by perpetual Banishment, and should build a Church in Monberran, with a Monastery of Twelve Monks, and a Superior, which he should endow with a sufficient Maintenance, to pray for his Soul for ever.

II. That King Charles, should pay to the Duke of Burgundy 50000 Crowns for the Jewels, that were taken from his Father at his Death, and should have Liberty to recover those that were not named, particularly the Fleece, which was of a very great Value, from any, in whose Possession they were found.

III. That the following Countries, Cities, and Towns, with all their Præeminencies and Jurisdictions, should be immediately delivered up to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, and settled upon him and his Heirs, whether Male or Female, viz. Mascon in Xantaigne, the City of Auxerres, with the Jurisdiction of Barr upon the Seine, the City of Castel, with the Lay-Patronage of the Church and Abbey of Leuxenle, pretended to, but never possessed by the Dukes of Burgundy before, the Cities of Montdidier, Perron, St. Quintin, Corby, Amiens, and Abbeville, the County of Pontian and Poictou, with the Outbounds of Champaign.

IV. That in Case the King of England should make War upon the Duke of Burgundy and his Subjects, King Charles should assist him both by Sea and Land, as in his own Cause, and should not make Peace with him, unless he included him in it; and that if King Charles should not fully keep to this Agreement, his own Subjects should not be bound to obey him, but being freed from all Oaths of Allegiance to him, might assist the Duke of Burgundy against him.

V. Lastly, That Charles, Count Carolois, Son to Duke Philip, should marry the Lady Katherine, King Charles the Third's Daughter, and have with her in Portion 120000 Crowns; but this Marriage was not consummated till Four Years after, by reason of their tender Age, not being above 7 Yearsold.

By these Articles the French King may seem to have bought the Duke of Burgundy's Friendship dear, but he being the Hinge upon which the Kingdom of France turned, nothing could be too much to gain his Friendship, which being obtained, all must soon follow, as indeed it did.

The Duke of Burgundy being thus united again with the French, to whom he had a long time born a good Affection, knew very well that the News of it would be very surprizing to the English, his old Confederates, and would certainly produce some ill Effects, if they were not pacified with some palliating Excuses, whereupon he sent Joison d'Or, his chief Herald, into England, to give an Account of this new Confederacy, and his Motives to embrace it, which were, 'Not any real Disaffection to the English, but merely to satisfy his People, and in Compliance with the earnest Entreaties of the general Council at Basil, the Pope and other Princes of Christendom. For by the Continuance of the Wars, his own People with bitter Lamentations complained to him, That they were utterly ruined and impoverished, and the whole Kingdom of France in a manner destroyed, which because all Men laid upon him as the Cause of it, he thought it his Duty to yield to the Exhortations of so many grave Persons, to unite with King Charles, and so avoid the Guilt of so much Bloodshed, as would else be laid to his Charge. And these Reasons he thought so strong, in reference to King Henry, that he could not but heartily wish, he would accept of a Peace upon honourable and reasonable Terms, that so these cruel Wars, which were so displeasing to God, and prejudicial to both Nations, might have an End, and Peace be established amongst them. This Message, which was delivered by Letter to King Henry's Council, was very amazing, and so much the more, because the Superscription was very unusual. For, whereas before he used in his Writings to stile King Henry, King of France and England, his Lord and Master (g), now he entitiled him only, The High and Mighty Prince, Henry, by the Grace of God, King of England, his Well-beloved Cousin; as if he had been no longer King of France, and the Duke by joining with Charles, had utterly disowned his old Master. This Letter being read, and considered on well by the Council, raised such Indignation in them against the Duke, that they would not let the Messenger see the King, but sent him back to his Master without any Letters, telling him, that the Duke was a perjured Traitor, whom they could not think worthy of Answer. But the News of this Peace was received with much greater Disgust by the Citizens of London, who were more heady and furious, and because they could not revenge themselves upon the Duke himself, fell heavy upon his Subjects, who, for Traffick sake retided in, or about their City, and slew many of them. King Henry, whose mild Temper better qualified him for Mercy, than Revenge, was much troubled for the Outragious Facts of his Subjects, and put out his Proclamation, strictly charging all his Subjects, under severe Punishments, to forbear the like Disorders for the future; which stopp'd their Hands from Bloodshed, but did not restrain their Tongues from charging Philip with the grossest Perjury, Treachery and Hypocrisy, who, contrary to all his repeated Oaths and Promises to obey King Henry, as his lawful Sovereign, had deserted him, and reconciled himself to his Enemy, in which, tho' the Pope's Legate had given him Absolution to pacifie his guilty Conscience, yet that was but a delusive Salve for so foul a Breach of Fidelity in the Sight of all the World; but Burgundy had served his Turn by Siding with the English to revenge his Father's Death, and now had another Game to play, which was to raise his own Greatness, which he did effectually by making up with France, whereby he gained many large Countries and Territories, which his Ancestors had no Title to, nor could he himself by any other Means have gained, and for this Reason he held firmly ever after to the French Interests. Reg. 14.

Seven Days after the Conclusion of this Peace, between Charles, King of France, and the Duke of Burgundy, John, Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, died at Roan, September the Fourteenth, a wife and warlike Prince, who by his Courage,

He was buried in the Cathedral Church of our Lady in that City, with all Funeral Solemnities, on the North-Side of the High-Altar, under a sumptuous and costly Monument, which remaining whole and entire many Years after, in the Reign of Lewis XI. Son of King Charles, some of his Courtiers advised him, being then at Roan, to demolish it, because his Memorial was a Shame to France. But King Lewis generously reply'd, God have his Soul, and let his Body lie now at Rest, who, when he was alive, would have made the proudest of us to tremble. As for his Tomb, it is not so decent and convenient, as his noble Achievements deserved, and I am sorry it is no more stately, that its Richness might answer his Worth. The News of his Death caused great Grief in England, not only for the Loss of so excellent and great a Person, but for the Danger France was in by his Death, there being scarce any Man left behind him equal to him in Courage and Wisdom, and none of Experience to manage so difficult a Station; but Necessity required, that one should immediately be put in his Place; and therefore K. Henry's Council proceeded to an Election (b). The Dukes of Somerset and York became Competitors for it, both of them nearly related to the Crown, and therefore might be thought to have an equal Zeal for the Support of it. Somerset was most desirous of it, but York had the Votes of the Council, because he had the fairest Pretences to the Crown, and so he was elected; yet with so great Offence to Somerset, that he sought all Ways to obstruct his Commission, and hinder his speedy Passage thither, which though it might prove the common Loss, yet he thought would turn to York's Disgrace with the Commons, who, not knowing the secret Causes, hate or love for what appears. And, indeed, Somerset was not out in his Politick Design; for before the Duke of York could get his Dispatch into France, Paris, and many other chief Towns, for want of a Governour, were revolted to the French King; and though he was not really in Fault for it, he was forced to bear much of the Blame, upon the Account of his Delays. The Duke of York was not insensible as well of the Cause, as of the Effect, and tho' he would not at present seem to resent it, yet he laid it up in his Memory, that when Occasion should offer, he might revenge it upon the Duke of Somerset, who bearing an equal Hatred to him, they wrought each other's Destruction in a few Years, and entailed the Quarrel upon their Posterities, to the Ruin almost of both Families.

Isabel, Queen of France, died.

In the same Month with the Duke of Bedford, died Isabel, late Queen of France, Mother of Charles, the present King, and Catherine, Queen of England, at Paris, and was buried by her Husband at St. Dennis, without any Funeral Pomp or Solemnity, the Times not permitting such Ceremonies. She died hated by the French, and not much regarded by the English; for tho'

indeed she had been the main Instrument of the Success of the English in France, and their Establishment there, yet they being sensible, that what she did for them was not out of any real Love to them, but out of an insatiable Desire of Revenge upon her Son Charles the Dauphin, could not affectionately requite the Kindnesses they received, because they were intended chiefly to gratifie her own Malice, and the English were used but as Instruments for her unnatural Cruelties.

The Death of the Duke of Bedford was no sooner known in France, but, as though he had been the only Restraint upon the French to yield Obedience to the English, they began almost in all Places of the English Dominions to think of a Revolt to their natural Prince. Normandy began first to shew its Inclinations to King Charles; and having given Intelligence of their Design, invited his Army to come among them, under the Command of Marshal de Rieux, Charles de Marest, Messieurs de Bausack and Longueville, to whom they immediately surrender'd Deise, Roan, (i) Bois de S. Vincennes (k), and several other considerable Places; in which though there were English Garrisons, yet either being overpowered, or betray'd by the treacherous Inhabitants, they were forced to relinquish them, and shift for themselves as well as they could; but some were taken Prisoners; and the Citizens, who had been for the English, were either plunder'd of their Goods immediately, or made to take an Oath of Fidelity to the French King. This Success drew Multitudes to them. The Lords Sentraglie, Estouteville, and many other Lords, brought an Army of between 3 and 4000 to join with them; and one Kernier, a Captain of the Rabble, follow'd them with 6000 Commons, who all readily took the same Oath; so that Charles's Party became very strong, and able to take the remaining Towns by Force, if they should stand out against them, which it could not be thought that many would no, since the strongest Towns had submitted. Fescamp yielded it self on Christmas-Eve, without Assault, and the Captain of it, Monsieur Villiers, a Gascoigne, was so zealous for his new Master, that he assaulted Harfleur on St. Stephen's Day to reduce it. The Garrison repulsed him at first valiantly, and beat him off at the Onset with the Loss of Forty of his Men; but while he was putting himself in Order for a Second, the Inhabitants capitulated to surrender the Town to the French, upon Condition, that the English Garrison, which consisted of 400 Men, should be suffer'd to depart peaceably with all their Goods; which being granted and accepted, many other Towns follow'd their Example, as, Beurespin, Tancherville, Gomeffeule, Loges, Vallemont, Graville, Longeville, Neneville, Lamberville, and many others, into which the French having put Garrisons, became almost absolute Masters of Normandy.

Things being thus settled here, Charles cast an Eye upon Paris it self, which being kept only by 2000 Men, a weak Garrison, under the Command of the Lord Willoughby and the Bishop of Turwin, was easie to be recover'd, the Citizens, as he was inform'd, being well affected to him, and willing to submit; whereupon he commanded the Constable, Arthur of Brittain, the Earl of Dunois, the Lords de la Roche and Lisle Adam, with a good (1) Body of Burgundians and French Men, to present themselves before it, hoping to get the Possession of it without much Labour; but when they arrived, they found their Friends so carefully watch'd by the Garrison, that they could not betray the City to them, as was designed; and therefore they retreated to St. Dennis, which they besieged. The English Garrison there was 400 strong, but the Place weak, being wholly dismantled, unless it were on the Abbey-Side; yet they withstood a very powerful Assault, wherein they lost 200 Men, and were forced to flee into the Abbey and Tower Penin, in which they only kept themselves, till they could gain a Composition to render up the Place with the Safety of their Lives.

St. Dennis taken.

The Lord Beaumont, who was lately come out of Normandy with 600 Men, hearing what Danger St. Dennis was in to be lost, but not knowing that it was yielded, sallied out of Paris, with some Addition to his Forces, to observe the Posture of the Enemy, and if they could relieve the Place; but being discover'd by the French Army, they so encompass'd him on every Side, that though both himself and his Men defended themselves valiantly, yet 300 were slain, and himself, with Eighty of his Men, taken Prisoners; the rest fled, but were closely pursued to the very Gates of Paris.

This Loss on the English part not only weaken'd the Garrison, but made the Citizens, who stood in Fear chiefly of the Lord Beaumont, to resolve upon a Revolt, which having acquainted the Lord Lisle Adam with privately, and obtain'd an Assurance of him and the Constable, That their former Offences should be pardon'd, and their ancient Liberties and Privileges confirm'd to them, on their part they promised to receive them into the Town. The Constable delay'd no Time, but drawing up his whole Army, presented himself before the City, displaying the Charter of their Pardon to the View of the Citizens, and requiring them, as it were, to open their Gates. The English Garrison, suspecting the Treason, endeavour'd all they could to keep them shut; but the Citizens had drawn up the Chains in every Street, and oppos'd them not only themselves in Armour, but even their Wives and Children from their House-Tops so annoy'd them with Stones and Scalding-Water, which they pour'd upon them, that they could not prevent their Design; so the French Army partly got Admission at the Gates of St. Dennis and St. James, and partly scaled the Walls. The Parisians in a great Tumult meeting them, cry'd out with Joy, Long live King Charles, and the Duke of Burgundy. The English, seeing all Opposition in vain, retired into the Street of St. Anthony, where they remain'd safe for the present under the Cannon of the Bastile, which they victualled as much as they could in so short a Time, and then betook themselves to it for their Defence. The Constable and his Forces pursued them to their Fortrefs, and closely besieged them; but they defended themselves very bravely for Ten Days, in Hopes of Relief; their Victuals failing at the End of that Term, and no Assistance appearing, they agreed to yield up the Place, their Goods and Lives being saved, and so they were safely conducted to Roan.

Thus the Capital City of France submitted to King Charles, Sixteen Years after the Duke of Clarence had placed a Garrison in it for the English; but not by the Valour of the French, 1436. but by the Perjury of the Citizens, who, contrary to their frequent Oaths and Promises of Fidelity to Two Kings, most treacherously revolted from them, shewing themselves a false and inconstant People.

The English being gone, the French seized on and shared such Goods of theirs, as they found in the City, and confiscated the Estates of such of the Citizens as had sided with them, displacing all the Officers and Governours that had not further'd their Attempt, and putting new ones in their Places.

While Fortune thus prosper'd the French in some Places, the English were not inactive in others to recover their Losses, or, if that could not be, to endamage them so, that they might not be so great Winners. The Garrison of Calais issued out, and made a sudden Assault upon Bullen, and had almost taken the Lower Town, but failing of it, they burnt many of the Ships that were in the Haven, and pass'd from thence into the Confines of Gravelin, and destroy'd all the Country round about it. The furious People, impatient of their Losses, got together, and took Arms to oppose them, but being unskilful and undisciplin'd, were soon routed by the English, 400 of them being slain, and 120 taken Prisoners, the rest flying into the Country for Safety, while the English, with their Spoil and Prisoners, return'd to their Garrisons.

Other Advantages the English had in other Places against the French, which something abated the Glory of their Victories; for at the Siege of the Town of Crail upon Oise, Sir William Chamberlin, Governour of the Town, issued out of it with 500 Men upon the French, who assaulted it, and, after a long Fight, routed them, slew 200, and took a great Number Prisoners, the rest flying into Champaign, and the adjoining Countries. Nor was La Hire more fortunate at Gisors, which Twelve of the Burgesses had betray'd to him for a Sum of Money; for tho' he got a quiet Possession of the Town by their Treachery, yet the English Garrison, who had fortified themselves in the Castle, and sent to the Lords Talbot and Scales, who lay at Roan, with a good Force, to assist them, stood out firmly against all the French Forces, in Hopes of Succour, which coming timely to them, while the Enemy were in the Heat of their Opposition, freed the Castle, drove away the French with Loss, recover'd the City, and punished the Traitors.

Gisors recover'd with Loss to the French.

While these Things were doing, the Duke of York, though later than he would, landed in Normandy, with an Army of 8000 fresh Soldiers, being accompanied with the Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, the Lord Falconbridge, and several other famous Captains. It was no small Trouble to the new Regent to hear of the Losses of the English in this Vacancy of the Government, and therefore upon his Arrival he doubled his Diligence to regain as much of them as he was able. The Earl of Salisbury he dispatched to besiege the Castle of Chambois, which he soon regain'd by Surrender. The Lords Scales and Hoo, with Sir Thomas Kiriell, he sent to suppress the Rebels of the Country of Caux, which they did so effectually, that they left no Fears of like Disturbances from those Parts; for they slew 5000 of the Rebels, burnt all the unwall'd Towns and Vil-

The Regent himself took his Way to Roan, where, after he had put Things in good Order, and settled some Differences among the Inhabitants with admirable Lenity and Justice (for which the French Chronicles highly extol him to this Day) he went to besiege Eiscamp, which he in a short time recover'd, and brought in Subjection to the English.

Duke of Burgundy seeks the English Friendship again

The Duke of Burgundy, who had so lately joyn'd himself with the French Interests, tho' his Subjects had been much wrong'd and abused by the English, as well in France as England, yet shew'd no open Acts of Hostility, but as if he had repented of the Fact, and were willing to be reconciled to his Old Friends, permitted the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries, who suffer'd very great Losses by his League with the French King for want of the Commerce, which they formerly had with the English, to endeavour a Restoration and Continuance of the Peace with them, who thereupon employ'd John de Luxembourg, Count de Ligni to write to his Brother the Arch-Bishop of Roan, who was one of King Henry's chief Counsellors in France, to propound it to, and obtain it of King Henry's Council in England, which he did so earnestly and effectually, that he found no unwilling Compliance with the Proposal. But because in the mean time the English in France had not desisted from making Invasions upon his Territories, and destroying his Subjects, and King Henry had at the same time written to the Hollanders to offer them the Continuance of his Friendship, Philip being highly offended at these Things, and especially at the latter, which he interpreted to be done to seduce his Subjects from their Obedience to him, receded from his Word, and told Ligni plainly, That he would never more entertain any Thoughts of Peace with the English, because they had very much injur'd him in his Honour, ravaged and plundered his Subjects upon the Confines of Flanders, endeavour'd to surprize Ardes, sent Ambassadors to the Emperour to provoke his Imperial Majesty against him, sought to seduce and withdraw his Subjects from their Allegiance, and done many other Things not to be passed over without the highest Repentments by any Prince. These Things he writ in a Letter to King Henry and his Council in England, and in it he declared War against him for the said Wrongs and Injuries; which tho' many of them were falsely charg'd upon him, as was prov'd by the Answer given him by King Henry and his Council, yet they serv'd for a Pretence for the irreconcilable Enmity that ensued upon it: For the Duke of Burgundy immediately call'd a great Council of his chief Men, and represented to them the Mischief done to himself and Subjects by the English, desiring their Advice and Assistance to revenge him and themselves upon them, and remove so troublesome an Enemy, if not out of France, yet from their Confines. Calis, he said, belong'd to his Jurisdiction, as a part of the Province of Artois; and as it was now the greatest Annoyance to his Dominions, being in the Hands of the English; so if they could recover it, it would be as great an Advantage to them, for it would perfectly secure Flanders, Artois, Picardy, and the Country about Bullen. Indeed it was a very strong Fort, and very well mann'd and provided, and therefore the Siege was not to be undertaken without sufficient Forces, but he did not doubt they would assist him with all Things necessary to effect it, if they concurred with him in the Design. These Proposals the whole Assembly approv'd of, and assur'd him of their Readiness to lend him all the Assistance they could in it; and because they judg'd sufficient Forces might be rais'd out of Holland and Flanders to effect their Purpose, it was advis'd, That the Duke should in Person go into those Provinces and solicit their Help in so advantageous an Attempt, which he immediately upon the Dissolution of this Council did. He began with Gant the head City in Flanders; and having assembled the Magistracy there publish'd his Resolution to them, and met with such a general Approbation from them, that they easily granted his Desires, and thought long till it was put in Execution; and the like Concurrence it had in all the Province of Flanders. The Hollanders indeed shew'd not that Forwardness and Readiness in the Design as the Flemmings did; but at length they consented to satisfy their Prince's Desires, and so all Things were provided for so great an Attempt, which either Invention or Caution could devise. These Preparations and the Intent of them were certified to King Henry and his Council by Sir John Ratcliff, Deputy-Governour of the Town of Calis, who was as careful to provide for the Defence of it, as the Enemy to assault it, and there were sent over with all Expedition 1500 Men, with good store of Provision, under the Command of the Earl of Mortaigne, Son to the Duke of Somerset, and the Lord Camois. This strong Garrison, that they might make the Country about it unfit to harbour and receive the Enemy, pillag'd and destroy'd all the Villages and Corn; and though they were encounter'd first by a strong Body of Flemmings, and then by a Party of 1500 French under the Command of the Lords of Warren and Bado, yet they were Victorious over them, killing many, and taking almost an equal Number of Prisoners.

The Duke of Burgundy having spent some considerable Time in fitting out his Troops, and ordering his Men, at length began his March towards Calis. His whole Army which consisted of Men out of several Provinces, as Picardy, Flanders, Holland, Hannault, to the Number of 40000, was furnish'd with such an Abundance of Victuals, Arms and Artillery, that they may seem to be fit to conquer a Nation, and not a Town, which they themselves thought so inconsiderable an Attempt, that they supposed the very Approach of their Captains would fright the Inhabitants out of it, and it would be taken without Resistance; but they found their Mistake soon after, the Calisians neither fearing their Numbers nor Strength. In their Passage towards Calis, when they drew near Gravelin, they beat down Two Mills, imputing the late Loss of the Flemmings to their Situation; and though Philip himself dissuaded them from such an inglorious Attempt, yet they would not desist. Being passed the Waters of Gravilin, and come into the English Territories, the Duke thinking it not convenient to leave any Thing behind him that was held by his Enemy, besieged the small Castle of Oye, which had but Fifty Soldiers in it. These defended that Fort very courageously, till twelve of the Chief being slain, the rest yielded themselves up to the Dukes Mercy, but found little or none; for he giving the Castles and Captives to the People of Gant, who were the greatest part

The residue of the Captives were condemn'd to Death; but the Duke being offended at their Cruelty in slaying the former, sav'd their Lives by much Intercession. Within the Prospect of Callis stood another Castle, held by the English, call'd the Castle of St. Mark, of greater Strength than the former, containing a Garrison of 200 Soldiers, under the Command of Sir John Gedding their Captain, who made a bolder Resistance than the Governour of Oye was capable to do, and slew many of the Duke's Forces. But was at last over-power'd, and despairing of Relief from the People of Callis, to whom he had in vain given Signs of the bad Condition of his Garrison, by ringing their Bells, and hanging out Colours, (for tho' they would, they could not do it) he resign'd upon Condition, That his and his Men's Lives should be sav'd; and so being made Prisoners of War, they were sent to Gaunt to be kept for an Exchange, if any of them should happen to be taken. The Way to Callis being thus clear'd, the Duke of Burgundy accompany'd with the Duke of Cleves, the Earl of Estamps, the Lords of Dantoing, Croy, Crisquie, Humières, and many others of Note, laid Siege to the Town on July the 19th, as was most to his Advantage, and at his first coming caused three Assaults to be made, but with so much Loss, that he was forced to draw off his Forces further from it. The English entertained them with continual Sallies, and in most of them were Victorious. The Duke of Burgundy was not much dishearten'd at these first Successes of the Enemy, but he look'd upon them as flashes of Courage, which by length of Time, and the Straights of a Siege would much abate; and therefore in the mean time he was careful to block up the Haven, that no Supplies of Men or Victuals should come to the Besieged out of England, which to his great Grief he had hitherto seen done, because the Fleet from Holland and Zealand was not come up, as he had appointed and expected, and to that end he caused Four great Hulks, fill'd with great square Stones cemented together with Lead, to be sunk in the Haven at High-Tide, but with no Damage to the Harbour as it happen'd. He also diligently survey'd the Walls of the Town and the Castle, that when occasion offer'd, they might repeat their Assaults with better Success. But the Besieged were on the other side as watchful of all Advantages; and seeing the Duke observing their Town shot at him, kill'd his Trumpeter, and three Horses of such Persons as were next him.

While the Army lay before Callis the Lord de Croy was sent with a good Party to besiege the Castle and Town of Guisnes, of which he soon took the latter, but was kept so long in the Siege of the former, that he was forced to quit what he had gotten and leave them. In the mean time the Duke of Gloucester, who knowing the Importance of the Town of Callis to the English in France, was resolv'd to raise the Siege, sent over his Herald, call'd Pembroke to tell the Duke of Burgundy, That the Protector of England, his Master (if God favoured him with Wind and Weather) intended with all convenient Speed to pass over to him and give him Battel, either before Callis, or in any other Place in his own Country which he should appoint, and if he refused would seek him where he could find him. The Duke of Burgundy answer'd the Herald, Tell your Master, that his Challenge is both Honourable and Reasonable, and that I will save him the Pains to seek me, for (God willing) I will not leave the Town till I have my Will of it, and if he comes here he shall find me ready to encounter him with all the Forces he can bring. After the Duke of Burgundy had given the Herald his Answer, he took him to his Tent, and having feasted him plentifully gave him a Silver Cup, and an Hundred Pieces of Gold, and so sent him back again. The Herald departed to Callis, and so home to the Duke of Gloucester, who was hastening with all speed to get an Army, and all other Things necessary for his intended Expedition.

The Duke of Burgundy also, as soon as the Herald was gone, call'd a Council in the chief Tent of the Gantois, and summon'd all the Flemish Commanders and Cavaliers to it, to whom having declared the substance of the Duke of Gloucester's Embassy and his Answer to it, he entreated them for his Honour's sake and their own, not to desert him, but stand by him, and defend themselves manfully upon this Occasion, which they all voluntarily and readily promised. This encourag'd the Duke so, that he forthwith sent into Picardy, Artois, and Henault to levy new Forces, and augment his Army to such a Proportion to the English Army (which he fear'd would be great) as they might be able to oppose them. But as the News of the Duke of Gloucester's coming begat Caution in the Burgundians, so it rais'd the Courage of the Belieged so much, that they made many brisk and fortunate Sallies; and among other Things wana Fort built by the Duke of Burgundy upon an Hill so near the Town, that they could see all the Transactions of the Belieged, and by that means much annoy'd them, which Loss damp'd the Besiegers Spirits, and made them despair of carrying the Town, especially since the Duke of Gloucester's Arrival was daily expected. In the midst of these Terrors and Fears the Duke of Gloucester had fortunately pass'd the Seas with 500 sail of Ships, and landed at Callis with a powerful Army on the Second Day of August, intending on the Day following to have issued out of the Town and gave the Duke of Burgundy Battel; but when that Day was come the Enemy was departed, the very News of his coming so affrighted the Flemings, that no Perswasions of their Prince could prevail with them to abide the Battel, and so they all departed and left the Siege the Night before to the great Grief of the Duke of Burgundy. Gloucester, when he brought forth his Army found some of their great Ordnance, which were too heavy for their Flight, with much Victuals and Ammunition; but thinking he might overtake them, he pursu'd them Eleven Days; but not being able to do it, he ravag'd part of the Duke of Burgundy's Country, and having burnt two Towns, Popering and Bell he return'd again to Callis. The Lord de Croy also at the Duke of Burgundy's Command left Guisnes, and the English repossessing themselves of the Town took some of their Baggage and Artillery, and among the rest a great Gun of Brass, call'd Dijon from the chief Town of Burgundy. And thus the Duke of Gloucester finish'd his Expedition, and return'd into England with Honour and Triumph.

In the Absence of the Duke of Gloucester, Scots and the former Discontents between the Scots and English broke out into open War. James, King of Scots, having married his Daughter to Lewis the Dauphin, gave great Suspicion to the

These Things incensed King James so much, that he sought Opportunity of Revenge, and in the Duke of Gloucester's Absence besieged Roxborough Castle with an Army of 30000 Men. Sir Ralph Gray, a Person of great Courage and Fidelity, commanded the Castle at that Time, and defended it for Twenty Days against so powerful an Army, which though he could not have withstood much longer, yet his holding it out so long prov'd the Cause of its Deliverance; for the King of Scots being advertised, that the Earl of Northumberland was coming with an Army to raise the Siege, but chiefly, his Queen being come into his Camp to give him Notice of a Conspiracy form'd against his Life, by certain Persons whose Names she could not at present find out, chose rather to release the Town, than lose his Kingdom and his own Life, by giving his Enemies Time and Opportunity in his Absence to bring their wicked Contrivances to Perfection, and so he left the Siege. But this Design, though seemingly prudential enough, prov'd fatal to him: For Walter, Earl of Athol, the King's Uncle, who was the Chief in the Conspiracy, being fearful of being discover'd by the Diligence of such as the King had employ'd to find him out, with his Associates, desperately put them forward to a more speedy Execution, which by the Help of one John a Frier Preacher of Pearth, into whose Monastery the King was fled for Safety, they effected; for by his Means the Porter being corrupted, and the King's Chamber being left unbarr'd, the Conspirators boldly and violently rush'd into the King's Presence, and giving him 28 Wounds, slew him. Three of the Chief of them, The Earl of Athol himself, Robert his Grandson, and Robert Grimes, were very severely punish'd for the Murther by the People, and his Son James the Second, a Child of about Seven Years old, was raised to his Throne in the Right of Succession.

Reg. 15.
Duke of Burgundy seeks a Neutrality.

After the disgraceful Departure of the Duke of Burgundy from Callis, the English, in all Parts of France, became very troublesome to him and his Subjects. At Bruges they rose in a tumultuous manner against him, and slew a Captain of his Guard, the Lord Lisle Adam himself very hardly escaping with his Life. These Dangers made him employ his Neighbouring Princes to solicit a Peace between him and the King of England, That he should remain a Neuter between England and France. The Perfidiousness of the Duke was an invincible Objection against their Petition; but an Expedient being found out, that the Dutchess should act for her Husband, and should be admitted to a Treaty for him, Commissioners were appointed on both Sides to meet at Gravelin, viz. The Dutchess of Burgundy, the Bishop of Arras, Lord Croy, and others for the Duke: And Henry, Cardinal of Winchester; John Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk; Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, and divers other Persons of Honour, for King Henry. After some Debates, a Truce was concluded between King Henry and the Dutchess of Burgundy, her Husband not being so much as named in it; but it lasted a little time, the Duke taking Liberty to break that Covenant, in which his Enemy would not have him tied; and so it only served a Turn, till he could better secure himself against the English Enmity.

On the 2d Day of January this Year died (m) Queen Catherine, the Wife of that renown'd Prince King Henry the Fifth, and Mother of this King Henry the Sixth, at Bermundsea in Surrey, and was, with all due Solemnity, buried at Westminster, in the midst of our Lady's Chappel, under a Marble-Tomb, by her Husband, where she rested, till King Henry the Seventh pull'd down the said Chappel, and erected that most sumptuous Pile of Buildings, which retains his Name to this Day. She had in her Life privately married a noble Welch Gentleman, of the Lineage of Cadwallader, the last of the Brittainish Kings, named Owen Tudor, or Theodore, a Person of rare Beauty and Parts, but of small Fortunes, and therefore accounted a very unequal Match for this Great Princess; yet it was wink'd at by the Dukes of Gloucester and Bedford. By him she had Three Sons, Edmund, Jasper and Owen; the last was a Monk at Westminster. Her Daughter by him died in her Infancy. After her Death, Owen was apprehended (n) and imprison'd, because that, contrary to an Act of Parliament made in the Sixth Year of this King's Reign, he had presumptuously married the Queen, without the King's special Assent. He escaped twice out of Prison, and let out others with him, but the Third time, it is said, he lost his Life. However, his Children which he had by the Queen sunk not by the Misfortune of their Father; for King Henry, either out of Respect to his Mother, or in Recompence for the too great Severity against his Father, soon after his Death, created Edmund Earl of Richmond, and Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, and married Edmund to Margaret, Daughter and sole Heiress to the Duke of Somerset, of whom he begot Henry, Earl of Richmond, who afterwards was King of England, by the Name of Henry the Seventh.

About the same Time, the Dutchess of Bedford, Sister to Lewis, Earl of St. Poll, as if of Queen Catherine's Example had taught her to marry for Affection rather than Honour, married a brisk young Knight, Sir Richard Woodville, afterwards created Lord, and Earl of Rivers, to the great Displeasure of her Brother, and Uncle, the Bishop of Turwin, whom she had not acquainted with it. By him she had many Children, both Sons and Daughters, and among them the Lady Elizabeth, who being married to King Edward the Fourth, was afterward Queen of England.

Whilst this Marriage was in the Celebration, Jane, the Wife of Henry the Fourth, and Daughter of Charles, King of Navarre, surnamed, The Wicked, died at Bermundsea in Surrey, and being carried to Canterbury, was there interr'd by her Husband King Henry. Some remarkable Accidents also happened about this time, viz. the furthest Gate upon London-Bridge next Southmark, with the Tower upon it, and Two Arches upon which it chiefly depended fell down suddenly, but did no Harm, all the Lions also in the Tower died.

In this Parliament, 1. A Remedy was provided against vexatious and troublesome Suits of such Persons as were not of the King's Household, in the Court of Stewards and Marshals in the King's House, and it was allow'd as an Exemption from their Jurisdiction to plead and aver, that they are not of the King's House.

2. An Allowance was given to all the Subjects of England to transport Corn of small Price out of the Realm, viz. Wheat at Six Shillings and Eight Pence, and Barley at Three Shillings and Four Pence the Quarter.

3. An Injunction to all Sheriffs, Bailiffs of Franchises and Coroners, that in Actions, or Writs of Attaint of Plea for Lands of the Yearly Value of Forty Pounds, they do not return nor impanel any Persons, but such as be inhabiting in his Bailiwick, and have an Estate to their own Use in Lands and Tenements, to the Yearly Value of Twenty Pounds or more, upon the Penalty of forfeiting Ten Pounds to the King, and Ten Pounds to the Plaintiffs in the said Action, or Writs of Attaint; and that no Person of less Sufficiency of Freehold than Twenty Pounds a Year shall be sworn in the King's Court upon any Issue in the said Actions, if he be for the same by the Plaintiffs in due Form challenged.

4. A Permission was given to all Persons, as well Religious as Secular, to appoint themselves General-Attornies to sue or plead for them in every Hundred and Wapentake. And,

5. A Prohibition was laid upon all Merchants to ship, or cause to be shipped, any Wool, Woolfells, or other Merchandizes belonging to the Staple, in any Place within this Realm, except at the Keys and Wharfs assigned by the Statute, where the King's Weights and Wools be set, excepting the Merchants of Genoa, Venice, Tuscany, Florence, Catalonia, and the Burghesses of Berwick. To this Parliament came the Bishop of Terwin and the Earl of Arminack out of France, but their Business was not known, and if important, was soon dispatch'd, and the Parliament soon after dissolved.

Harflure believed by the English.

In the late Insurrection in Normandy, the English had lost Harflure, a Town of great Consequence for the Preservation of that Province, which being found to be extremely inconvenient in the Enemies Hands, they resolved upon the Recovery of it. The Duke of Somerset, attended with the Lords Falconbridge and Talbot, were sent with a strong Force to besiege it. The Captain of the Town was Sir John D'Estauteville, and the Garrison was 600 strong. The English at their first Approach were sensible, that they should meet with a strong Opposition, as well from the Besieged as the French King's Party, whose Interest it was to preserve the Town, as much as the English to gain it; and therefore they strongly intrenched themselves before the Town, and then began to batter the Walls, that they might gain an Entrance into it, but were so valiantly opposed and repulsed, that tho' the Town suffered much Damage, it held out, and kept them from an Assault. The French King in the mean Time was very desirous to relieve it, and to that End sent the Earls of Ew and Dunois, the Valiant Bastard of Bourbon, and the Lord Gaucourt, with an Army of 4000 Men to raise the Siege; but when they came, they found their Enemies so strongly entrenched, that they could molest them very little by all the Means they could devise, and so saw it next to impossible to do their Friends within the Town any good, whereupon they fearing lest their Delays might prove dangerous to themselves, left the Town to its own Defence and the Enemy's Mercy: The Governour seeing it past all Hopes of being saved, thought it better to surrender the Town upon some honourable Terms, than hazard all to no Purpose, and therefore capitulated for the Lives of himself and Soldiers, and left the Place in the Hands of the English, who joyfully received it, as their desired Prey. The Duke of Somerset committed it to the keeping of Thomas Pawlet, Christopher Barber, William Limerick and George St. George, who manfully defended the Town and Haven many Years. The Lord Talbot, after the Taking of Harflure, was left Captain of the Army to carry the Victory on, as his Courage should lead him, who thereupon besieged Tankerville, which he took in Four Months, being delivered up to his Discretion, and soon after Beauchastan and Maleville, which following the Example of Tankerville, yielded without Blows. But the English by all these Victories were no Gainers, for Charles, the French King, passing over the River Loire, besieged the strong Town of Monstreau Fault Tonne, of which Captain Thomas Gerard was Commander, who forgetting his Honour and Trust, sold it to the French King for a Sum of Money, as was afterwards discovered. The French that were in it, were all hanged for their Treason to him, and the English at the Dauphin's Request set at Liberty. After the Taking this Town, some smaller Garrisons, as Chasteau, Landone, Charmi and Nemours, yielded to him without Resistance, and then passing on, he took his Way to Paris, where having not been since it returned to his Obedience, he made his Entry with Solemnity, and loud Acclamations. The English, tho' not unconcern'd at these Losses, were under no possibility of Regaining them thro' the Change of the Regency, which unfortunately happen'd in this Juncture, otherwise Monstreau had not been so easily parted withal. The Duke of York, who had held the Place with great Applause, tho' he was never personally present at any Battel or Siege, unless at that of Fescamp, was displaced, and the Earl of Warwick put into his Room, a Person every ways qualified for so great a Charge, but being detained Seven Weeks by cross Winds from arriving in France, they wanted a Power in York to oppose the Current; and so the French King carried on his Victories without Controul. At the sametime Arthur of Brittain, Constable of France, John, Duke of Alençon, and La Hire, with a great Army, made divers Attempts in Normandy, first upon the Town of Auranches, and then upon the City of Roan, but fail'd in both by the Courage and Diligence of the Lord Talbot, Lord Scales and Sir Tho. Kiriell, who set upon the French suddenly, and routed them at a Town called Riz, not far from Roan, killing above 200, and taking a great Number Captives, among which were the Lord of Fountains, Sir Aleine Geronne, Sir Lewis Balle, and Sixty Knights and Esquires, by which Normandy was preserved to the English.

The Earl of Warwick, Richard Beauchamp, who had been endeavouring a Passage into France for several Weeks before, and in order thereto had Seven times taken Ship, but was asoften driven back again, at length arrived at Honflue, Nov. 6. with a Thousand fresh Soldiers, and from thence went to Roan, where the Duke of

This new Deputy was no sooner in his Place, but he was forced upon Action; for Florimand de Brimau, Bailiff of Ponthieu, having private Advertisement, that Crotoi, an English Garrison, was in great Want of Victuals, and could not hold out, if suddenly besieged and begirt round, gave Notice of it to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, who immediately sent an Army of above 10000 Men, with Guns and other Materials, under the Command of Messieurs D'Archi, Crovi, Kenti, Faques de Brimeau, and others, to lay close Siege round it. The Garrison, who fear'd nothing but Hunger, seeing their Danger, began to provide against it, and finding the Sea open, sent out a Ship immediately, which by its nimble Sail in a Day or two supplied them with Plenty of Provision. The Duke of Burgundy saw his Error too late, and endeavour'd to prevent it, by sending Four Ships to lie at the Mouth of the Haven; but the Inhabitants of Crotoi would not endure this Blockade, and sending Six Ships out, routed them, and kept the Sea open for their continual Relief. By this means they were in no Fear of Want of Victuals, but could hold out till Aid should come. The Earl of Warwick had News soon of this Attempt, and immediately dispatch'd the Lords Talbot and Falconbridge, Sir Tho. Kiriell, and divers other Knights and Esquires, with an Army of 5000 Men, to raise the Siege, who were also so zealous to deliver the Town, that they all waded thro' the River, some up to the Chin, to get the nearest Way to it, resolving either to drive the Enemy from it, or die in the Quarrel. The Duke of Burgundy, who lay with his Forces beside the City, had News of the Approaching of the Lord Talbot, with all his Power, and thereupon drew off his Forces, as if he would have confronted his Army and fought them; but when they came nigh one another, the Duke and his Forces retreated to Abville, and left the Town; but being unwilling to lose the Bastile, which he had lately built to annoy it, he left 400 Men to keep it. The Lord Talbot kept on his Way, and came to Crotoi, but not finding the Duke of Burgundy's Army there, he assaulted the Bastile, and took it, all the Men being either slain, or made Prisoners. Then he sent Messengers after the Duke of Burgundy to challenge him to a Battel, threatening, that if he refused, he would destroy all his Country of Picardy with Fire and Sword; but the Duke, stricken with a Panick Fear, fled the faster from him, and passing by Aniens, lodged himself and his Army at Arras. The Lord Talbot, enraged at this Cowardize, staid Twenty Days in Picardy, burning Towns, slaying the People, and taking what Spoil and Prisoners he could, and so return'd to the Earl of Warwick, who highly extoll'd his Courage and Conduct.

A. D. 1438. An Obit for the Emperor Sigismund.

One John Gardiner burnt for Heresie.

About Christmas, in this Year, King Henry caused a solemn Obit to be celebrated in St. Paul's Church in London, for that eminent and wise Prince Sigismund, the Emperor of Germany, who died a little before, and left the Empire to Albert, who had marry'd the only Daughter of the said Sigismund.

On Easter-Day, one John Gardiner, a Person that favoured the Doctrines of Wickliff, but yet conformed outwardly to the Romish Ceremonies, either out of Fear or Interest, was discovered to convey the Sacramental Bread from his Mouth, after he had received it from the Priest's Hands, in a foul Cloth, in St. Mary Ax's Church in London. This Fact was observed with Abhorrence by all his fellow Communicants, and he being examined, was found to be an obstinate Heretick, and was burnt in Smithfield, May 14. for his Crime.

In the Spring of this Year, Henry, Earl of Mortaigne, Son to Edmund, Duke of Somerset, sail'd out of England with 400 Archers, and 300 Spears, and landed at Cherbourg in Normandy, and passing through the Country of Main, he besieged and took the Castle of St. Anian, putting the Scotch Garrison of 300 Men to the Sword, and hanging up all the French Men he found in it, because they had formerly taken an Oath of Fidelity to King Henry, and had falsified it. The Lord Talbot also, about the same Time, gat several other Places more thro' the Terror of his Name, than by his Sword; for Longaville, Carles, Mammille, and many other Towns, yielded themselves to him without any Resistance. The Earl of Mortaigne further advanced his Success, and took the Castle of Algerche, and the Lord Camewis in an Ambush, who came to the Relief of it; but the English were not the only Gainers, what they got in one Place, they lost in Another; for Montarges, and Cherosie submitted themselves to King Charles, and the Burgeses of Meaux and St. Susan, in the Country of Brie, sold and delivered those Towns up to the French for Money; so that what Courage and Diligence got on the English Side, Treachery lost them, for tho' they could subdue the French, they could never make them faithful, seldom continuing in Obedience longer than they were kept in Fear by the Sword, or other Force.

The Unseasonableness of the Harvest this Year, which was full of raging Winds and excessive Rains, caused such a great Scarcity of Corn in England and France, that Wheat began at this time to be sold at 2s. 6d. per Bushel, and Malt at 18d. and before the Year passed, increased so much in the Price, that the Poor underwent great Hardships, and were forced to make their Bread of Vetches, and Pease, and Beans, coarse Grains, with which before they usually fed their Beasts and Poultry; and in some Parts of the Nation they were so pressed with Want of these courser Grains, that they made Bread of Fern-Roots and Ivy-Berries. In the City of London, the Dearth was not so great as in the Country, thro' the Care and Vigilance of Stephen Brown, then Mayor, who seeing the great Danger the City was in, of suffering Famine, sent several Ships into Prussia for Ry, which brought such Quantities of that Grain into the City, that there was a Sufficiency of Bread with the poorest. Divers other lamentable Accidents attended this publick Calamity. On Nov. 25. there was such a terrible Wind, that it did much Harm in many Places of the Nation, and particularly at London; it blew off the Leads of the Grey-Friers Church, and almost beat down a whole Side of a Street, called the Old Exchange; so that the Inhabitants were forced to underprop it with great Studs to keep it from falling. On New-Years-Day a great Stack of Wood fell down at Bainard's Castle, and killed Three Men, many more being bruised and wounded dangerously: At Bedford also, upon the Day of the Assizes, there were Eighteen Persons killed, and several more hurt, by the Fall of a Pair of Stairs. With these unlucky Events happen'd the Death of that useful and charitable Citizen Sir Robert Chicheley, Grocer,

The Duke of Burgundy, who, after his shameful Retreat from Crécy, studied how to revenge himself upon the English, and recover his lost Reputation, now sent many Wood-Cleavers, Smiths and Pioneers, under the Conduct of 1600 Soldiers, to cut down the Sea-Banks about Calis, believing that by that means he should drown the Town, and all the bordering Country; but the Event answered not Expectation, whereupon they turn'd to Pont de Millay, and pretended to lay Siege to it, but soon drew off their Forces, and return'd Home, seeking rather to find themselves some fair Excuse, than effect any thing. But tho' this Stratagem prov'd very foolish, the French had other Engines, which did them greater Service, and got them many Towns about this Time, which were, their Preferments and Money, large Promises and great Sums. These Things prov'd so prevalent, as well with the English as French, in the English Garrisons, that no Place could withstand them. Indeed, the French wanted Money, 'tis plain, in the Camp, inasmuch, that they spent their Time in plundering one another; but yet since Money made way so easily to King Charles's Design in regaining his Country, he chose rather to want himself, than his Enemies should. This Piece of Policy the English hardly knew how to prevent; but it being related to the Council of England, they sent over the Earl of Huntington in June, with 2000 Archers, and 400 Spear-men, as a Supply to the Garrisons, and a fresh Recruit to the Army. At his Coming he found the Earl of Dunois near Tholouse, where, partly by Rewards, and partly by fair Promises, he had won several Cities in Guien, besides those which Rodrigo de Vellandras had recover'd by like Policy, to atone for his late Disobedience to his Master's Command to attend him. The Earl seeing this, put in fresh Garrisons in many of the Towns, yet in the English Hands, out of his own Forces, which he had brought out of England, and removed the old Garrisons to other Towns, where they were not acquainted. He displaced also the old Magistrates, and put in new ones, and so secured several of the remaining Towns, most of which had an itching Desire to be fingering the French Money, and would have probably revolted to them, had not this Earl's Coming and prudent Management prevented it. Nor had the same Methods a worse Success in Normandy, whither Sir Richard Woodville, Sir William Chamberlain and Sir William Peito were sent, with a Thousand Men, upon the like Errand, who kept the wavering Towns by so doing, tho' they recover'd not what had revolted till the Divisions among the French gave them this Opportunity.

The English remove their Garrisons to prevent Bribery.

Lewis the Dauphin rebels against his Father.

Lewis the Dauphin, a Prince of a very ambitious Spirit, young and hardy, being now arrived at the Sixteenth Year of his Age, and married, grew impatient to be under the Government of a Father, and reach'd at some Authority that might make him look like the Son of a King, which his Father, who was very suspicious and jealous, being even from his Childhood exercised with the Persecutions of his Mother, and the Enmity of the English and Burgundians, observing, treated him with a little more Severity than usual, and kept him to a shorter Allowance, which much discontented him. The Nobles, who were not well pleased with King Charles's Carriage to them, because he had always put most Confidence in the People, as being less able to hurt and damage him, laid hold of this Opportunity of incensing the Dauphin against his Father, thereby to raise themselves into greater Places and Trust under him, if they should prevail, and under his Father, if they came to an Agreement. The Chief of the Nobles, who were most active to stir up this Dissention, were the Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, the Counts of Vendosme, Chabanes, Chamont, Boveant and Prie. These told him, That tho' his Duty to his Father was a great Obligation to Obedience and Submission, yet since the Welfare of the Publick was the main Thing he ought to respect, as a Prince, the former ought not to tie him up from the Use of any proper Means to secure the latter: That 'tis evident his Father had been guilty of many Faults in his Government, as the Murther of the Duke of Burgundy, Contempt of his Nobles, and the like, which ought to be redress'd, and by none so fitly as himself, who was the next Person to the Crown: That those who were at present in greatest Authority about the King, perswaded him daily to a Peace, which could not be effected, but with a great Loss of his own Patrimony: That he had excluded them from his Favour and Trust merely that he might Tyrannize the more securely over the Kingdom, and keep the Dauphin under: That the King his Father had placed him at Loches, a remote and private Part of his Kingdom, that being far from the Court, and ignorant of Affairs, he might be led by them, who ruled as they list, contrary to his and the Kingdom's Interests: That a Resolution to redress these Things could not be interpreted in him Disobedience, but a noble Attempt to preserve the whole State, as well his Father and himself, as his Subjects. The Dauphin being of a contumacious Disposition, presently yielded to these Reasons, and told them, That he was ready to do whatever his Quality obliged him to, and if they would join their Power with his, would not be wanting to himself nor them. The Lords having thus obtain'd their desired Ends, take the Dauphin with them, and began to raise what Forces they could to oppose the King, resolving never to lay down their Arms, till Disorders were reform'd, the Authority of the Princes established, and Men of Merit and Worth brought into Favour. The Lords endeavour'd all they could to bring the Duke of Burgundy over to their Party, but he not only denied them, but advised them to desist from their Enterprize, which was unjust, dangerous and groundless. Then they sent Men into the several Provinces of the Kingdom to gather up a Strength out of the Commons, but these also gave them no Encouragements, telling the Messenger, That tho' they loved the Dauphin well, and were willing to serve him, yet they would not do it against his Father, nor in the Face of a common Enemy, who would make use of this Division for the Destruction of all of them. These Disappointments were unexpected, but yet the Nobles having gone too far in their Design to retreat honourably, proceeded as well as they could, and the Duke of Alençon seiz'd on the Town of Noyard, and John de la Rothe on St. Maxence. The Counts of Chamont, Boucignault and Prie headed a great Number of Volunteers, Freebooters and such Rabble; Vol. I. D d d and

A. D. 1439. Reg. 17. and the Duke of Bourbon with a good Force had the Command and Guard of the Dauphin's Person. The News of this Insurrection of his Son, which was as Unreasonable as Undutiful was very ungrateful to King Charles; but knowing it the greatest Wisdom to crush such Attempts in the Birth, he immediately sent a Messenger to the Duke of Bourbon to deliver up his Son, and to the Duke of Alençon to surrender his Towns of Noyard and Maxence, and both of them to come to him to give a Reason of their taking Arms; but they made some Excuses, which tho' they did not amount to Denials, yet apparently discover'd their Designs to delay both. The King seeing their Obstinacy resolv'd to crush them by Force, and so march'd against them toward Maxence and Noyard, which immediately submitted to the King all but the Castle, which was besieged and taken by the King's Forces and the Commanders hang'd. The other Towns that follow'd the Dauphin's Party, came into the King, and left the Lords destitute of all Assistance, insomuch that they were forced to humble themselves to him, who sent the Earl of Eu to offer them Terms of Reconciliation, and so they met the King at Clermont, and after begging Forgiveness they were reconcil'd and all pardon'd, except Trimouille, Chaumont and Pry: The Dauphin stood much upon their Pardon at first, and told his Father, That he would not accept of his own, unless they had theirs, because he had engaged his Word and Honour for their Safety; but when King Charles said briskly to his Son, That he had free leave to depart, he valued not his Enmity, he should find enough to defend his Right, Lewis submitted to his Pleasure, and the three Lords were left out: And so all Things were accorded between King Charles and his Son: But while this Disturbance lasted which was almost all this Summer, the English had a good Opportunity of recovering their Losses, which they so well made use of, that they regain'd the greatest part of them, and were preparing to attempt Paris it self, but the unexpected Agreement of the French King and his Son put an End to those Designs, and confin'd their Thoughts to preserve what they had gotten, rather than win more.

Grecians subscribe to the Romish Doctrines at Florence. While France was thus busied in composing Things, another Difference tho' not of like Nature seem'd to be adjusted; for Pope Eugenius at the Council of Florence perswaded the Emperour and Patriarch of Constantinople, with the rest of the Grecians there present to receive and subscribe to the Doctrines of the Church of Rome concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, receiving the Sacrament of the Body of Christ in unleaven'd Bread, Purgatory and the Supremacy of the Bishop of Rome. But this Act of theirs was so highly Offensive to the Grecian-Churches when they heard of it, that they publickly declared their Dissent to this Subscription, and with a publick Execration condemn'd all the Legates that had assented to them, and would not permit them to be buried with Christian Burial.

Reg. 18. In November this Year began a Frost, which held with such Violence, that it froze all Ditches so hard, that they were passable, and being follow'd with a deep Snow made them almost indiscernible from the Ground. This Weather put the English upon a Stratagem to recover Pontoise by Surprise, which the French King had lately got from them by Money, because the chief Strength of the Place lying in the deep Ditches about it, the Frost had made them Unserviceable; they therefore covering their Armour with their White Shirts, and their Head-pieces with White Caps, passed over the Ice undiscover'd by Night, and Scaling the Walls flew the Watch sleeping, and took the Town with many Prisoners of Worth and great Spoil, to the great Dissatisfaction of the People of Paris, who were much damag'd by the Loss of it. The Two Captains of the Town and Castle, John de Villers, and one Narabon a Burgundian Knight escaped, tho' hardly, but the treacherous Burgeses fell into their Hands, and suffer'd their deserv'd Punishment. John, Lord Clifford was the Leader of the English in this brave Attempt, and being Master of the Town was made the Governour of it, to defend it with the same Valour he had taken it.

On the Morrow after St. Martin, November the 12th the King summon'd his Parliament to meet at Westminster, where several Things of great Benefit to the Nation were enacted.

1. That Cheese and Butter may be carry'd out of the Kingdom without License.

2. That Merchants Strangers shall not sell their Merchandizes one to another in England, but that every such Merchant shall have an Host or Surveyor appointed him at his Landing by the chief Officer of the Town or Place where he shall land, who shall keep a Register of all he buys and sells, and take Two Pence in the Pound of him for all Merchandize by him bought or sold, and the said Merchants shall sell and buy all within eight Months.

3. That all Persons made Justices of the Peace shall have Lands or Tenements to the Value of twenty Pound a Year, except in Cities and Corporations.

4. That no Captain shall detain the Wages of the common Soldiers, except it be for their Clothing.

5. That every Person mustering and receiving the King's Wages, who shall depart from their Captains and the King's Service, without apparent License granted them by the said Captains, shall be punish'd as Felons: With some others of less Importance.

It seems, that the King had by this Parliament a Fifteenth or a Disme granted him for the Necessity of the State, because there is an Act made for the regular Collections of Fifteens and Dismes within the Cities and Boroughs of this Realm; and besides it was enacted, That every Householder that is an Alien shall pay the King thirteen Pence a Year, and every Servant Alien six Pence.

Soon after the taking of Pontoise by the English the Earl of Warwick Regent of France fell sick, and in April following dy'd in the Castle of Roan in Normandy. His Corps was kept there till October following, when it was carry'd over into England, and honourably interred in his College of our Lady Church at Warwick, built by his Noble Ancestors, in a fair and sumptuous Tomb. He left only two Children, Henry, who after him was Duke of Warwick, and Ann, who was marry'd to Richard Nevill, Earl of Salisbury. Henry lived some Years, but dying without Issue, his Honour descended to his Sister, in whose Right the Earl of Salisbury became Earl of Warwick. The Duke of York, Richard Plantagenet succeeded him in his Government in France, being made Deputy there a second Time. He was more speedy in going over into France this Time than before; for being accompany'd with the Earl of Oxford, Lord Bourchier, call'd Earl of Eu, Sir James Ormond, the Lord Clinton, and divers other Noblemen passed into Normandy in a few Weeks after

A. D. 1440. after the Earl of Warwick's Death. His Arrival was as seasonable as it was speedy. The Reg. 18. French had made use of this Interval in the Government to fall upon the English Conquests in France; for the Parisians, to whom the Loss of Pontoise was very inconvenient, raised a great Sum of Money to enable King Charles to besiege it, and endeavour the Recovery of it, which he accordingly did, carrying along with him 1200 Old Soldiers, and the greatest part of the Nobles and Princes of France with a great Army. The French began the Siege with great Fury, encompassing the Town with Bastiles, Trenches and Ditches, battering its Walls with their great Ordnance, and giving it many fierce Assaults. The Lord Clifford who was Captain of it defended it with so much Valour, that the French Men rather lost than won, tho' it was impossible he could hold out long against so great an Army without Succour. The Duke of York immediately upon his Landing receiv'd the News of the Condition of Pontoise, and sent to the Lord Talbot to come to him, and bring all the Forces he could get together for the Relief of it. Talbot was as zealous to obey, as the Duke was to command; and having assembled a strong Body of Men to join the Duke, they marched to Pontoise and challenged the French King to come out of his Trenches to give them Battel. Charles by the Advice of his Council refused it, and thought himself secure from any Attempts of the English, because the River Oise was between them; but the Duke of York, who came provided with Boats, Cordage, Timber, and Planks, by the Use of them gained a Passage over the River, and resolv'd to attack King Charles in his Trenches. The News of this being carry'd to the French King surpriz'd him with Wonder and Fear at once, and that he might escape the Danger, he raised his Camp that Night and withdrew to Poisy, leaving the Lord Cotignie with 3000 Men to defend the Bastile. The Duke of York and the English Army were not sensible of the French King's Retreat, so marching up in Order towards the Camp found no Enemy, but only their Tents and heavy Baggage, which they seiz'd on as Prey. The Duke then entred the Town, and having repaired the Walls and stored it with Victuals, put in Sir Gervais Clifton and Sir Nicholas Burdet with a Garrison of 1000 Soldiers, and went to offer the French King Battel at Poisy; but not being able to draw him into the Field, he after some small Skirmishes dislodged his Army and return'd to Roan.

About the Time that Richard, Duke of York, went to his Government in France, viz. on June the 17th, a certain Priest named Richard Wiche, Minister of Hermetworth in Essex, who had been before convicted of Heresie and abjured, was found guilty of a Relapse, and being degraded from his Priestly Dignity was burnt as an incorrigible Heretick on Tower-hill. Before his Death he had foretold, That the Postern-gate of the Tower should sink into the Ground, which accordingly coming to pass upon the 18th Day of July following, when the said Gate sunk in the Night more than seven Foot into the Earth, it added so much to the Opinion, that many had of him, after his Death, that he was a good Man, and burnt out of Malice, that many Men and Women went by Night to the Place where he was murther'd, and offer'd many Images of Wax and other Things according to the Superstition of those Times, making their Prayers to him, kissing the Ground where he suffer'd, and carrying away the Ashes of his Body as a sacred Relique. This blind Devotion being observed by the Vicar of Barking, in whose Parish this Burning happen'd, he to increase their superstitious Adoration mingled Spices with the Dust of the Body and Ashes, that they might believe the Fragrancy to proceed from the Holiness of the Sufferer, which so deceived the People, that they raised a great heap of Stones in the Place, and erected a Cross, and many went on Pilgrimage to it to the great enriching of the Vicar of Barking, who received the Offerings of the People. The Churchmen, who were much blam'd for putting to Death so holy a Man, were much offended at this Action of the People, and made their Complaints to the King, that it was a great Slander to the Church to have Worship paid to him; whereupon the King put out a * Proclamation to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, commanding them to hinder and forbid all Persons resorting to the Place of the Execution of the said Richard Wiche under Colour of Pilgrimage, or any other pretence of Devotion or worshipping him publickly or privately as a Saint, under the Pain of being taken and reputed for Hereticks and punish'd as such. Upon this Order from the King and his Council, the Mayor and Aldermen of London set armed Men about the Place where he was burnt, to restrain the People from coming, who apprehending some (among whom was the Vicar of Barking) and committing them to Prison, so deterred all others, that in a short Time they left off their Pilgrimages and Devotion to him, which appear'd the more ridiculous to all, because the Vicar of Barking confessed the Delusion, That for his own Gain he had put upon them.

When the Regent and the Lord Talbot were return'd into Normandy, Charles the French King seeing that he had extreamly suffer'd in his Reputation, especially among the Parisians for leaving Pontoise in the Hands of the Enemy, again assembled his Army, and return'd to it, resolv'd either to take it or dy in the Enterprize. He divided his Forces into Three Parts, of which Two were under the Command of himself and the Dauphin his Son, and assaulted the Town in eight Places: By the first Assault he got the Church, and soon after the whole Town, but with so great Loss of his Men, that it could be reckon'd little or no Gain; for the English resolving to die with their Swords in their Hands were most of them slain, but sold their Lives very dearly, for they slew above 3000 French. The Commander of the Town Sir Gervais Clifton was taken Prisoner, and some few of the Soldiers who were sent to the Castle of Corbyle, but Sir Nicholas Burdet was slain. Corbeil, Melune and Eureux were soon after taken by the French; it being usual for the smaller Towns to follow the Fate of a Chief Garrison.

The English Prisoners in Corbeil-Castle being impatient under their Restraint, racked their Invention to find out Ways for their Deliverance; and because they thought Interest would be the most tempting Argument, they petition'd the Captain that one of them might be set at Liberty to go among their rich Friends and solicit them to pay a Ransom for them. The Captain easily consented to the Proposal, and released one of them instantly; but he according to their Agreement went to the Governour of the next English Garrison, who was an Arragonian, placed there by the Duke of York, and told him, That the Castle of Corbyle was slenderly Mann'd, and might with no great

A. D. 1440. Force he won. The Governour gladly embraced the Discovery; and having placed an Ambush in the Night, sent four Men the next Morning with Sacks full of Fruit to the Castle to sell them to the French. These Men speaking French were not suspected of any Design, but let in to sell their Fruits, the Gates being carelessly left open in the mean time. These Soldiers gave Notice to the Ambush by a Sign already agreed on, and they immediately forcing themselves an Entrance easily got the Castle into their Power, the Captain and many of the Soldiers not being out of their Beds. The English Prisoners they set free, and the French they carried Prisoners to Roan, taking all the Spoil of the Castle to themselves, and leaving enow to secure it till an English Garrison could be put in.

A. D. 1441. Notwithstanding the former Warlike Enterprises on both sides, there were some Overtures of Peace made, and at length accepted, for all Parties were almost weary of the War. Some Propositions as to Time and Place had been made the last Year, which being agreed upon to be at Calis (for the English would not consent to any other Place.) In the Beginning of this Spring Deputies met there on both Sides. For King Henry appeared, the Cardinals of York and Winchester, the Duke of Exeter (o) and several other Noble Personages, bringing with them Charles, Duke of Orleans, who had been twenty five Years a Prisoner in England, that he might be a means to settle a Peace, and procure his own Deliverance. The French King sent the Archbishop of Rheims and Narbonne, and the Earl of Dunois, a Bastard of Orleans, and the Duke of Burgundy, the Lord de Crevecoeur, and some others. Many Days were spent in finding out means for an Accommodation, and divers Proposals made. The English were to be satisfied chiefly, but their Demands were thought so unreasonable as they could in no wise be granted. Three Things they chiefly insisted upon, viz.

I. That they should hold the two Dutchie of Aquitain and Normandy discharg'd of all Superiority and Sovereignty from the Realm of France, and the Governours of the same.

II. That they should be restored to all the Towns, Cities and Places, which they within thirty Years last past had conquer'd, or otherwise taken in any part of the Realm of France.

III. That in whatever part of France the said Towns lay, they should hold them without any Dependency upon the King of France.

The First of these was easily granted by the French Commissioners, but the other Two were so unreasonable, that it was impossible they should accord to them, because King Charles was resolv'd to restore nothing that he had recover'd from the English, nor would quit that Sovereign Power over any part of France, that his Predecessors had without any Interruption long enjoy'd, so that nothing was concluded: Yet this Meeting broke up very civilly with Promises, that they would certify their Masters on both Sides, and try what might be done at a Second Meeting, which they then appointed in the same Place. After these Matters of publick Concern were ended, the Freedom of the Duke of Orleans was next treated on, and it was agreed, That he should be released from his Captivity for 400000 Crowns; released.

but because the Money was not ready, and the English would not depend upon Promises, he was still kept Prisoner till the Money could be provided. The Reasons why the English detain'd him so long a Prisoner was partly to oblige the Duke of Burgundy, and partly to weaken the French King's Interests, but now the Duke had revolted from England, it was thought a greater Advantage to release him (especially for a good Ransom which might supply the Wants of the State in some Measure) than to keep him, because the Enmity, which he had to the Duke of Burgundy, might do greater Service to the English Affairs. This Reason mov'd the English to offer his Redemption. The Duke of Burgundy was not insensible of the Consequences of the Duke of Orleans's Freedom, which certainly would produce bad Effects to him if not timely prevented. He saw his Friends active to get his Release, and could not think 'twould be long ere it would be effected. Wherefore that he might lay an Obligation upon him to forget all Grudges, he shew'd a great Zeal for him; and having obtain'd a Promise of him to marry the Lady Mary, Daughter of Adolph, Duke of Cleve, he himself paid down the whole Sum for his Ransom, and so he was deliver'd, and a perfect Amity concluded by the Marriage between 'em, tho' it did not last long, as the History of the following Times will shew.

How much Greatness exposes to Malice and Envy, now began to appear in the Case of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, who tho' a wise and cautious Prince, yet could not escape the Malice of those who sought his Ruin. They began with his Lady first, and having apprehended her with four Persons, whom they call'd her Accomplices and Confederates, viz. Tho. Southwell, Canon of St. Steven's Church in Winchester, John Hume, Chaplain to the Dutcheffs, Roger Only, alias Bullingbrooke a Priest, a Man very expert in the Art of Necromancy, and Margery Gourdain, commonly call'd the Witch of Eye, near Winchester, charg'd her with High-Treason; For that she the said Eleanor, Lady Cobham, Dutcheff of Gloucester to bring her Husband to the Crown, had procured and contrived with the said Persons to make an Image of Wax like unto the King; which Image they dealt so with by their devilish Incantations and Sorceries, that as the Image consumed by little and little, the King's Person should so daily decay, till he was brought to his End. Roger Bullingbrooke being examin'd before the King's Council own'd, That he had by the Procurement of the said Dutcheffs wrought by Necromancy to know what should befall her, and to what Estate she should come; and Margery Gourdain confessed, That she had prescribed some Love-Potions for the said Lady to make the Duke of Gloucester love her, which also the Dutcheffs her self did not deny, but she deny'd the Treason which was laid to their Charge, and for which they were all condemned, though only Roger Bullingbrooke was hang'd drawn and quarter'd, and Margery burnt: The said Roger at his Death affirming his Innocency to the last. The Dutcheffs only did Penance by walking through Fleet-street Hoodless with a Taper in her Hand of two Pound Weight, which she offer'd at the High-Altar in St. Paul's Church, and then was sent to the Castle of Cherster, where she remain'd a Prisoner under Sir Thomas Stanley all her Life. Mr. Fox endeavours to shew, that the Dutcheffs was thus accu-

Reg. 19. In the Beginning of this Twentieth Year of the King, Richard, Duke of York Regent of France and Governour of Normandy, as if he thought to compleat the Conquest of France, determin'd to invade the Enemy's Country by sundry Armies, and in sundry Places, and thereupon without Delay sent the Lord Willoughby to ravage and destroy the Country of Amiens, John, Lord Talbot to besiege the Town of Dei, and the Regent himself accompany'd with Edmund, Duke of Somerset went into the Dutchy of Anjou. The Lord Willoughby according to his Commission suddenly entred the Enemy's Country, and took many Prisoners before they could get into any Place of Defence. The French in the adjoining Garrisons being amaz'd with the Cries of the People sally'd out in good Order, and courageously fought with the English for their Relief, but being over-power'd by the English, who slew them without Mercy, they gave Ground and retreated into their Towns, leaving their Country to be pillag'd by the Enemy, and the Forces of the Earl of St. Paul, who came into their Aid just upon the Flight of the French. In this Conflict the English slew about 600, and took a great Number of Prisoners, with which they retreated into Normandy. In the mean time the Dukes of York and Somerset acted their Parts in Anjou and Main with the like or greater Success, for they destroy'd the Towns, robb'd and plunder'd the People, and meeting with no Opposition return'd loaden with Prey and Prisoners as they pleased. The Duke of Somerset also to give further Proof of his Valour entred into the Marches of Brittain and took the Town of La Perche by fierce Assault, spoiling and burning the adjoining Country: From thence he march'd to Ponazay, where for two Months together he sent out Parties to plunder and destroy the Countries of Traonnois and Chatragonnois. The French King much disturb'd with these Insolencies of the English, sent out the Marshal Loiach with 4000 Men to put a stop to the Invasions of the Duke's Men and guard the Country, who suddenly entring in the Night thought to have set upon the Duke in his Lodgings and take him; but the Duke like a politick Captain had Intelligence of his first Appearance, and wisely foreseeing the Danger approaching march'd toward the French and met them half way, who not being able with Honour to retreat joyn'd Battel with him. The Fight was maintain'd a while well on both sides, but at length the English got the better, and routed the French, slaying an Hundred of the Marshal's Men, and taking Threescore and Two Prisoners, of which the chief were the Lord of Dausignie, and Sir Lewis Buell, the rest were most of them Esquires and Gentlemen. After this Victory the Duke of Somerset went forward and took the Town of Beaumont Le Viscount, and having well mann'd and provided all the Castles and Forts, which were in those Parts on the Frontiers of the Enemy, he return'd with his Spoil and Prisoners to the Duke of York.

The Lord Talbot, whose invincible Courage made the most dangerous and daring Attempts to be allotted him, was all this while diligently employ'd about the Siege of Dei, to which he had made his Access by subduing the adjacent Places of Strength. When he came to the Town to besiege it, he cast up Trenches about it, and raised a Fort or Bastile upon the Hill

Pawlett, which stood so conveniently, that he could with his Ordnance annoy both the Town and Haven at once. Having thus prepared Things for an Attack, he found that the Town was so strongly defended, that it would take up more Men and Time than was at first expected, and thereupon thought it convenient to get a Recruit both of Men, Provision and Ammunition from Roan before he proceeded in it, and to that End leaving the Conduct of the Siege to his Bastard Son, he went to Roan to provide all Things necessary for taking of it. The French King, who was as much concern'd to rescue Dei, as the English were desirous to get it, being advertis'd of Talbot's Departure sent an Army of 15000 Men under the Command of his Son Lewis the Dauphin, assisted by the Bastard of Orleans and Bishop of Avignon to relieve it. The Count of St. Paul, who being sorely vexed by the Duke of Burgundy's Forces, which took away from him his Towns and Castles, was oblig'd to go over to the French Interests, attended the Dauphin in this Expedition, with divers other of the French Nobility. After they had entred the City and prepared six Bridges running on Wheels, and other Things necessary to attack the Fort; they began with it, but the English defended themselves so valiantly, and with so great Loss to the French, that had not the Dauphin himself in Person gave them an Example of undaunted Valour, the French would have left it, but being led by him, they overcame all Difficulties, and tho' with much loss gain'd it. The Bastard of Talbot was taken Prisoner, with Sir William Paiton, and Sir John Reply, but were shortly after redeem'd. Three Hundred English were kill'd, and above double the Number of French dy'd with them. The rest of the English were taken Prisoners, and the French in the English Service were all hang'd. The Dauphin after this Victory rewarded the Constancy of the Inhabitants of Dei with several large Immunities and Privileges, which were confirm'd to them by the succeeding Kings, and left Monsieur de Murets Governour of the Town, because he had behav'd himself so valiantly in it, and so departed.

The Activity of the English in Normandy, and the bordering Provinces against the French was a spur to the Earl of Huntington, who was Lieutenant to King Henry in the Dutches of Aquitain and Guyenne (p) to attempt something of equal Importance to the English, as the Lord Talbot had at Dei, and to that End sent his Captains into Guyenne to besiege the strong Town of Tartas belonging to the Lord D'Albret, the old Enemy of the English. The Inhabitants and Garrison seeing the English Army approach the Town were loth to hazard themselves in vain; and having taken a full View of the Strength of the Enemy said that they were not able to defend themselves long, and therefore before they came to make any Assaults agreed, that they would surrender it up to them, if it were not reliev'd before St. John's Day, and gave them Monsieur D'Albret's Eldest Son for an Hostage for the true Performance of their Agreement; but because Monsieur D'Albret himself was not present, and being Lord of the Town, it was reasonable his Concurrence should be had, it was reserv'd, that if Monsieur D'Albret did not approve of their Agreement, he should signifie it to the Earl of Huntington, and the Pledge should be return'd, and the English do their best. This Condition

(p) Aquisain and Guyenne are the same, the former being the Ancient Name of the Province, and the latter the Modern.

A. D. 1442. Reg. 20. French raise the Siege.

left the French at Liberty, and gave them Time to raise the Siege, which the Lords of Guienne thus improved. They sent first to the French King, to beg of him to gather his Army together to raise the Siege of Tartas, which he easily granted, and having assembled an Army of 60000 Men, they caused the Lord De la Bret to signify his dissent to the Agreement, which the Garrison and Town had made with the English, to the Earl of Huntington, and take the Lord's Son back from them. The English suspected not the Design, but intended to go on in their Siege, but the French King lying ready with his Army to prevent the Effect, before they could bring Things into order for an Assault, the French Army appeared, and the English unable to encounter them, raised the Siege and departed. The French Forces being almost irresistible at the present, made use of the Advantage, and proceeded to besiege and take several English Garrisons, as St. Selerine, which they gained by Force, and slew 300 English, taking Sir Thomas Rampstone Governour of it Prisoner; the City of Arques, which after the Bulwark was taken by Force, yielded the Town by Composition, and the Captain of it, the Lord Montferrat, departed with his Garrison to Burdeaux, where he found the Earl of Longville, Captain De Beuse, and Sir Thomas Rampstone, who was lately released; Riolle, a City seated upon the River Cyronne, Seven Leagues distant from Burdeaux and Mermandie, which both yielded to them without Opposition: But the English in the mean time, tho' they dare not oppose them, yet so belittled themselves, and stopped all ways of their Foraging, and other Supplies of Provision, that they were forced to withdraw, and march up into France for better Quarters. The English soon after their Departure, recovered St. Selerine, Arques, and several other Towns from the French, taking their Lieutenant Reginald Guiliam, a Burgundian Prisoner, with many other Gentlemen, and slaying all the Common Soldiers; but Count de Foix regained St. Selerine from them. While these Things passed in Guienne, the Lord Talbot, whom Fortune's Frowns could never daunt, took the Town of Conchet, and hearing that Galliardon was besieged by the Bastard of Orleanse, hastened with all speed to the Relief of that Place, which the very Report of his Approach effected; for the Bastard immediately withdrew upon the News of his coming, and Talbot possessed himself of it, but finding that it would be almost impossible to keep it, partly thro' the Inconstancy of the Inhabitants, and partly because it stood so much exposed to the Incursions of the French, he demolished it to the Ground, and so left it.

The Lord Talbot takes Conchet, &c.

The Earl of Warwick's Estate seized and restored.

Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, dying in France, his Honours and Estate, by the Custom of the Realm was to have descended to his only Son and Heir Henry; but he being absent in France with his Father, his Estate was seiz'd on by the King, and kept Two Years from him, the Revenues of it being employ'd for the King's Use. What were the Causes of it, we find not; but whatever they were, the Consideration of his Father's Merit, and the natural Justice of the King, were such Motives for his Restoration to his Right, that, as if the King had design'd to repay all that he had taken from him at once, he not only gave him all his Estate again, but received him into his special Favour, nominating him the first Earl of England, and making him King of the Ile of Wight, crown'd him with his own Hands.

A. D. 1442. Reg. 20. Duke of Gloucester accuses the Bishop of Winchester.

The Duke of Gloucester, provoked by the intolerable Height and Pride of Cardinal Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, who out of Hatred to him, had lately instigated, as was generally thought, certain Persons to accuse and prosecute his Dutcheffs for Treason, Witchcraft, and many other notorious Crimes, to his great Disgrace and Shame, made a strict Reflection upon the Cardinal's Carriage for many Years past, and finding him to have done many Things derogatory and prejudicial to the King's Prerogative Royal, he digested them into 24 Articles, and presented them to the King, desiring that Judgment might be given upon him according to his Crimes. The chief Things alledged against him in the said Articles were:

I. That the Bishop of Winchester had not only taken upon himself the Dignity and Title of a Cardinal, contrary to the express Command of King Henry the Fifth, and in Derogation to the Church of Canterbury: But,

II. Having forfeited his Bishoprick thereby by the Act of Provisions, he had procured a Bull from the Pope to secure his Bishoprick still to him, contrary to the Laws of the Realm, which made it a Premunire so to do.

III. That the said Cardinal, with John Kemp, Archbishop of York, had assumed the Government of the King's Person and the Realm, which no Subject could do without a Treasonable Usurpation.

IV. That the said Bishop had defrauded the King of his Jewels.

V. That being Chancellor of England, he had against Law set at Liberty the King of Scots, and forgiven him part of his Ransome upon Condition the said King should marry his Niece.

VI. That the said Bishop had defrauded the King by Taking the Customs of Wools, and other Merchandizes at the Port of Hampton.

VII. That notwithstanding the said Cardinal neither hath nor can have any Title to the Crown, yet he presumeth to take upon him Royal Dignity, in summoning and calling Persons before him in Derogation of the King's Authority, being without his Permission or Command.

VIII. That the said Cardinal had obtained a pardon from Rome, to exempt his Diocess from paying of Tenths to the State, and so had given both an ill Example to the other Bishops to do the like, and laid the whole Burden upon the Laity to the great Discontent of the Kingdom.

IX. That the said Cardinal had been a Means of Uniting the French and the Duke of Burgundy, and this latter with the Duke of Orleanse, to the great Damage of the Realm, and Benefit of our Adversaries the French.

X. That the said Cardinal, after Communication had with our Enemies, sent the Archbishop of York to the King, to perswade him to leave his Right and Title to the Crown and Kingdom of France for certain Years, and be content to write himself, Rex Angliae, &c. to the great Disgrace of the King and his Progenitors.

XI. That the Release of the Duke of Orleanse, was brought to pass only by the Mediation and Procurement of the said Cardinal and Duke of York, contrary to the Will of King Henry the Fifth.

XII. That being their Chancellor, he had instead of Promoting the Good of the King, bought his Lands and Mannors of him.

XIII. That

A. D. 1442. Reg. 20. XIII. That the said Cardinal by sending such Captains and Soldiers into France as he thought fit, hath been the Cause that so much of Normandy and other Parts are lost.

XIV. That the Cardinal hath sold Places of Captains and other Officers for Money in France, whereby unfit Persons have been put into the Army to the Loss of the King's Dominions there.

These Articles with some others of less Importance, the Duke tender'd to the King himself, desiring in the Two last, that the King would put the said Cardinal out of his Council to answer the said Articles alledged against him, and that Persons aggrieved may freely utter their Complaints. The King hearing these Accusations against the Cardinal of Winchester, ordered, that they should be looked into, and examined by the Lords of his Council, of whom the greatest Part being Ecclesiastical Persons, they not only were favourable to him, but fearing they should disoblige him, delayed the Examination and Judgment so long, that the Duke of Gloucester, who was always rather passionate than revengeful, letting fall the Prosecution, as weary of it, the Bishop escaped, and the Matter was hushed up, as tho' the Crimes alledged had been inconsiderable, and not worth regarding; so that indeed the good Duke got nothing by this Attempt, but made the Cardinal a worse Enemy than ever, which tho' he disssembled, yet he so cunningly managed, that in the end he wrought his Destruction, as will after more plainly appear.

Also in August, this Year, happened a notable Quarrel in Fleetstreet, between the Students of the Inns of Court, and the Inhabitants of the said Street, occasioned by one of Clifford's Inn, named Harbottle. It began in the Night, and lasted till the next Day with great Fury and Fierceness on both Sides, several Persons were hurt, and slain, but the Mayor and Sheriffs having received the News of it, went with a good Force, and appeased the Fray, which by Party-making, was likely to have drawn in the greatest Part of the City which flock'd thither to assist or relieve their Friends on either Side.

Reg. 21. In the Beginning of this Twenty first Year of the King, Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, had a Son born at Roan, in Normandy, christned by the Name of Edward. He proved a very valiant and fortunate Prince, and in the Quarrel for the Crown, (which his Father began with King Henry, but lost his Life before he could gain his Wishes, being slain at the Battel of Wakefield) was so successful, that he was proclaimed King a few Days after, having won the Battel of Ferribridge, and gotten a perfect Victory over the Lancastrians.

Recruits sent into France. By the coming over of the Lord Talbot in the latter end of this Summer, when the Season for Action was almost past, the Council of King Henry had Information of the State of the English Affairs in France, and particularly in Guien, where they had sustained considerable Losses the last Summer. The Council upon this relation, believing the Success would encourage the French in further Attempts, thought it necessary to send over some Recruits to strengthen the Garrisons there, and defend their Borders, and forthwith dispatched away 800 Men well armed under the Command of Sir William Woodville. With these it was thought convenient to send a good quantity of Provisions, because that Country was surrounded by the Enemy on every Side, that it could get no Supply from the adjacent Parts; whereupon a Proclamation was put out, that whosoever would send over any Provisions and Victuals into Guienne, should pay no manner of Custom nor Toll, which encouraged so many to export Cheese, Corn and other Provisions thither, that the whole Province was abundantly supplied with all Necessaries. In the mean time Care was taken to gather a bigger Body of fresh Men to send over with the Lord Talbot. And because this valiant Captain had been for some time the main Support of the English Affairs in France, the King and Council judged it fit to give him the encouraging Marks of his Favour; and thereupon he was created Earl of Shrewsbury, a Title which none had born for near Three hundred and Forty Years before, the Family of Roger Montgomery, whom the Conqueror had dignified with that Title, being extinct in the Second Generation; but it hath proved a lasting Title to that noble Family, which still inherits the Honour, Title, and Worth of that valiant and brave Lord to this Day. With this Badge of Royal Favour, he departed soon after into Normandy, and carried over with him 3000 Men for the better Defence of it.

Upon the Day of the Translation of St. Edward, viz. October the Twelfth, on which Day the Mayor of London for the next Year was nominated and chosen, out of Two Persons, who have been Sheriffs of that City, presented by the Commonalty to the present Mayor and Aldermen his Brethren, was a great Disturbance made amongst the Citizens about the Election, upon this Occasion. The Commons of the City having fixed upon Robert Clopton, Draper, and Ralph Holland, Taylor, presented them according to the Custom before the Mayor for the time being, and the Aldermen, who having chosen Robert Clopton, declared him Mayor for the ensuing Year. This Election extremely disappointed the Society of Taylors, and their Friends, who were very zealous that Ralph Holland should be chosen, and therefore grew very mutinous and discontented upon the Declaration of the other, and cried out, Not that Man, but Ralph Holland. The Mayor commanded them Silence, but they more enraged, demanded more passionately, that Ralph Holland should be chosen. The Mayor seeing that fair Means would not prevail, and considering, that if such tumultuous Proceedings were yielded to, the Order of Elections would be quite broken, commanded the Sheriffs to apprehend some of the most clamorous and furious, that they might be punished for their disorderly Behaviour, which the Sheriffs immediately put in Execution, and carried Twelve or Sixteen of them to Newgate, where they were kept a while, and then dismissed upon Payment of a moderate Fine, that it might be a Terror to the Rabble to behave themselves more civilly at such Elections.

While the Lord Talbot remained in England, Jane, Countess of Cominges, Daughter to the Count of Bullen and Cominges, died, and left her Country to be disputed for by Charles, King of France, to whom the said Countess had given it, by Will, and the Earl of Arminack, who pretended to be the Heir of it, and accordingly entred upon the said Territories, and took Possession of them as his own. The King of France highly resented this Usurpation of his undoubted Right, as he termed it, and sent the Dauphin to recover the Countries by him unjustly possessed. The Earl withstood the French Forces a while, but being deserted by his Confederates, the Counts Perdriacke and March, and Salazar, a Cap-

having gain'd Access to him upon that Account took him Prisoner, and sent him, his Wife, promising him not only great Sums of Money with her, but to deliver into the King of *Eng-

he and his Ancestors detain'd from him in the

All this was transacted with all the Secrecy pos-immediately caused him to be summon'd to appear at his Parliament at Tholouse within fifteen Days to answer to what shall be alledg'd against him; but he not appearing, the Dauphin was again sent against him to ravage his Counoblig'd in Honour to assist him, yet through the Management of the Earl of Suffolk he was deof the Duke of Gloucester, which raised such an Hatred between those two Noble Persons, that it could not be extinguish'd but by the Destruadhered to them.

Goods upon the Lord's Day, and that no Arti-

Commodities or Work to any Person or Per-excellent Law, and worthy to commend the Makers of it to all Ages; but it never was ob-

Reg. 21.

The Citizens of Norwich incensed with the Encroachments of the Monks of Christ-Church in that City, rose against the Prior, and would have fired the Priory. The Duke of Norfolk with all the Force he could gather together went down to suppress them; the Citizens kept their Gates and Walls against them a while, but at length they gain'd Entrance. The King sent down Judge Fortescue with the Earls of Stafford and Huntington to decide the Quarrel, who indicted many of the Citizens, and the Prior himself for his Sedition and Riot, and seiz'd the Liberties of the City into the King's Hands, who made Sir John Clifton Captain of it for the Present, which so dissatisfied many of the Citizens, who had not been con-cern'd in the Quarrel, that they left their Habitations and went some of them beyond Sea, and others got them Dwellings in other Cities or Towns.

A Disur-bance at Norwich.

The Miscarries of France, and lamentable Destructions all over Christendom caused by the War there mov'd the Hearts of the Pope, and most of the Christian Princes to endeavour the Conclusion of a Peace between England and France once more, hoping, that they might now more effectually prevail, because both Parties could not but be tired with the length of War and the vast Expences of it; which tho' they might be well laid out, if either the English were likely to make a Conquest of France, or the French expel the English; yet being so equal a Match, that neither of them was near effecting, what they desir'd, a Peace, they believ'd, would be welcome to both Sides; and therefore sending Ambassadors to both Kings they so far prevail'd, that a Meeting was appointed by them to be at Tours in Touraine to adjust and conclude all Matters of Quarrel between them.
To this Assembly the King of England sent William de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, Dr. Adam Mollins, Lord Keeper, Sir Robert Ros, and several others: For the French King appear'd, Charles, Duke of Orleans, Lewis of Bourbon, Earl of Vandosme, Great Master of the French King's Household, Pierce de Bresse, Steward of Poitou, and

ing all they had, and the French for getting what they call'd their King's Right, there was nothing effected, but a Truce for Eighteen Months was clapp'd up for the present both by Sea and Land with Hopes, that in that Time all Matters might be adjusted, and by the Mediation of the Princes a firm Peace made up.

During this Treaty the Earl of Suffolk, perhaps knowing the King's Natural Mildness and Disposition to Peace, ventur'd one step further, than his Commission gave him leave, to propound a Marriage between his Master King Henry and the French King's Kinswoman, Margaret, Daughter of Rayner, Duke of Anjou, and Titular King of Sicily, Naples and Jerusalem, which gave him a great Name, but brought him no Profit or Authority. This Match Suffolk believ'd would prove an effectual Means of uniting the Minds of the two Princes; and tho' there were likely to be no Portion given the King with her, yet since she would be the Foundation of a firm Peace, it would save England more Treasure, than the greatest Prince of the World could give with his Daughter. This Presumption made Suffolk very eager to promote the Match, and solicited the King of France for that End, that it might be yielded to, and agreed on. His Passion caused a little Averseness in the French King and the Lady's Father, who alledg'd, That tho' they were not unwilling to comply with the Match, yet it was not consistent with their Honour to do it, so long as the King of England held a part of the Dutchy of Anjou, and the whole County of Main, which of Right belong'd to Duke Reyner the Lady's Father. But the Earl of Suffolk more Zealous than Cautious easily satisfied this Objection, and told them, That he would undertake, that those Countries should be restored to Duke Reyner, if the Marriage was consented to, which Promise being according to their Minds, the Lady was assured in Matrimony to the King, and Suffolk dismissed to carry it on with his Master.

These Things being thus transacted and agreed on, the Earl of Suffolk with the rest of the English Commissioners return'd Home to give an Account of their Negotiation; and tho' there was only a Truce concluded, yet Suffolk assured the King, That it would certainly produce an Immutible Peace thro' the Means and Methods he had taken, if they were comply'd with; for he had propounded and obtain'd a Match with the French King's Kinswoman, the Daughter of Reyner, Duke of Anjou, one of the most accomplished Ladies in all Perfections of a Woman in the World, Beautiful without Blemish, and Virtuous to Admiration, fitted every way for the greatest of Princesses; but that which would be of greatest Advantage to England was, that this Match would be a certain means to end the Wars, settle a Peace every ways advantageous to the King, and so make the whole Kingdom happy.

King Henry partly out of Affection to Suffolk, who was his great Favourite, and partly out of a Desire of Peace greatly approv'd of all he had done, and was desirous the Match might be effected with all speed. The Council, to whom all this was related, consented to it to please the King and Suffolk, only the Duke of Gloucester, who was too great to flatter Suffolk's Actions, and too honest to call that Good, which he saw would certainly be of an ill Consequence to the Nation, oppos'd the Match with some warmth and heat, alledging, That it would be contrary to the Law of God and the Honour of the King, to break the Contract of Marriage so solemnly made with the Daughter of the Earl of Arminack, upon Conditions very advantageous to the King and his Realm; That the Match with the Daughter of the Duke of Anjou was both dishonourable to the King, and disadvantageous to the Nation; because by restoring the County of Main, and part of Anjou the King would seem to purchase a Wife at the Expence of the Blood of his Subjects, and would much weaken his Affairs in France, which ought to be maintain'd in their full Force, that a Peace may be concluded upon better Terms, because Anjou and Maine are the Bulwarks of Normandy, and in surrendering them, that Country which was the Patrimony of the King would be exposed to the Violence of the Enemy. These were undeniable Reasons, and the only true way to keep up the King's Credit and Interest: However, Suffolk ruled all, having the King's Affections, and so it was determin'd that the Marriage should be consummated, and the Train he had laid follow'd. Gloucester's Advice, though the best, was slighted, and Suffolk and the New Queen made his Enemies, which as it prov'd fatal to him, so to the King himself and the Nation.

These Resolutions about the Marriage being unalterable, all Things were hasten'd to bring it to a Consummation. The French King having Notice of it, sent the Earl of Vendosme, great Master of his House, the Archbishop of Rheims, first Peer of France, and divers other Noble Personages into England to have the Instruments of Marriage seal'd and ratified on both Parts. These Ambassadors were kindly received by the Earl of Suffolk and his Party; and having their Business dispatch'd were sent away with Rewards.

Upon the Conclusion of this Marriage King Henry made a Creation of Noble-men at Windsor, viz. John Holland, Earl of Huntington, he made Duke of Exeter; Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham; Henry, Earl of Warwick, Duke of Warwick; and the Earl of Suffolk, who was the only promoter of it, Marquess of Suffolk, and conferred on him this further Honour to be his Deputy in celebrating the Formality of the Marriage, and conducting his Bride over into England.

These Things being thus order'd and appointed, the rest of the Summer was spent in providing an Equipage sufficient to fetch over the Royal Bride; for her Father, who was Rich in Titles, was so Poor in Purse, that he was not able to send her over to her Husband, which was much laugh'd at by the Duke of Gloucester's Friends, who were all against the Marriage. Many costly Chariots and gorgeous Horse-litters were provided, and the Marquess and his Wife with many Persons of the greatest Quality, as well Women as Men were richly adorned with Apparel and Jewels, with whom the Marquess of Suffolk took his Voyage into France in the Month of November to bring the Queen into England. This gallant Company being landed in France, went to Tours in Touraine, where they were met and honourably received by the Kings of France and Sicil, the Father of the Royal Spouse, and after a convenient Time allow'd for Preparation and Ceremony the Marquess of Suffolk, as Procurator to King Henry, was marry'd to the Lady Margaret in the Church of St. Martins in that City. There were present at the Marriage the Father and Mother of the Bride, the French King who was Uncle to King Henry, and the French Queen who was Aunt to the Lady Margaret, the Dukes of Orleans and Calabria, Alanzon and Bretagne, seven Earls, twelve Barons, twenty Bishops, and a great Number of Knights and Gentlemen. After the Celebration of the Marriage, much Time was spent in Feasting,

From Southampton the King and Queen journeyed toward London in the Beginning of May, and arrived there on the Eighteenth of the said Month, being received upon her Way by the Duke of Gloucester and many of the Nobility, with all due Honour and Respect, and at Blackheath by the Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of London, in embroider'd Gowns, shewing their Arts and Trades, who conveyed her thro' the City, which was adorned with costly Shews and Pageants, to Westminster, where she was on the Thirtieth Day of the same Month crowned Queen of England with all the usual Solemaity and Ceremonies.

The Benefit or Hurt of this Marriage.

After the Noise and Clutter of the Marriage was over, and the Queen a little settled in her Throne, Men began then to reflect upon the Match. The Lady was undeniably a Woman of great Excellencies; she was very beautiful in Face, and graceful in Personage, of a ready and Politick Wit, and of a Courage equal to the bravest Men, which extorted an Approbation of the Marquess of Suffolk's Choice of a Queen, as to her Person, even from his Enemies; but when they considered the ill Consequences of the Marriage, viz. Relations that were likely to be rather a Burden than an Honour to the Nation, Normandy laid open and exposed to the King's Enemies, by surrendring Main and Anjou, the Protection of it; and the Count of Arminack mightily offended, and that justly too, resolving to revenge the Dishonour; most Men of Reason condemned the Choice, and thought Suffolk bribed into such an unprofitable Match: But because the ill Effects were not presently felt, and Men's Minds were mightily intent upon the Peace, which they hoped for by her, and which they thought a sufficient Advantage by the Marriage, if it were once settled; all Things at a Distance were not minded, but Suffolk applauded, and the Nation thought generally very happy in the Marriage.

Henry Archbishop of Canterbury dies, and his Character.

Henry Chicheley, Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and was succeeded by John Stafford, translated from Bath and Wells (i). He was a worthy Man in his Generation, but too much addicted to the Pope. He founded Two Colleges in Oxford, and endowed them well, viz. All Souls and Barnard. He was of mean Parentage, being a Taylor's Son of Higham-Ferrers in Northamptonshire, but was not so much exalted by his unexpected Grandure, but that he retained a very humble Mind and Disposition in his greatest Height and Prosperity, as may appear by this Passage of his Life. King Henry being instigated by some of his Courtiers, no Friends to the Clergy, and less to the Archbishop, sent the Archbishop a Pie made of Taylors's Shreds, of several Sorts and Colours, to reproach his mean Birth, which the Archbishop received very thankfully, and having look'd into it, courteously entertained the Messenger, as if he had received a very acceptable Gift, and when he dismissed him, bad him tell the King, his Master, 'That if he did exceed his Father, Henry the Fifth, as much as he had done his poor Father, he would make the most accomplish'd Monarch that ever was in Christendom.'

During the Truce with the French King, Richard Duke of York, and divers of the great Officers and Captains came into England, and spent the greatest Part of the Summer in visiting their Wives, Children and Friends, but the Time drawing near for their Return to their Charge in France, many Consultations were had with the King's Council, what Course should be taken to secure the Conquests in that Kingdom at the end of the Truce, and what Provisions should be made to keep Normandy, since by the Marriage, Anjou and Maine were now put out of the King's Hands. It was taken for granted, that the King of France would so recruit his Armies, that if a Peace were not concluded, he would renew the War with greater Vigour than ever, and if the English were not in as good a Posture of Defence, the French King would either make no Peace at all, or a very disadvantageous one for the English, wherefore it was agreed on all Hands, after several Debates, that Normandy must be well fortified, and the English Army in France be put into so good a Condition, as to bring King Charles to a beneficial Peace; or if he stood out, to make a powerful War upon him.

And to this End a Parliament was summoned, Subsidies granted, and a great Army of Men ordered to be raised, and be in a readiness to be transported into France against the Time of the Expiration of the Peace, which was to be in April following. The Duke of York, whose Commission for the Regency of France for Five Years was now expired, was again appointed the King's Deputy in that Kingdom for Five Years longer, because he had so well managed his late Trust for the Advantage of the Nation, that no fitter Person could be found in so difficult a Time, and therefore his Commission was granted for Five Years more, with Thanks for his Loyalty, and his former Allowances. But the Duke of Somerset still envying, as he had formerly done, the Duke of York's Advancement, sought all Means to keep him from the Place, and get it for himself, which he easily effected, making the Marquess of Suffolk his Friend, who persuaded the King to revoke his Grant to the Duke of York for the Regency of France, and give it the Duke of Somerset. This disgraceful Revocation, which look'd, as tho' some Crime had been alledg'd against him, much displeased the Duke of York, and lodged so deep a Resentment in his Mind against the Duke of Somerset, that tho' he carried it fair, he watched an Opportunity to revenge it, which he did to the Ruin of both Families, as after times will shew. In this Parliament the Marquess of Suffolk on the Second Day of January, made a long and elegant Speech in the House of Lords, declaring the Pains and Labour he had been at in his Embassage into France, as well in concluding a Truce for a Season, as in making up the Match for the King, advertising them, that the Truce was to expire in April; and like a faithful Subject he did advise, that all Preparations should be made for the Preservation of the King's Countries in France, and praying them to take notice of it, and give him a Discharge for his Legation. The next Day he went into the Lower-House, and with equal Eloquence, not only shewed his Fidelity in his Legation, but set forth what great Charges he had been at in attending it, and fetching over the Queen, desiring, that this Action might be recorded in the Parliament Rolls, and himself be discharged by both Houses, with the Consideration of his Expence. Behold, what the Eloquence of Favourites can do! Few Men of Prudence in either House, but knew, that the Marquess deserved little Thanks for his Labour, either in making the Peace, or the Match; yet as if all had been well done for the Nation's Interest, the very next Day, the Speaker of the Commons, William Burghley, attended with a great Number of that House went up to the Lords, and desired their Concurrence in a Petition to the King to reward the Marquess for his Services; and to shew their Gratitude, they caused the whole Action to be enrolled, and gave him an whole Fifteenth in Consideration of his Expences. And so the Parliament broke up.

The Queen's Kindness to the Marquess of Suffolk and his Friends.

The Queen seeing the Marquess of Suffolk so well rewarded by the Representatives of the Nation for his Services, which were a greater Kindness to her than the Kingdom, as she very well knew, looked upon their Action as a Precedent for her self, and therefore soon after the Rising of the Parliament, took him into her particular Favour, and instigated the King, who was forward enough of himself, to heap Honours and Preferments upon him, whereupon he made him a Duke, and when it happen'd a little after, that Henry, Duke of Warwick, Premier Earl of England, and King of the Isles of Wight, Garnsey and Jarsey, died, and was buried at Tewksbury, he conferred upon him the Wardship of the Body and Lands of the Countess of Warwick, together with that of the Lady Margaret, sole Heir to John, Duke of Somerset, afterwards Mother to King Henry the Seventh; and because John de Foix, the Son of Gaston de Foix, a Gasconne, had married the Duke of Suffolk's Niece, she caused the Father to be elected a Knight of the Garter, and the Son to be made Earl of Longaville, and gave him for the Maintenance of his Degree divers Lands and Castles, amounting to One thousand Pounds by the Year. With these her special Friends she contrived to be reveng'd of the Duke of Gloucester, who was looked upon by this haughty Queen as her Enemy, because in respect to the Nation, he had declared himself against the Match; and as the first Step to it, she caus'd him to be remov'd, not only from any Command about the King's Person, but Council, and took it upon her self, with her Minions and Friends, to rule all to the great Discontent of the People, who having had long Experience of the Good-will of the Duke of Gloucester to the Nation, (for which Reason he had the Name constantly given him of the Good Duke) could hardly think the Government safe in other Hands, and therefore cried out against the Queen and Duke of Suffolk for displacing him as Enemies to the publick Good; for all Men saw that the King's easie Disposition was sway'd by the Queen's Policy, and Suffolk's Flattery, and that therefore the Blame lay upon them, and not the King, who tho' out of his Minority, yet was govern'd chiefly by his Uncle's Council, and while Suffolk was his Favourite, Gloucester was his Oracle, to whose Advice he yielded in all Matters of publick Concern. This was such a Bar to the Queen's Ambition, who seeing so much of the Woman in her Husband, laboured to put on as much of the Man her self, and while he spent his Time at his Devotion, to play the King and govern all, that there was no enduring Gloucester near the Court, and so he was turn'd out of all upon some slight and frivolous Allegations against him.

Reg. 24.

While these Things pass'd in England, little was done in France, because of the Truce continuing, which being expir'd in April, was by the Consent of the Two Kings prolonged to the Year 1449, but it had likely to have soon been broken upon this Occasion. Anjou and Maine, the Two Counties which were to be delivered up to the Duke of Anjou the Queen's Father by the Treaty of Marriage, were readily resigned; but the English knowing of how great Importance the City of Mars was to them, were very loth to part with it, and thereupon kept it in their Hands longer than was thought convenient, insomuch that Charles, the French King, supposing that the English did intend not to resign that Town, raised an Army, and resolved to take it by Force. King Henry, who was more conscientious in performing than Politick in making an Agreement, hearing of the King of France's Attempt, immediately ordered, that the Town should be surrendered to him, not only because he would not give the French King a just Ground of Quarrel to break the Truce, but also because it was in Justice due to him, and so the Peace was pieced up again.

Anjou and Maine resigned to the Duke of Anjou.

The general Discontents, which the Removal of the Duke of Gloucester from about the King's Person and the Government had caus'd among the People, became now so evident, that the Queen and her Friends could not but take Notice of it, and therefore they were forced to set all their Wits at work to make the slight Allegations, which they had surmis'd against him at first, appear great Crimes, that so his Deprivation might seem as much deserved, as it was dishonourable. And to this End, the Duke of Suffolk, who ever hated him, because his sagacious Eye discovered his Unworthiness of the Favours heaped upon him, was employed to encourage the Duke's Enemies, to set on foot what Accusations they could either in Malice invent, or in Policy contrive against him; the Chief of whom were Humphrey Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, who being the Son of Ann Plantagenet, a Descendant from Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, Seventh Son of Edward the Third, wish'd him out of the Way, that he might be the first Duke of the Royal Blood in England; the Cardinal of Winchester, who was implacably incensed against the Duke of Gloucester, because he had made his Pride odious, and his Policy successless; and the Archbishop of York, who having joined with Winchester in his Crimes, was equally the Object of Gloucester's Displeasure. These Men, with the Queen and her Friends, having rais'd many forged Accusations against him, summon'd him to answer for himself before the King and his Council, to which he readily submitted and appear'd. Divers Articles were alledged against him, by Persons suborn'd to accuse him; but the main Thing which was insisted on, was this. 'That being the Chief Governour of the Nation in the King's Minority, he had to the great Dishonour of the King, and Injury of his Subjects, caus'd divers Persons to be put to death, contrary to the Laws of the Land, and when any Persons were adjudged to death deservedly for their Crimes, he out of the Cruelty of his Disposition, order'd them to suffer other

Deaths than the Law assign'd, thereby shewing, that he was unjust even in the Execution of Justice; and that whereas he ought most strictly to have observ'd the Laws, he was the greatest Breaker of them. The Duke very patiently heard these Calumnies of his Adversaries, and supported by the Conscience of his own Innocency, as well as his great Knowledge of the Laws of England (for he was a very studious Man, and so well read in all Laws and Customs of England as none better) he gave such clear Answers to all Things objected against him, that he was acquitted by the Council, and the Disgrace of his Crimes which his Enemies intended to lay on him, fell so heavily upon themselves, that as the Duke of Gloucester was more honour'd, so they were more hated and abhorr'd of all Men.

Accidents in England. Simon Eyre, Lord Mayor of London, began this Summer to build Leaden-hall in London to be a Stow-house for Corn and Fewel for the Poor of the City, and a beautiful Chappel in the East-end of the same, and over the Gate of it caused to be written, Dextera Domini exaltavit me, i. e. The Right Hand of the Lord hath exalted me, giving an excellent Example to all Men, how Men ought to employ those Riches which Providence heaps upon Men, viz. in being Benefactors to the Poor. In this Year were two very unusual Combats within Lists appointed, but one only was fought. The first was by the Prior of Kilmayne in Ireland, who impeach'd the Earl of Ormond of High-Treason, and the Place of their Tryal by Battel was appointed in Smithfield. But by the Mediation of Dr. Gilbert Worthington, Parson of St. Andrews Holborn, and some other of the Clergy the Quarrel was taken up by the King and so decided without Combat. About the same time one John David an Armourer impeach'd his Master William Catur of Treason, and they fought in Smithfield, but Catur being by the Company of his Friends and Neighbours almost intoxicated with Wine before he came to fight, he was unhappily slain without any just Suspicion of Guilt; but the Servant liv'd not long after him, for the next Assize he was hang'd for Felony.

Reg. 25. The Disappointments which the Duke of Gloucester's Adversaries met withall in their late Attempt against him, to bring him into Disgrace by their forg'd Calumnies and Crimes, was so far from discouraging them in the further Prosecution of their malicious Designs, that they were the more enrag'd; and having the Queen on their Side resolv'd upon his Destruction; but knowing, that he was the People's Darling, and therefore no open Proceedings against him would be endur'd, they contriv'd to work his Ruin by the most unsuspected and private Means. Many Ways were thought on to ensnare him, but upon scanning of all Circumstances they were laid aside. At length the most plausible Invention was to call a Parliament, and there to apprehend him for some Charge of Treason, and so work their Will. This Proposal, hellish enough, was receiv'd with the general Approbation of the Conspirators, and the Queen was left to manage it, who having first given out, that many important Affairs of State would shortly require the Meeting of a Parliament, caused Writs to be issu'd out a little before Christmas to summon a Parliament to meet at Bury upon the 23d of February following. And now the Confederates thinking all sure, and that the Duke of Gloucester would not suspect their Design in the least, spent their Christmas with more than usual Mirth, longing till the

A. D. 1447. Day should come when their mischievous Contrivance should be put in Execution.

A. D. 1447. Reg. 25. With the new Year the Lords began to prepare for meeting in Parliament at Bury; and that the Duke of Gloucester might fear no Evil, all Things at Court were carry'd smoothly to him, but yet Care was taken to have it whisper'd in his Ear, that it was necessary he should be at it, to prevent the Designs of the Queen and her Party. The Good Duke not at all Jealous of ill Practices, but retaining his old Zeal for the Commonwealth hearken'd to the Caution, and with the rest of the Lords came to the Place at the Time appointed, ready to attend the National Business.

On the first Day of the Session all things were quiet, and the usual Ceremonies at the opening a Parliament all perform'd. On the second Day the Lord Beaumont, then High-Constable of England, being accompany'd with the Duke of Buckingham, Duke of Somerset, and many others arrested the Duke of Gloucester, and put him in Custody under a strong Guard. His Servants were all taken from him, and thirty two of them sent to several Prisons at a distance one from another. The Nation was in a great amaze at this sudden Action, and every Man was inquisitive to know what new Matter was found out against the Duke, who had so lately clear'd himself of all that could be alledged against him. His Enemies thought it necessary to lay some Crime to his Charge, and therefore gave it out that Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, with his Train of Servants had traiterously conspired to kill the King, that he might set the Lady Eleanor his Wife at Liberty. A ridiculous Charge, but yet sufficient to quiet the People, whom they only fear'd in the Execution of their Design, for the more improbable his Crime was the easier it would be to free himself, and so the People rested content with the Sense of his Wisdom and Innocency. But his Enemies had contriv'd otherwise that he should never come to his Defence; for the Night after his Commitment, as some say, but others, a few Nights after, he was found dead in his Bed, and his Body shew'd to the Lords and Commons assembl'd in Parliament, and lay expos'd to open View of all Comers for some time; in which because no Signs of a violent Death appear'd, it was reported, That he dy'd of an Apoplexy or Impostume. But because none of his Servants suffer'd after his Death, which they ought to have done had they been guilty of High-Treason, as was alledg'd against them, tho' Five of them were condemn'd and near their Execution were pardon'd by the Duke of Suffolk's Means, it was generally thought a sufficient Ground to believe, that he was murder'd by the Queen's Means; and some were so particular as to report, that he was strangled between two Pillows or Feather-beds, as Thomas Woodstock, Duke of Gloucester, before him had been; others that he had an hot Spit run up his Fundament, as K. Edward II. had; others affirm'd, that he dy'd of mere Grief, because he saw he must now fall a Sacrifice to his Enemy's Malice without being allow'd to defend himself; all which Conjectures have little Foundation. The most discreet Judge he was murder'd; but being transacted in private, it was not safe to determine by what Means.

Thus dy'd the Good Duke of Gloucester lamented deservedly by all the Nation, being a Lover of the Commons, a Friend to the Learned, a continual Defender of the Innocent, and a Terror to the Guilty; and tho' the Queen and her Party

Party triumph'd in his Overthrow, yet a little Time shew'd them how impolitick Malice and Hatred is; for by his Death they wrought the Ruin of the King himself, having open'd a Gap for Richard, Duke of York, to put in his Claim to the Crown, which he prosecuted so violently, that in few Years he began those Conteſts and Troubles in the Nation, which made King Henry's Throne very uneaſie, and at length ended in his Depoſition, which he would not in all probability have attempted, had not the Duke of Glouceſter been dead, whoſe Title was generally better known, and whoſe Intereſt in the Nation was ſuch, that York dar'd not have ſtirred againſt him; but he being thus made away with, the Queen was ſo hated, that it was eaſie for the Duke of York to get Aſſiſtants enough to further his ambitious Deſigns, as well to revenge Glouceſter's Death, as to eaſe themſelves of the Queen's Uſurpation, who had aſſum'd her Husband's Authority to govern all.

The Pope ſends a Golden Roſe to K. Henry. Upon St. Andrew's Day this Year was King Henry preſented with a Golden Roſe by Pope Eugenius, who ſent Ludovicus Cordona, a Doctor in Divinity with it to him. Upon the Delivery of the Roſe, which was done with great Ceremony in St. Stephen's Chappel at Weſtminſter, in the Preſence of the Dukes of York and Exeter, Cardinal Kemp, Arch-biſhop of York, and John Stafford, Arch-biſhop of Canterbury (u) and Chancellor of England. He declared in an eloquent Oration his Embaſſage, which was to exhort the King to undertake an Expedition againſt the Turks, who barbarouſly waſted and ravaged the European Provinces, not forgetting to extol the Vertues of the conſecrated Roſe, and to explain the right Application of it, that he might make his Gift the more acceptable. His Meſſage and Gift were favourably accepted, and Promiſes of Aſſiſtance given to the Pope againſt the Turk, but Home-bred Diſturbances ſo took up the King from this Time, that nothing could be done Abroad.

The Death of Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter. Soon after the Deceſſe of the Duke of Glouceſter, God, who is the chief Guardian of Innocence, reveng'd his Murther upon one of his Principal Enemies the Rich Cardinal of Wincheſter, whoſe Heart being ſet ſo much upon the World and the Glories of it, there could not be a greater Punishment of his Sins, than to call him out of it. He liv'd not above a Month after the Duke of Glouceſter, and therefore enjoy'd the Satisfaction of his Death but a ſhort time. On his Death-bed he is ſaid to have ſhew'd a World of Impatience, and when he was told, that no Medicines could ſave his Life, he cry'd out in a Paſſion, What! Will nothing ſave my Life? Will Money do nothing? Can't Death be bribed a few Years? I'd give the whole Kingdom for my Life. But no Man can compound with Death, he was forced to leave his Pomp and lie down in the Duſt. To him ſucceeded William Patin, who was after ſurnam'd Wainſleet, from the Place of his Nativity, a Town in Lincolnſhire ſo call'd. He was by Birth a Gentleman, and from Provolt of Eaton raiſed to this Biſhoprick, wherein he liv'd ſome Years as eminent for his Piety as the Cardinal for his Riches. On the 5th of Auguſt this Year dy'd alſo John Holland, Duke of Exeter, and was bury'd at St. Katherine's near London.

With this Six and Twentieth Year of the King began the Rule of the Queen, who having remov'd the Duke of Glouceſter out of the World manag'd all Things without controul, and with the Aſſiſtance of the Duke of Suffolk, who was her chief Favourite, endeavour'd to make her Command Abſolute; wherein tho' ſhe made uſe of her Husband's Name, yet ſhe could ſcarcely hide her Uſurpation, becauſe in England the Queen Conſort hath no Power, but Title only. Her Ambition and Tyranny ſoon grew intolerable to the Subjects, and begat a general Diſcontent as well among the Nobility as Commons. This the Duke of York diligently obſerved, and made uſe of for his Deſigns to raiſe himſelf to the Throne: For having repreſented to his Friends the Miſery of the Nation, which, under the Name of a King weak and unable to govern, was ruled by an ambitious Queen and her Minions, he firſt whiſper'd it into their Heads, that it was neceſſary to pitch upon ſome other Perſon to be King, ſince the preſent King had depoſed himſelf in effect by ſuffering the Queen and Suffolk to over-rule all. King Henry was really a good Man, but fitter for a Cloyſter than a Palace, and therefore the Kingdom was to be put into better Hands than thoſe of Women and Favourites. This he ſaid to prepare their Minds for what he had further in due time to propoſe to them, but he firſt let their Diſcontents work, and when he found them as deſirous of Change as he wiſhed, then he further put forward his own Title, telling them, That if they look'd into the Succeſſion of the Crown which alone gave a legal Title to it, the Houſe of Lancaſter enjoy'd it only by Uſurpation, contrary to the Laws of the Realm; That Lionel, Duke of Clarence being Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, his Poſterity muſt have a better Title to the Crown, than the Lancaſtrian Line; That his Grandmother Philippa (x) Wife to Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, being the only Daughter of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, and he himſelf Son of the Eldeſt (y) Daughter of the ſaid Edmund (z), who left no Male-iſſue, it was eaſie for them to ſee who had the true Right to the Crown of England; That though he would not vainly vaunt himſelf fit for ſo great an Office, yet he might boldly claim the Crown as his Right, and hoped that the Diligence and Valour which he had ſhewn in France for the Preſervation of the Engliſh Dominions in that Kingdom, were Demonſtrations enough to ſhew, that he had the true Spirit of an Engliſh Man in him, and was zealous for the Good of the Nation in all Things. Theſe Propoſals were Argument ſufficient to perſwade his Friends to a Concurrence, their Wiſhes having prevented his Deſigns; and therefore it was reſolv'd upon, and firmly agreed among them, that they ſhould promote his Intereſts with all the Secrecy neceſſary for

Roger left Two Sons who both liv'd to be Men, Edmund and Roger, but they dy'd without Iſſue, as did their Eldeſt Siſter the Lady Elinor, ſo Anne who marry'd Richard, Earl of Cambridge, Father of this Richard, Duke of York, became Heir to the Princeſs Philippa's Right to the Crown, which Right on the Death of the ſaid Lady Anne, fell to the Duke of York.

A. D. 1448. While these Things were transacted in England, little of Moment pass'd in France, because the Peace had bound up both Sides from Action. The Duke of Somerset was Regent, but did not carefully manage Affairs there. Sir Francis Surienne, call'd the Arragonois, who for his good Services done to the Crown of England was honour'd with the Dignity of Knight of the Garter, was Governour of the Lower Normandy. This Person being Active and Warlike, while he lay in his Garrisons of St. Jaques and Beveronne, had observ'd in their Commerce with the Frontier Towns, that they were weak and ill guarded, and especially the Town of Fougieres in Brittain, a very rich Place, which was a Temptation to him to attempt the taking of it, and accordingly in the Night before the Feast of our Lady in Lent scal'd the Walls, and took both the Town and Castle; which tho' of it self 'twas a Breach of the Peace scarce Pardonable, yet that which render'd it a greater Crime was, that he treated the Inhabitants with the greatest Inhumanity and Cruelty, not only slaying many of them, as in a time of War, but pillaging their Goods, ravishing the Women, robbing the Churches, and carrying away many of the chief of them Prisoners. Duke Francis, who was first comprehended in the Truce reign'd in Brittain at that Time, and was highly offended at this Action of the English, and thereupon sent an Herald, to complain of the Wrong done him, to the Duke of Somerset, requiring Satisfaction, and a Restitution of the Place, with all that was taken away from it. The Duke of Somerset coolly reply'd, That the Action much displeased him, and that such Satisfaction for the Wrong done should be given, as he himself should require; but the Duke not being satisfied with this Answer, sent the Bishop of Rheims (a) to the French King to beg his Aid and Assistance in a Case where himself was equally concern'd, that he might recover the Town by Force of Arms. Charles, the French King was not so furious as the Duke, but first sent John Havart and William Cosmet, one of the Masters of his Requests to the King of England, and Peter de Foutein, the Master of his Horse, to the Duke of Somerset with the former Message, who received the like Answer with this Addition, 'That he would send Commissioners to Louviers upon a Day appointed, who should adjust the Difference between them, and not only make Restitution, but Amends to the Duke of Brittain. On the Day prefixed the Commissioners on both Parts met, and the French-Men demanded the Town, and a large Recompence for the Damages sustain'd by the Inhabitants. The English-Men replied, 'That without Offence, nothing in Justice ought to be given in Satisfaction, alledging, 'That it was the Fact of Sir Francis only, without the Consent either of the King of England, or the Duke of Somerset, his Lieutenant or Regent. To this the French answered, 'That if they did not make Amends for the Injury done, they would not be tied to secure any Place, but should endeavour to revenge themselves, it being against Reason for the offended Party not to be allowed to reply, the Injury received. To which Answer the English Commissioners not being able to reply, referr'd them to the Duke of Somerset himself, who lay then at Sonniers; and King Charles sent his Ambassador to him.

About this Time, by the Means of Frederick, Duke of Austria, and other Christian Princes, the Schism, which had continued between the Popes for Sixteen Years, was ended. For Felix the Fifth, (b) who was set up by the Council of Basil, upon their Deposition of Eugenius the Fourth, being very uneasy under the Opposition, was soon perswaded to resign to Nicholas the Fifth, Eugenius's Successor; and to an Union was again settled in the Church to the great Satisfaction of Christendom. Felix by this voluntary Act got a great Reputation in the World for his Humility and Sanctity, and tho' he gave place to Nicholas in Dignity, yet he outshined him in Piety, upon which this Verse was made on him, as if Felix's Humility shined like a Sun in the World. Felix after his Cession from the Papacy, was made Legate of France, and Cardinal of Savoy, and lived so holy a Life, that he was revered for a Saint after his Death.

While the French Ambassadors were treating with the Duke of Somerset at Sonniers about the Restitution of Fougieres, and Satisfaction to be done the Inhabitants, the French King receiv'd Information from a Norman, who daily went into Pont de l'Arch, with his Cart to carry Victuals and other Things into the English Garrison there, That that Town was but ill mann'd, and worse kept, the Garrison being very negligent and careless. Charles, who was glad of an Opportunity of requiting the English Perfidiousness, readily hearkned to it, and sent Monsieur de Bresse, Sir James de Clermont, and Captain Floquet, with a select Company of Men to lie in Ambush near the Gate of St. Andrew belonging to the Town, having agreed with the said Waggoner, with whom he sent Two lusty Soldiers in the Habit of Carpenters, with Axes on their Shoulders, to surprize the Guards and kill them, and to break down his Waggon in the Passage, which was very heavy laden on Purpose that the Gates could not be shut, or Draw-bridge pull'd up without a great deal of Difficulty; when this was done, he was to give Notice to the Ambushes, that they might enter the Town. These Things were all acted as they were plotted, early in the Morning about the Beginning of October; and the English Garrison, which suspected nothing of this Nature, were all taken in their Beds, with the Commander himself, the Lord Faulconbridge, and were carried away Prisoners by the French. The Loss of this Town was of great Importance to the English, being the Passage over the River Seine out of France into Normandy, and but Four Leagues distant from Roan, the chief City of that Province, which seem'd to be all in Danger by it. The Duke of Somerset was extremely troubled at it, and when the French Deputies came to demand the Restitution of Pont de l'Arch taken by the French by Treachery.

(a) It should be the Bishop of Reims in Brittain; for 'tis not probable that the Archbishop of Rheims, as the Author Copying from Hollinshead makes it, who is Primate of all France, the first Bishop and Peer of the Realm, would serve the Duke of Brittain in the Capacity of an Envoy.
(b) This Felix the Fifth, was Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, who from a Temporal Prince advanc'd himself to the Spiritual Empire of Christendom.

A. D. 1448. Reg. 26. Fougeres, and Satisfaction of the Damages done to the Inhabitants, would hear nothing of it, he said, till Pont de l'Arch was restor'd again to the English. But the French grown confident by this Advantage, told him plainly, 'They would now stand upon better Terms, and would not part with it, unless Fougeres with all the Losses, and Interests of it were restor'd to the Duke of Brittain; which the English not being able to do, not only because the Lives of such as were slain were irreparable, but because the vast Spoil which had been taken out of the Town amounting to 1600000 Crowns, had been extravagantly squandered away by the Soldiers, the Duke was forced to deny it, and so the War was renewed, before the Truce agreed upon was expir'd. For after this Meeting, Charles, the French King, immediately rais'd an Army to prosecute the War with unusual Vigour.

The War renewed between the English and French.

The People of England being extremely dissatisfied at the Duke of Gloucester's Death, and the Queen's Tyranny thro' the Abuse of the good King's Easiness, and the Nobility divided with and against the Duke of Suffolk, it was very improbable, if the War in France should be renewed that the English could make any considerable Opposition; and it had been the greatest Wisdom of the Duke of Somerset to have kept the Truce on foot upon any Terms. The French King was sensible of these Inconveniences, and therefore held the English to such Conditions as he knew in himself almost impossible to be perform'd, that he might renew the War at the English's Cost, and his own Advantage. Upon these Grounds he built great Hopes of Success, (tho' the French Historians make their King very unwilling to have begun the War anew, and say, that it was nothing but God's Disposition and Will on his Part, and the intolerable Wrongs on the Enemy's Part, that began this last War,) and having drawn his Army together, divided it into Three Parts, and sent them out severally, one under the Command of Monsieur de Monty, who after divers Assaults, and a Loss of many of his Men, took the Towns of Louviers and Gorbery; another part under Captain Flocquet who took Conquet, and the great Town of Verneuil in Perch with the Castle and Tower belonging to it; and a third Part under the Captain Verdenne, who took Coignac and St. Magrine near Bordeaux in Gascoigne, and then return'd to K. Charles to unite with him.

The Duke of Somerset who had manag'd the English Affairs so ill in France, that he could make little or no Opposition to these Proceedings of the French, had nothing to help himself with but Complaints to the French King of his unjust Invasions. He was answer'd, That the French wondered the English, who had taken Fougeres in the Time of Truce without any just Occasion, and refused to give Satisfaction, should look upon themselves injured by Reprisals: Yet that K. Charles might keep up a shew of Peaceableness, he appointed a Conference at the Abby of Bonport to adjust all Matters in contest between them: This Meeting prov'd Fruitless, and then the French King rais'd a mighty Army, and declared open War against the English. But Fame had before so utterly vanquish'd the English Authority in France, that there needed little Force to reduce all to the Obedience of K. Charles. It was every where noised in the English Territories, that now the Duke of Gloucester was dead the English were unable to protect them, and maintain their Conquests in France, being filled with so many Discontents and Divisions at Home that they could not mind their Affairs Abroad, which so despoised the People to a Revolt, who were never kept steady in their Loyalty to the English but by Force and Fear, that when the French King appear'd before the Towns, they without more ado open'd the Gates, and welcom'd their Sovereign to his Right; and tho' in many of the great Towns there were strong English Garrisons, as Roan (c) in Normandy, Maulisson in Guien, and other Cities, yet all was no help. As soon as the French Army came before them, the Inhabitants arm'd themselves and fell upon the English within, and the Army without fiercely assaulted them, so that it was altogether impossible to retain any Thing: All that the English could do was only to capitulate, and save their Lives. Thus the French King in a few Months became a perfect Master of Normandy, Gascoigne and Guien, tho' there wanted not Courage in most of the English Garrisons to defend themselves; but being over-power'd or undermin'd with the Treachery of the French, they were forced to leave all in the French Hands.

This Year began a Rebellion in Ireland, and the Duke of York, rather to have him out of the Way than to trust or prefer him, was sent thither with an Army; but he so well manag'd his Place, and dealing mildly and gently with that Savage People appeased their Commotions with so much Satisfaction to them, that he gain'd their Love and Favour so far, that they could never be separated from him nor his Posterity; but as well in the Misfortunes of his Family as their Prosperity firmly adhered to them. Thus did the Wicked Politicks of the Queen and her Party generally turn to her Damage. Gloucester's Death was the Destruction of her Husband's Title to the Crown, and this Employment of the Duke of York, which was intended for his Ruin, prov'd a mighty Advantage to him in his Designs against his Sovereign.

In the beginning of this Year Sir Lewis de Bueyle a French Knight, challeng'd an English Man nam'd Ralph Challons, Esquire to encounter him in a Combat, and pitch'd the Time and Place, which was at Mans in Maine, the French King himself was present according to the Custom of that Age, to behold the Courage and Skill of those Combatants. Much Art and Bravery appear'd on both Sides, but the Fortune of the Combate fell to the English Man, who ran the French Knight thro' the Body with his Spear, of which Wound he soon after dy'd. The Law of Arms in such Cases requir'd, that the Conquerour should attend the Corps of the Person killed, and celebrate his Obsequies, in Testimony of the Christian Compassion which he has for the Deceased. This Challons perform'd not only with the usual Decency, but with so much real and hearty Sorrow, that even the French King took Notice of it, and gave him some Tokens of his Favour.

King Charles and the Duke of Bretagne being follow'd with continual Success carry'd on their Victories every Day further and further. The Duke of Bretagne recover'd Fougeres, St. James de Beveron, and several other Places, which had

(c) At Roan in Normandy the English Garrison were so hard put to it by the Citizens within, and the French without, that they were forced to agree not only to deliver up that City, but several others, or they had been all murder'd. been taken from him by the English. The French King also joyning with the Counts of St. Poll and Eu, still held on his Victories, especially in Normandy, where he took Nogent by Composition. Honflur stood out the Siege, under the Command of a Captain of undaunted Valour Sir Thomas Curson, who notwithstanding their Batteries and Scaling repulsed them to their great Loss; but at length seeing it impossible to save the Town he came to a Composition with the Enemy to depart with their Lives and Goods. The Submission of this Place was a Terror to the other English Garrisons, so that some of them voluntarily yielded, as Lizenx, which was induced to it by the Bishop's Means, the Tower of Grise, which made a short Resistance, Gourney, Roche-guion, which was commanded by one John Howell, who to enjoy his Wife's Lands, a French Woman, surrendered the Place on Condition the Garrison might depart in Safety, and himself enjoy his Estate, and be employ'd in the same Station under the French King. Volognes, and many others. Other Towns were betray'd to the French, as Lagni, Gisors, and several others, so that little remain'd under the Jurisdiction of the English but Caen, whether the Duke of Somerset and all the English then in France retir'd.

Twelfth Parliament, its Acts.

A Parliament was summon'd and met November the 6. h (d) at Westminster, but nothing of Importance was enacted, only a few Acts passed to regulate Abuses in bringing Merchandizes from Holland contrary to an Act made the 27th of this King, in pressing Horses and Carts for private Use in the King's Name, and in levying Duties of Ships by Custom-House Officers. But the most remarkable Business done this Parliament was by the Bishops, who endeavour'd all they could to have the Act of Premunire repealed. They had made considerable Interests in both Houses to effect their Design, but in vain. The greater part of the Lords and Commons were so zealous for the Continuance of it, that they were constrain'd to endure that Eye-sore, which remains in Force to this Day.

A. D.
1450.
Some English
Forces sent into France to keep Normandy.

The ill Condition of the English Affairs in France, which tho' very well known in England, could not be redress'd by reason of the Divisions and Discontents that were both in Court and Country, began now to be taken a little into Consideration, and that all might not be lost, the King sent over a Supply of 1500 fresh Men under the Command of Sir Thomas Kiriell into Normandy, who landing at Cherbourg joyn'd himself with several English Captains, who held some Towns in those Parts, and made up an Army of 5000 Men, which being a pretty strong Body, they betook themselves to Action, and recover'd Lisieux and Volognes; and because they heard that the French were upon their March to besiege Caen, they thought it convenient to hinder their Design by giving them Battel by the Way, and accordingly posted themselves about Formignie, between Charenton and Baioux to receive them. On Apr. 18. the Earl of Clermont, Admiral of France, and the Seneschal of Poitou with 6000 Foot and 600 Horse arriv'd at Formignie in their Way to Caen, but finding the English there, could neither safely retreat nor go on, and so were forced to abide the Battel, which the English were forward to begin, and the French ready to receive them. This Battel was begun with much Courage on both Sides, and the English put so hard upon the French, that they were forced to give Ground, and the English got from them two Culverings; but in the End Arthur of Brittain, Earl of Richmond and Constable of France coming into the Assistance of the French with above 1000 fresh Men vanquish'd the English, slaying above 3000, and taking 800 Prisoners, among whom were several Persons of Note, as Sir Thomas Kiriell himself, Sir Henry Norbery, Sir Thomas Drew, Sir Thomas Kirkly, and several others. Sir Robert Vere and Sir Mat. Gough, that valiant Welsh Man escaped. The Victory was obtain'd, as the French Historians relate, with the Loss only of Five or Six of their Side, so that they impute this to a wonderful Work of God to them. And flush'd and encouraged by it they marched on to the Siege of Caen, which having surrounded on all sides they fiercely assaulted. The Duke of Somerset the Regent in France was then in the Town with his Wife and Children, of whom being in fear he summon'd the chief Citizens together and told them, 'That it was impossible to save the City out of the Hands of so great a Power as the King of France had about it, and to endeavour it was only to endanger themselves without hopes of Profit, and therefore advised them to agree upon as good Terms as they could, and resign the Place. This was welcome Advice to the Citizens, who were ready through Fear or Treachery to outrun any Admonition in that Kind. But it seems the Duke, though he had a plenary Authority given him over all Places under K. Henry's Jurisdiction, was not without Controul here. The City of Caen was given by K. Henry to the Duke of York, when he was Regent of France, and he had made one Sir David Hall, an hot and passionate Man, but very faithful to his Trust, Governour of it. He hearing the Duke's Advice to the Citizens, told him boldly, That he had nothing to do in that Place, which belonged to the Duke of York, and of which the Charge was committed unto him; That the Danger was not so great as he had represented it to the Citizens to terrify them, for it wanted neither Men, Money nor Ammunition, and therefore they might defend themselves at least, till they could have the Duke of York's Succour, or Order to surrender it. That as to himself he would defend it against any Power how great soever, and if the Town would resign, he would betake himself to the Castle with such Soldiers as were Faithful and Valiant, and hold it out to the last; That it is true, the Besiegers make a great noise and rattling with their Canon, but that scares Women and Children only and not Men of War. In the midst of these hot Disputes between Fear and Courage, Treachery and Fidelity, a Stone shot by the French into the Town fell down between the Dutcheffs of Somerset and her Children. Yet with more noise than hurt, for it did no harm, yet it scared the Dutcheffs so violently, that she immediately went to her Husband and besought him on her Knees to have Mercy and Compassion on his small Infants, and to see them deliver'd out of the Town with Safety. The Duke being moved at the Tears of his Wife, and not knowing how to secure her and his Children but by the surrender of the Town, yielded it up to the French fore against the Will of Sir David Hall upon these Conditions.

I. That

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28. I. That the Town and Castle of Caen should be surrendered to the French King on the First Day of July, if they were not relieved by that Time.

II. That upon the Surrender of the Town the Duke, Dutcheffs, and their Children, and all others that would leave it, might do so, the Soldiers with their Horses and Harnefs, and the Inhabitants, with their Wives, Children, and Moveables, but at their own Charges.

III. That all Persons who left the Town, should pay their Debts to the Citizens, and leave behind them all Sorts of Artillery.

IV. That the Duke of Somerset should pay for his Freedom 56000 Scutes, which is about 9600 Pound, and be bound to surrender to the French King all the Towns in Normandy, then in the Hands of the English, leaving the Lord Talbot an Hostage till both were perform'd.

Upon these Terms (for no Succour came by the Time agreed on) was the Town put into the Hands of the French; and Sir David Hall in his Heat took shipping for Ireland, to give an Account of this Action of the Duke of Somerset's to the Duke of York, and so vex'd him, that the Hatred which he owed Somerset, grew deadly. By the Surrender of this City, Normandy was all in the French King's Power except Four Towns, viz. Lisieux, of which Sir Matth. Gough was Commander; Falois, which belonged to the Earl of Shrewsbury; Damfront, and Cherbourg, which all resign'd upon Conditions within a Month after: The Liberty of the Earl of Shrewsbury, who was Prisoner at Dreux, being gain'd by the Surrender of Falois, with the Lives and Goods of the Garrison, as were those of the rest. Cherbourg was the last Town that yielded, the valiant Captain of it, Thomas Gonvall, defending it so long as they had Ammunition or Provision left to make their Defence; but at last he was forc'd to give it up, and with the rest retreat to Callis, where they found the Duke of Somerset. Thus was Normandy, Thirty Years after it was conquered by Henry V. lost clearly out of the Hands of the English, and became again the Possession of the French King. Three Causes are given for this Loss,

1. The Normans Treachery, who tho' naturally Subjects to the King of England, yet being French in Language and Customs, affected Subjection to the French King most.

2. The Duke of Somerset's Avarice, who kept not full Garrisons as he ought to have done, that he might pocket the Money allow'd for Soldiers.

3. The Divisions at Home, in which the Great Ones engaged with so much Zeal, that they had no Affection to Affairs Abroad.

These Losses in France being heard in England, and breeding a general Discontent in the People, the Fault was generally laid upon the Government; and loud Exclamations were rais'd against the Duke of Suffolk, as the chief Instrument of all their Miseries, alledging, That he it was who had delivered up Maine and Anjou to the French, procur'd the Death of the Duke of Gloucester, devour'd the King's Treasure, remov'd all the King's vertuous Council from him and plac'd in their Rooms Persons either openly Vicious, or else so addicted to his Interests, that they could not be Friends to the common Good. Lastly, That he had been the only Occasion of the Loss of Normandy. The Parliament was still Sitting, and the Queen, who was not unsensible of these Grudges against her Favourite; sought all Means to hinder any rigorous Proceedings against him; and to that End, removed the Parliament to Leicester, thinking to escape the Deluges against him, which the Londoners chiefly favour'd; but few of the Nobility appearing there, she was forc'd to bring it back to Westminster, where there was a full Appearance. And the Commons presented an Indictment to the King and Lords against the Duke of Suffolk, containing many Articles of Treason and other Misdemeanours, the Sum of which is as followeth,

I. That the said Duke of Suffolk had contriv'd and consulted with John, Earl of Dunois, commonly call'd, the Bastard of Orleans, and the other Ambassadors of the French King, then being in England, to excite and encourage their Master to invade this Realm, and destroy the King and his Friends, to the End, that he might raise his Son John, whom he had married (e) to Margaret, sole Heir to John, Duke of Somerset, the next Heir, as he pretended, to the Crown of England, to be King.

II. That being allur'd by great Rewards and Promises from the said Ambassadors, he had set at Liberty the Duke of Orleans, the King's Enemy, contrary to the express Will of Henry the Fifth.

III. That by his Advice given to the Duke of Orleans, the French King had invaded Normandy, and the other Countries of France belonging to the King, and so was now become absolute Master of all France.

IV. That being sent Ambassador into France, to conclude a Truce, he had agreed to surrender Anjou and Maine to the King's Enemies, under the plausible Pretence of a Marriage, (f) without any Commission from the King so to do, or Consent of the Ambassadors sent with him; and at his Return into England, drew the King to approve and comply with all he had done, and so forsake his Inheritance of those Countries.

V. That he had betrayed the Weakness of the King's Forts and Towns to the Enemy's Captains, when he was in France, by which they were encouraged to assault them, and took several of them.

VI. That he had betrayed the King's Councils to the French Ambassadors, when they were in England.

VII. That when Ambassadors were sent into France to conclude a Peace, he had hinder'd it, by advertising the French King of the Advantages he had against the English.

VIII. That he had as great Power and Interest with the French King, as at Home, as he boasted in the Star-Chamber.

(e) The Lady Margaret was not married to the Duke of Suffolk's Son. Her first Husband was Edmund of Hadham, Earl of Richmond, Son of Queen Katherine, and Owen Tudor, by whom she had Henry the Seventh. The Duke was only charg'd with intending to marry his Son to her.

(f) Had the Words Plausible Pretence of a Marriage been mention'd, it would have been a terrible Mortification to the Queen. But they are not in the original Articles, of which the Fourth is,

That he being Ambassador from the King of England to Charles, calling himself the French King, promised to Reynier, King of Sicill, and to Charles D'Angiers, his Brother, Enemies to the King, the Release of Anjou, with the Deliverance of the County of Maine, and the City of Maunt or Mans, without the Knowledge of the other Ambassadors with him accompanied; which Promise, after his Return, he caused to be perform'd to the King's Disinheritance and Loss irrecoverable, and to the Strength of his Enemies, and Feeblishment of the Dutchy of Normandy. Discontents among the People of England about the Duke of Suffolk's Actions.

Duke of Suffolk impeach'd in Parliament in several Articles.

A. D. 1450. IX. That being corrupted by the French King, he had kept back our Armies from going into France, to oppose the Proceedings of the French.

X. That in making the League with the French King, he had not compriz'd either the Duke of Bretagne, or King of Arragon, but suffered them to be put in by the French King, whereby their Amity was lost; and they became the French King's Allies to the Damage, not only of the Nation, but of the Duke of Bretagne's Brother, Giles, who adhering to the English Interests, lost first his Liberty, and then his Life.

The Popular Charge abovemention'd, was also alledged cursorily, but not insisted upon, and so amounted not to an Article against him. The Duke upon these Accusations was arrested, and brought to his Answer, which he deliver'd distinctly in this Manner, viz.

Duke of Suffolk's Answer to them, and Imprisonment.

1. As to the Three first Articles he denied, that he had ever thought on, much less acted any such Things as they laid to his Charge.

2. To the Fourth he alledged, that the Truce could not be concluded without surrendring those Places, and it being permitted him to act as he judged convenient, he had agreed to it.

3. To all the rest he pleaded not Guilty, and requir'd the Proofs of them, except the Tenth, which he could no ways excuse.

These Answers were judged very insufficient, and therefore to pacifie the People, he was sent Prisoner to the Tower, and a great Shew made, as tho' he should be punished severely for these his Misdemeanours; but the Queen loved him too well to do him any Harm, and therefore after he had been a Prisoner about a Month, in which Time she thought the popular Heats against him were abated, she released him, and brought him to Court, and had him in as great Favour as ever. This Restoration of the Duke of Suffolk was no sooner known, but it begat several Commotions in the Realm, and the People threatned an Insurrection. About Canterbury a great Multitude assembled together, and chose one Thomas Thany, a Fuller, their Captain, and Nick-named him Blew-beard; but before they had attempted any Thing, the King's Council being inform'd of it, sent down a Body of Men to seize their Captain and several of their Ring-Leaders, who being executed, the Rebellion ceas'd, and Suffolk was thought to stand as fast as ever. The Parliament which was adjourn'd upon this Occasion, met again, and the King and Queen went thither (g) in great State, being attended with the Duke of Suffolk as their Chief Councillor. The Commons look'd upon the Duke's Presence as a Bravado to them, and being incens'd at it, put up their Petition to the King, That the Persons, who had been instrumental in delivering up the Countries of Anjou and Maine to the King's Enemies, should be duly punish'd; and accus'd the Duke of Suffolk, Bishop of Salisbury, and Lord Say with others, as guilty of it. The King, who did not suspect that Things would have thus been reviv'd, was very fearful of a bad Effect, if Suffolk should be left at Liberty, and therefore to pacifie them, he put all the Duke's Adherents out of their Offices and Places about him, and banish'd the Duke out of the Realm for Five Years, supposing, that his Enemy's Hatred to him would cool in that Time, and then he might recompense his slight Sufferings with double Favours.

Duke of Suffolk banish'd.

The Duke seeing the Fury of his Enemies, was not backward to leave the Kingdom for a while, and to that End, having got all Things ready, took Ship to pass over into France in April. In his Way, he was met by a Ship belonging to the Duke of Exeter, then Constable of the Tower, call'd the Nicholas, which engag'd him, and the Captain having taken the Vessel he was in, after a short Fight, seized upon the Duke, and bringing him into Dover-Road, caused him to be beheaded on the Side of a Cock-boat. A very bold and strange Action, that a private Captain of a Ship should dare to put a Peer of the Realm to death, without so much as any Pretence of Order or Quarrel, so far as can be known, yet just upon Suffolk himself, who having been instrumental in the Death of the Duke of Gloucester, was himself as unjustly put to death. His Body was cast upon the Sands at Dover, and being found by his Chaplain, who, after he was taken out of his own Ship, attended, and followed him to see his Fate, was by him taken up, and conveyed to Wingfield-College, in Suffolk, (h) and there interr'd. His Memory, had he not been engag'd in the Intrigues of a Court-Favourite, which must refuse no Service to advance the Ambition of Princes, or the Design of a Court, had been very honourable to this Day; for he was a Man of good Wit and great Courage, as well able to serve a Prince as any Man, a faithful Councillor, a Lover of Piety, and a great Benefactor to the Church. He built the Parish-Church of Ewelme, in Oxfordshire, where his Seat was, and at the West-End of it, he founded an Hospital for Two Priests, and Thirteen poor Men.

Duke of Suffolk beheaded.

Duke of Suffolk's Character.

The Duke of Suffolk being dead, who, had he lived, would have been a Stop to the Duke of York's ambitious Aims, being an able Councillor, and stout Warriour, tho' thro' Imprudence grown at last odious to the People. The Duke of York, who was in Ireland, began by his Agents and Emisaries, to drive more furiously and confidently toward the Crown; and to that End, his Friends in all Companies represented the present State of the Kingdom very miserable, viz. 'That the Nation being govern'd by a sloathful King, and an Ambitious Queen, who neither of them understood the true Measures of Government, did daily decay in its Reputation and Interests, of which the Loss of France was an invincible Demonstration. That the publick Good ought to be more nearly look'd into, and Men of such Abilities rais'd to the Helm, as might both advance the Honour of the English, and be a Terror to their Enemies. That the Duke of York was a Person every Ways qualified for the greatest Trust, having given such a Proof of it in composing the Rebellion of Ireland, with so great Satisfaction to the People, as well as safety to the King. That in Reality, that Duke had the best Title to the Crown, the Family of Lancaster being no better than Usurpers; and tho' indeed King Henry would be tolerable, if he were either like his Father, or his Grandfather, whose Virtue and Courage made their bad Title overlook'd, yet since his easie and gentle Nature renders him incapable of Governing well, it is better for the People to set up a Person, who, if he had no Right, were the fittest Man in the Nation to wield a Sceptre, much more being the true Heir,

Duke of York's Ambition to obtain the Crown.

(g) The Parliament was on this Occasion adjourn'd to Leicester. Ibid. 632.

(h) Thin in his List of all the Dukes that ever were in England down to the Year 1585, says the Duke of Suffolk was buried in the Charter-House at Hull.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28. ' than suffer others to usurp the Power of doing ' them and the King himself a Mischief. This sort of Discourse which was broached by the Yorkists, was so pleasing to the Nation in general, that in a little time it became the Subject of almost all Companies Talk, and every Man's Thoughts and Wishes that would pretend to be a Friend to the Commonwealth. But though the Duke himself was not insensible of his Growth in the People's Favours and Desires, yet he was afraid to venture to claim the Crown by force of Arms, till he had made some open Tryal of the People's Affection to a Change; and to that

Jack Cade stirr'd up one Jack Cade an Irish Man, a Youth of a Princely Stature and Mien, of a very pregnant Wit, and undaunted Boldness to assume the Name of the Lord Mortimer (i), and take up Arms under the specious Pretences of reforming the Abuses of the Government, and Grievances of the Kingdom, which being grateful Themes usually to the People easily draw Abettors enow after them. The Kentish Men shewed themselves forwardest to joyn with him, and therefore he sets himself at the Head of them, and in a little time by his Promises to free the Nation from Taxes and Impositions, drew a great Multitude after him, with whom in a Martial Order he marched to Black-Heath between Eltham and Greenwich, and there encamped June 1. Here he and his Army continued near a Month pillaging the Country round about, and summoning the Citizens of London, who favoured his Design to bring him in Arms, Horses and Money, which he ordered them to levy upon the Foreign Inhabitants of that City, Genoese, Venetians and Florentines, threatening to kill as many as he could come at, if he were not obey'd. It is not known what the City did; but 'tis probable, his Desires were satisfied, because when he came into London a little after, he did no harm to any Foreigner.

In this Time the King and his Council had sent a Message to the Rebels, to know their Reasons why they assembled after this tumultuous Manner. Jack Cade took upon him to give an Answer, and assured them, That their coming was not intended for any harm to the King or his Friends, but to amend and reform the Grievances, which the Kingdom groaned under, to chastise those of his Counsellors, who oppressed the People, and tho' Flatterers of his Person, were Enemies to his Honour. In fine, Their Aim was to amend whatever was amiss, and make the Poor Commons happy. With this short Answer they sent away the King's Messengers, promising them to exhibit their Complaints and Petitions more at large to the Parliament which was then sitting at Westminster, that they might have their Concurrence with them in so good a Work, and accordingly sent Two Bills to the Houses in a few Days, the Substance of which Papers Follow.

The First they call'd, The Complaint of the Commons of Kent, and the Causes of their assembling on Black-Heath. In it they represent to the Parliament, ' That it was reported, ' that Kent should be depopulated and made a ' Forrest to revenge the Duke of Suffolk's Death, ' tho' the People of that County were no ways ' guilty of it. That the King had given the ' Revenues of his Crown to his Favourites, and ' resolved to live on Taxes raised on his Subjects, which impoverish'd his People. That ' the Lords of the Royal Blood were excluded from his Government, and mean Persons preferred, who would not administer Justice without Bribes and Gifts. That the Provisions for the King's House were taken of the Subjects, and not paid for, to the undoing of many; That the King's menial Servants falsely impeach'd many of High-Treason to get their Estates; That the King's Servants by unjust Claims of Feoffments have depriv'd divers of the Commons of their Estates and Rights; That certain Traitors, who have lost the King's Territories in France, should be punish'd without Mercy; That the Sheriffs and Under-Sheriffs of Counties, farming their Offices and Bailiwicks, are forced to extort unjust Fines from the People to pay the Sums; That the Officers of the Court of Dover in Kent vex and arrest Men in all Parts of the Country upon untrue Actions, and require great Fees of them for their Deliverance; That the Freedom of Elections of Knights of Shires hath been taken from the People by the Great Men, who send Letters to their Tenants and Dependents to choose such Men, as the People approve not of; That Collectors of the King's Taxes being made for Bribes by the Knights of the shire use many Extortions to raise them; And lastly, That the Sessions being held in the furthest Parts of the County Eastward, the People were forced to go five Days Journey to them, to their great Trouble and Damage, which they desir'd might be settled in two Places more conveniently.

The other Paper they filed, The Requests of the great Assembly in Kent, and in that humbly petition'd, ' That the King would assume to himself the Demesnes of the Crown, that he might live conformable to his Royal Dignity; That the Duke of Suffolk's Kindred should be punish'd according to the Laws of the Realm, and the Lords of the Royal Blood, viz. the Dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk taken into Favour, and intrusted in the Government, and then he would be the happiest and richest Prince of Christendom; That all Persons guilty of the Duke of Gloucester's Death be punish'd, as false Traitors to the King and Realm, and the rather, because by their Means the Duke of Exeter, the Cardinal of Winchester, and the Noble Prince the Duke of Warwick, with many other Lords and Gentlemen, and all the King's Countries in France have been lost. Lastly, That all Extortions used daily among the Common People, viz. the Green-Wax, King's-Bench, and King's-Pourpayers, and Statute of Labourers be so regulated by the King and his Council, that they may not be such an intolerable Burthen to the Commons of England.

These Bills being seen and perused as well by the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled (k), as by the King's Council, were not only condemn'd and disapprov'd, but the Authors of them judg'd proud and presumptuous Rebels, not to be gratified with fair Promises, but suppressed by force of Arms. The King who had been providing a Body of Men to chastise this seditious Crew, being thus encourag'd, order'd certain Lords with their Retinues to go before and skirmish with them, to see whether they would abide a Battel; but the Lord's Men boldly told them, That they would not fight against the Men of Kent, who had no other Aim in

(i) Of Sir John Mortimer, Brother to the Earl of March, who was beheaded in the former Reign. Ibid. 632.

(k) It does not appear that the Complaints of these People were rejected by the Parliament, only that the Council condemn'd 'em as they would have done, had they been more reasonable, considering the Method of presenting them. See Hol. pag. 634.

A. D. 1450. their rising, but to reform the Disorders of the Government: Whereupon they were forced to give Reg. 28. over their Intention. A few Days after the King having gotten an Army of 15000 Men well accoutred march'd with divers Lords to Black-Heath to fight the Rebels; but they had Intelligence of his Approach, and Cade, as if he had been afraid, retir'd the Night before into a Wood near Sevenoake, hoping that the King's Forces emboldned by his Retreat would pursue him in Disorder, and so they might rout them by lying in Ambush for them. But the King believing that thro' Fear of his Army the Multitude would dissolve of it self, return'd to London, and by the Queen's Advice, sent only a Party under the Command of Sir Humphrey Stafford and his Brother William to pursue them, that if any Parties should keep together they might disperse them. Sir Humphrey follow'd them to Sevenoake, and overtaking them fell upon them with much Fury and Zeal, but being over-power'd by the Rabble, he was slain with his Brother, and many other Gentlemen, and his whole Party discomfited. This Victory tho' scarce worth taking Notice of, yet had Two very ill Effects. For, kill Sir H.

Rebels
Stafford, and rout
his Party.

First, It alter'd the Minds of such Persons of the King's Army as were discontented at the Government, inasmuch that they wish'd, That the Duke of Tork were here to compleat the Deliverance, which Mortimer, whom they now esteem'd well of, had so happily begun, and which all Persons long'd for. The King perceiving these Things to be whisper'd among his own Soldiers, and fearing least the Londoners should rise and joyn with them, caused the Lord Say his Treasurer, whom the Rebels, cry'd much out against to be imprison'd in the Tower, resolving, if Occasion requir'd, to sacrifice him to the People's Fury. But the worst Effect of this Victory was,

Secondly, That it not only encourag'd the Rebels in further Attempts, but invited Multitudes to arm themselves to joyn with them for this pretended Reformation.

Jack Cade having armed himself with Sir Humphrey Stafford's Brigandine, and other Armour, full of guilt Nails marched in great Glory towards London with his Rabble, being in his Way joyned with many seditious and idle Persons out of Surrey, Sussex and other Places, and again pitched his Tents upon Black-Heath, where he strongly encamped himself. The Arch-bishop of Canterbury and Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham were sent thither to him by the King to commune with him about his Complaints and Petitions, and to perswade him to lay down his Arms, and submit to the King's Mercy. He answered 'em with much Gravity and Reason; but being exalted by his late Victory he resolutely told them, That he would not lay down his Arms, unless the King came in Person, and granted whatever he demanded. These Answers being brought to the King created mang Doubts in his Mind what he should do. He had neither Subjects nor Servants he could safely rely on, most approving of the Rebels Cause, if not of their Actions: Whereupon he with his Queen by the Advice of his Council departed to Killingworth-Castle, leaving no other Forces in London, but what was sufficient to guard the Tower under the Command of the Lord Scales and Sir Matthew Gough, one of the most famous Captains in the French Wars.

Cade and the Rebels
march to London.

The King's Retreat from London being heard of by Cade and his Follows, they immediately broke up their Camp, and marched towards that City, himself lodging the first Night in Southmark at the White-Hart, where hearing what a great Party of the Commons of Essex were come to his Assistance, and were encamped at Mile-End he did not doubt to carry all before him. The Citizens of London seeing the Rebels so near their City, and expecting Admittance were in doubt what to do: To deny him was very dangerous, and to give him Entrance would not prove less disadvantageous to them: Whereupon the Mayor called a Council to determine and resolve on what was to be done. Divers Opinions were among them, but most through Fear or Faction were for receiving him. Robert Horn, a Fish-monger and Alderman vehemently opposed them who were for entertaining him, which when the Rebels heard of, they were so enraged that the Mayor was forced to put him into Newgate, and open the Gates to give them Entrance, which happen'd July 2. At his first Entrance into the City (that he might gain the Favour and Love of the Citizens, and engage them more firmly to them) he caused a Proclamation to be made in the King's Name, strictly charging and commanding all his Followers. That no Man should dare to offer any Violence or Wrong to any Man, to rob, or take any thing away from any Persons without paying them for it, or commit any Outrages, or make any Quarrels in the Streets, or abuse or corrupt any Women, but all should behave themselves civilly and orderly upon pain of Death, and then he pass'd through London-Streets, and going by London-Stone struck it with his Sword, saying, Now is Mortimer Lord of this City. At Night he return'd again to his Lodgings at Southmark. On the 3d of July being Friday, this Captain of the Rebels returned again into the City, and having caused Sir James Fines, Lord Say and Treasurer of England, to be brought into the Guild-Hall of London, had him arraigned before the Lord Mayor and several of the King's Judges, who by his Order sat there to try him. The Lord Say, as in Law he might, demanded his Priviledge to be try'd by his Peers, but this Plea being dilatory, and he denying to answer to the Accusations brought against him before such incompetent Judges, Cade took him by force from the Officers and brought him to the Standard in Cheapside, where he caused his Head immediately to be cut off, not giving him so much Time as to make an end of his Confession. His Head he put on the top of a Spear, and had it carry'd before him, his Body he caused to be drawn naked at an Horse's-Tail through the City as far as his Inn in Southmark, and there to be quartered. Nor was his Rage against this Nobleman hereby satisfied; but sending to the Fleet-Prison he fetched from thence Sir James Cromer, his Son-in-law, who married his Daughter, then Sheriff of Kent, and for some Extortions he had committed in his Office carried him to Mile-End to the Essex Rebels, and there beheaded him. His Head also he fix'd upon a Pole, and had it carried before him with his Father's into the City, the Bearers making them kiss in every Street to move Laughter from the Beholders, and in his Return to Southmark had 'em set upon London-Bridge.

Cade admitted into the City.

The Lord Say tried by the Rebels.

These two Days the Citizens had nobly feasted and courteously entertained Cade and his Captains; for Alderman Malpas at his own Charge gave them a great Dinner; and one Chorffis of St. Margaret Patin's Parish did the like; but on the third Day they began ungratefully to requite their kind Hosts, robbing their Houses, with many other of the richest Citizens, Cade and his Captains treated by the Citizens.

A. D. 1450. Reg. 28. of whose Wealth they could get Information; and if they found no Treasure, made them pay great Fines for the Safety of their Lives and Goods. Alderman Horn, who had a little before exposed himself to their Rage by his Loyalty to the King, and Zeal for the Safety of the City, was now in Danger of losing his Life; but his Wife and Friends perceiving that Cade loved Money, went to him, and for 500 Marks purchased his Liberty.

Citizens keep the Rebels out of the City. This Action of the Rebels frightened the Citizens, who seeing the ill Effects of admitting the Rebels began to repent that they accepted not of Alderman Horn's Advice. Neither their Lives nor Goods, Wives nor Daughters were safe from the Rapine and Abuses of a rude Rabble: Wherefore they resolved to keep out of their City this wicked Captain, and his mischievous Company, and to that End they sent to the Tower to the Lord Scales and Sir Matthew Gough to assist them. The Lord Scales readily consented to their Desires, and promised them to play upon the Rebels with the Cannon of the Tower, and appointed Sir Matthew Gough to aid the Mayor and Aldermen all he could in this Attempt, by whose Advice they having gotten together the Train-bands of the City, planted themselves to keep the Bridge against them, and denied the Rebels Entrance. Their Captain hearing that the City opposed their Converse among them, ordered his Men to force their Passage, by which means rose a sharp Fight upon the Bridge, sometime the Citizens, and sometimes the Rebels having the better of it, but neither were able to drive the other quite from it. The Fight continued many Hours, till at length both Parties being wearied and tired, a Cessation of Arms was agreed upon till the next Day; but upon this Condition, That neither the Londoners should go into Southwark, nor the Rebels into London.

Arch-Bishop's device to appease the Rebellion. This Contest tho' not great, cost the Citizens some Lives of great Value, as Alderman Sutton, Robert Haisard, and Sir Matthew Gough, a Man whose Life was worth a Million of theirs that slew him; but it was really the Conquest of the Rebels by the wise Improvement and Management of the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, John Stafford. For this great Statesman being then Chancellor observing, that the Hearts of the Rebels began to faint, having the City of London for their Enemy, and that Jack Cade to strengthen his Party was forced to open the Prisons of the King's Bench and Marshalsea, and give Liberty to that rascally Crew to support the Cause, in which they were the only fit Persons to engage, sent for the Bishop of Winchester to him in the Tower (the latter at Haliwel for Safety) and having consulted with him, formed a general Pardon for all Offences hitherto committed, and put the Broad-Seal to it, and passing into Southwark caused it to be publicly proclaim'd there. The poor deluded People, who long'd to be dismissed, were so glad to hear it, that without any Respect to their Captain, they left him and departed Home, glad to secure themselves, as fast as they could. Jack Cade being thus deserted by all but a very few, and not daring to stay for such Succours as were promised him by the Favourers of the Duke of York, thought it the wisest Course to provide for his own Safety by Flight; and having sent the best of his Plunder by Water to Rochester, fled in Disguise into Sussex into the Wood-Country adjoining to Lewis, thinking so to escape, and by gathering a Rebellion again to compass his Designs, which being known to the King's Council, a Proclamation bearing Date July 10. was put out to encourage all Persons with the Reward of 1000 Mark to apprehend him, and bring him alive or dead to the King or his Council. Alexander Eden a Gentleman of Kent accidentally (1) seeing the said Cade in a Garden at Hothfield in Sussex, valiantly attempted to take him, and in fight with him slew him, and bringing him up to London in a Cart he receiv'd the Reward promised, and generously won. His Body was quartered, and the four Parts of it sent into several Parts of Kent, his Head being set on London-Bridge.

After this the King himself went into Kent, and sat in Judgment upon several Persons, who either were excepted in the Pardon, or had been again stirring up Rebellion in those Parts, and caused many of them to be executed in almost every great Town as well in Sussex as Kent to be a Terror to all Persons, who shall offend in the like Nature for the future. But yet so merciful was the King, that whereas above 500 Persons were obnoxious to his Justice, he punished only the Authors, or chief Leaders in the Treason.

Several seditious Assemblies of People. In the time of these Tumults about London there were also several Seditious Assemblies in other Parts, as in Wiltshire, Hampshire and London which did much Mischief; and among other Things William Ascoth, Bishop of Salisbury after he had said Mass at Edington, was by his own Tenants taken from the Altar in his Albe, and with his Stole about his Neck, and being carried to the top of an Hill adjoining to the Town, was there shamefully murdered on June 29. and stripped to the Skin: His Shirt which was dyed in his Blood they divided among them, and display'd the Parts of it as Ensigns of their Wickedness which they glory'd in. His Chariot had been robbed the Day before of 10000 Marks.

French King gets Aquitaine. While the Affairs of England were in this Confusion, Charles the French King made use of the Opportunity to get Aquitaine into his Hands, just as he had done Normandy before, and to that End sent the Earls of Ponthiwerres and Perigord to besiege Bergerat in Guien, situate upon the River of Dourdon, of which Captain Gedding was Commander. The French Forces consisted of 2500 Horse and Lances, which was too powerful an Army for a small Garrison to oppose: Wherefore, because the Captain could expect no Relief he made his Composition, that the English should march out on Horse-back, and have Liberty to carry out all their Goods, the Inhabitants enjoying their own as formerly, and so left the Town to the French. But yet the Lord Camois, Sir George Seimour, and Sir John Arundel, with divers other valiant Captains, who had the Government of the Country bestir'd themselves much to preserve it to the English by manning the Towns as well as they could, comforting the Hearts of the Gascoignes with Promises of Rewards, and sending Letters into England for speedy Aid, certifying the King, That unless they could have Relief soon the whole Country would inevitably be lost. But all they could get was fair Promises, no Relief appeared, nor Aid came; whereupon the French Men pursuing their Victories got the Towns of Janfaike by Assault, in which 35 English were killed, and all the rest made Prisoners of War; Monferat, St. Foy and Chalons, which all yielded upon Conditions, because they saw it in vain to hazard their Lives and Estates. Burdeaux indeed made a small Resistance, having some Advantage upon Monsieur de Orval, Third Son of Monsieur de la Bresse, who was marching with 4 or 5000 Men to invade the Isle of Madock. The Garrison of Burdeaux having Intelligence of it, issued out with an equal Number of English and Townsmen to fight him, hoping, if they could vanquish them, to set a Period to the French Conquests. D'Orval was as ready to receive them, as they to attack him; and accordingly they came to a Battel, but the Men of Burdeaux were beaten with the Loss of 600, and 1300 taken Prisoners. The French got not this Victory without some Hurt, for they lost 800 Men; but the Glory of Conquest made Recompence for all, tho' the City yet held out.

Thirteenth Parliament, its Acts.

Upon St. Leonard's Day, which is November the Sixth, began the Parliament to sit at Westminster, wherein little was done, but only One Act made, whereby Jack Cade was attainted of High Treason, and all his Lands, Tenements and Goods given to the King, and his Blood made for ever corrupt. In the Beginning of this Session came the Duke of Somerset out of Normandy into England; and tho' he was welcom'd Home by the King and Queen, and her Party, yet thro' the Duke of York's Means, and because of the great Losses which had happen'd in France under his Regency, he was but roughly entertain'd by the People, who cried out against him as the Cause of the Loss of Normandy, and particularly of the City of Caen, the Metropolis of it (m). The Commons in Parliament assembled could not but take notice of the popular Clamours, and representing to the King his ill Conduct in France, and treacherous surrendring several Places to the French, caus'd him to be arrested and imprison'd December the First, which so animated the Rabble about London against him, that they got together in great Multitudes, and plunder'd his House in the Black-Friers, carrying away such rich Household Goods, as were portable, and defacing and spoiling the rest. The King hearing of these Tumults, put out a severe Proclamation, which he caus'd to be publish'd in several Streets of the City, making it Death for any Man to spoil or rob Houses; yet this did not quiet the Rabble, till one of them was beheaded in Cheapside for doing contrary to it.

The Bastard of Orleans, with his Brother John, Earl of Angouleme, and many other French Captains, being encourag'd with almost the daily Success of their Arms, carry on their Victories with great Zeal, that they might make their Master the compleat King of all his Country. And to this End, they besieged Montguion, which held out 8 Days, and then despairing of Relief, yielded; and then went to Blay, a Town standing on the Banks of the Garonne, which having been lately victuall'd and stor'd with Ammunition, stood out against them; but the French fearing no Force without, were resolv'd that none within should hold it out long; and to that End, besieged it both by Water and Land, and after several Assaults, took it, having slain and taken Prisoners above 200 English. Some few got into the Castle with the Captains, but held it out no longer than they could make a good Capitulation, and then rendred it with themselves into the Hands of the French. The other Towns, as Burgh, Liborne and Acques, delivered up their Keys at the first Summons. Other Captains of the French Party were as active in other Places; and Dunois took Fronsac, a Place impregnable. The Earl of Arminack, an inveterate Enemy to England, took the strong Town of Rion, and the Earl of Ponthieur Chatillon in Perigord. Fronsac held them out till the Feast of St. John Baptist, in hopes to have Relief; but none coming, they surrendred according to Covenant. The honourable Conditions upon which they surrendred, shew that the French were glad to gain it on any Terms. They were these,

I. That the Garrison should march out with their Horses and Arms, and leave their Artillery behind them.

II. That those that would swear Allegiance to King Charles, should enjoy their Goods and Estates, in whatever Part of the Kingdom they were, and be pardon'd all former Faults.

III. That all that would serve the King of France in his Wars, whether Citizens or Soldiers of the Garrison, should have like Entertainment as his other Soldiers.

IV. That several English Prisoners named, should be set at Liberty without Ransome.

Which being granted, the English left the Town, and went to Burdeaux, which was also soon after besieged; but made no Resistance, only demanded Time for the coming of Succour, which not appearing by the Day appointed, the Garrison by Capitulation sailed into England. These strong Cities being resign'd, all the other Towns in Guienne surrendred immediately except Baion, which the Earl of Dunois besieged August the Sixth. This was a very strong Town, and withstood the French Force, till a great Breach in the Wall being made by their Artillery, they saw they must be taken, and so came to an Agreement, but hard enough, viz. That the Garrison should depart with their Arms, and the City pay 40000 Crowns. The French Historians relate a Miracle that happen'd the next Day after the Surrender of it, which much settled the French in their Allegiance to K. Charles. In a clear Day, and serene Sky, there appear'd a white Cloud in the Form of a Crucifix, with an Azure Crown on the Top of it, which afterward in the Sight of a Thousand admiring Spectators, was changed to a Flower-de-Luce, and then within half an Hour after vanish'd. This being generally known, was thus interpreted, That God by this Prodigy of a White Cross, did admonish them to relinquish their Subjection to the English, whose Badge was a Red Cross, and become firm and faithful Subjects to their own King, whose Ensign was a White Cross, and Arms, a Flower-de-Luce. Whether this were true or no, it is not material to examine; 'tis certain, that all these Revolts from the English, proceeded so much from a real Affection to the French King, and were accompanied with such Hatred to the English, that they were never likely to recover any of their Losses again, if they could retain the Little they had left, which was only Callis, Hames and Guisnes. Thus thro' the Factions of the Nobles and Commons in England, caus'd by the Queen's ill Management, was the English Interest in France quite neglected, and all their Territories lost.

The Duke of York yet being in Ireland, was nevertheless believ'd to be the Fomeater and Stirrer up of Jack Cade's Rebellion, and the other Disorders of the Nation by his Friends and Emisaries; and tho' he was at first thought

For these Reasons the King sent out his particular Orders into Wales, Cheshire, Shropshire and other Places, to hinder the Duke from Landing, if he brought any Number of Men along with him; and several Persons were employ'd to set their Friends in Ireland a-work, to take notice of his Motions and Actions which might tend to Rebellion; that if any Thing of that Nature appear'd, the King by timely Intelligence might provide for it. This after it was known to the Duke, he took very ill, and by Letter expostulated concerning it to the King, assuring him, That he always had been, and ever would be the King's true Subject. The King denies not the Fact, but owns that he did give such Orders, because of the several seditious Speeches which had been given out concerning him, as well by Seamen as others, which he took to be just Cause of Fears; but since he had declar'd, That he had never intended any such Thing, the King in his Answer concludes his Letter thus. For the Easing of your Heart in all such Matters, We declare, repete, and admit you, as our true and faithful Subject, and faithful Cousin.

King Henry's Progress and his Acts at Exeter.

Towards the Latter End of this Year of the King's Reign, King Henry took a general Progress over the Nation, and came to the City of Exeter July 16th. being St. Kenelm's Day, where he was honourably receiv'd by the Clergy, who met him Three Miles from the City, and convey'd him to the Cathedral first, and then to the Bishop's House, where he lodg'd. During his Abode, he caus'd a Sessions to be held before the Duke of Somerset, to try several notorious Criminals and Traitors, who had fled to that Sanctuary, and condemn'd several of them to Death. The Bishop and Clergy hearing of it, came with heavy Complaints to the King, that by holding a Sessions there, he had violated the Privilege of the Sanctuary, and that these actions being against Law, were of no effect. The King and his Council told the Bishop, 'That it was a Scandal to the Church and Religion, that such holy Places should be a Patronage and Defence to such wicked Men, which the Law of God had commanded to be punish'd by the Magistrate's Sword: That the Persons condemn'd, were the most notorious Malefactors found guilty upon a Legal Examination and Tryal, and ought to be punish'd for a Terror to others: That if all Sorts of Crimes might find a Safety in Sanctuaries, contrary to their first Intention, Justice would be laid aside, and none punish'd but such as were not nimble enough to get in to these Places. All these Arguments would not prevail. Holy Church, nor the Sanctuary must not be prophan'd (as they said) with deciding of temporal Matters, and passing Sentences of Condemnation; tho' God orders expressly, That all wilful Offenders should be taken from the Altar and punish'd. These Exclamations mov'd the mild King so, that he let fall his lawful Proceedings, and releas'd many notorious Traitors and Criminals, tho' as he judg'd to the Disgrace of the Church; and soon after return'd to London.

The Duke of York, having receiv'd Intelligence in Ireland of the bad Success of his Affairs in England, that Jack Cade was defeated, and his Company wholly routed, resolv'd to go himself into England to consult with his Friends, and lay a better Foundation for his Proceedings. About Michaelmas he left Ireland, and came to Shore in England at Beau-maris, an Haven of Anglesey, in Northwales, intending to have landed there; but by the King's Order and Command, he was kept from it by certain Officers sent by the King thither, viz. Henry Norrice, Deputy-Chamberlain, Tho. Norrice, his Brother, William Buckley, William Gruff and Bartholomew Bold, saying, That he was a Traitor, and an Enemy to the King, and should have neither Landing, Refreshing, nor Lodging for Men or Horses there. These Words highly offended the Duke, but he had no Remedy but Patience; wherefore Coasting a while, he got a safe landing Place, and posted with all Speed to his Friends and Well-wishers, who waited for his Arrival at London. His chief Assistants and Counsellors were John Mowbrey, Duke of Norfolk; Richard Nevill, Earl of Salisbury, in Right of his Wife, who was Daughter and Heir to the valiant Hero, Thomas Montague, who was slain in the fatal Siege of Orleans; the Lord Richard Nevill, his Son, who was afterwards Earl of Warwick, by the Marriage of the Lady Ann Beauchamp; Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, who married the Duke of Somerset's Daughter, yet sided against her Father; and Edward Brook, Lord Cobham. All of them Persons of great Authority, numerous Attendants, and daring Valour. These with others of his Friends of less Note, had divers Meetings and Consultations how to raise him to the Throne; and at last came to a Resolution, That the Duke of York should raise an Army under a Pretence of the Publick Good, viz. to remove the bad Counsellors about the King, and revenge the manifest Injuries and Wrongs done to the Kingdom by the Persons now in Authority, and particularly the Duke of Somerset, who had lost Normandy; and being chief in Favour with the Queen, was suppos'd to manage all. But that he might have the fairer Pretences to do this, it was advis'd, That he should first advertise the King himself of it by Letter, that it might be redress'd; and if he obtain'd it not, (as he knew 'twas not any ways likely he should) then his taking Arms would be the more justifiable, and the People would the more certainly and readily take part with him. The Duke was not slack to follow these Methods, and accordingly in a few Days dispatch'd a Letter to the King, in which he submissively tells him, *That great Murmur and Grudging was universally in the Realm, because Justice was not duly administred against such as trespassed and offended against the Laws; and especially against such as were indicted of High-Treason, or said openly to be guilty of it, whereby great Inconveniences have arisen to the Realm. Wherefore he counsels and advises the King, offering himself to be an Assistant in it, forthwith to ordain and provide, that impartial Justice be done to punish the said Offenders, and redress all Disorders in Government; and to that End, to send his Writs out to arrest such Persons as are guilty of it, of what Estate or Degree soever they be, and to commit them to the Tower of London, and other Prisons, there to remain without Bail or Mainprize, till they shall be deliver'd thence by Course of Law, and particularly the Duke of Somerset. The King not suspecting the Design, nor observing how he sought an Occasion to quarrel with him, returns him this Answer. *That he had determin'd sometime since with himself to erect a Council, (of which he had appointed

A. D. 1452. Duke of York raises an Army in Wales, and marches to London. This Answer, tho' as full as could be expected from a King to a Subject, did not at all satisfy, but the Duke immediately goes into Wales to levy an Army under Colour of removing bad Counsellours, and preserving the Nation from Ruin, and in a little time gather'd a great Number of People to assist him in his Enterprize. The King had soon Information of the Duke's Actions and Doings in those Parts from his Friends there, and having raised a strong Army, marched into Wales with the Duke of Somerset (now set at Liberty) along with him, intending to suppress the growing Rebellion in its Rise; but the Duke of York had Notice of the King's March towards him, and declined him, hoping to increase his Numbers in his Passage and to get Possession of London, to which he was resolv'd to go directly. The King was not presently sensible of the Duke's March by him, and so he recovered London before the King could overtake him; tho' after he heard that he was march'd that way, he followed him with all convenient Speed. The Duke sent some of his Friends before him to the Citizens to represent his Undertaking to them, and shew them, that he had put his Life in his Hands, and adventured the Loss of all that was dear to him, that he might retrieve the Nation from impending Ruin; and since London was the Capital City, they were chiefly concerned to join with him in so noble an Attempt, which if they would do, he doubted not of such Success as should enable him to requite their Favours with infinite Advantage to them: But the Londoners dared not to venture a second Time, since they had been so Unsuccessful in Jack Cade's Rebellion, and so deny'd to receive him into their City. The Duke tho' greatly disappointed dissembled his Anger, and crossing over the Bridge

Duke of York encamp'd at Burnt-Heath, and the King on Black-Heath. at Kingstone, pitched his Camp on Burnt-Heath near Dartford, within Ten or Twelve Miles of London, with Trenches and Artillery. The King who followed the Duke the faster because he seem'd to flee, came up to London soon after and encamped his Army on Black-Heath, a few Miles distant from him; but before he would come to a Battel being very sparing of his Subject's Blood on both Sides, he sent the Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bourchier, Bishop of Ely, Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of his Privy-Seal to know of the Duke for what Causes he had taken up Arms to disturb the Peace of the King and his Good Subjects, and to exhort him to submit to the King's Mercy and lay down his Arms. The Message was deliver'd to him by these Persons, and he answer'd, That he had taken up Arms not to do any Damage to the King, either in his Honour or Person, nor any of the King's good Subjects, but to remove from him several ill-disposed Persons of his Council, Enemies of their Country and King, who abused the Nobility, oppressed the Clergy, and impoverished the Commons, of whom the Duke of Somerset was the Chief, and if the King would put him into safe Custody, till he should in Parliament make a Defence to such Things, as should be objected against him, he would dismiss his Troops, and present himself before the King, and serve him as all good Subjects ought to do. The Bishops and Lords, who were sent from the King, had a Commission to grant any reasonable Terms of Agreement which the Duke should require, and therefore assured him, that the Duke of Somerset should immediately be clap'd up in Prison, and so the Duke on the first of March dismissed his Army, and broke up his Camp according to his Promise.

This Peace which might seem to favour of Cowardise, was made by the Duke out of Policy and good Consideration; for the King's Army was much greater than his, and consisted of much better Soldiers, so that he was in danger to have lost all, if he had come to a Battel; Besides, he had a further Reason to dismiss his Army, which he more relied on, and that was, That by dismissing his Men upon Promises of a Reformation, he would give the Nation a Proof, that he purely fought their Good, and not his own Advancement, that he aimed not at the Crown, but publick Welfare.

Some Days after Things were thus composed the Duke of York went to the King's Tent at Black-Heath, but contrary to his Expectation finding the Duke of Somerset at Liberty, he burst out into a Passion, and complain'd of the King's Breach of Promise in not imprisoning him, whom he accused of Treason, Bribery, Oppression, and many other Crimes, but Somerset as hotly recriminated, telling him, That he was the greatest Traitor, affirming, that he had contrived with his Friends and Accomplices to depose the King and assume the Crown to himself and Posterity. The King was amaz'd at the Words of both Sides, and put off the Hearing of them to a full Council, which he resolv'd immediately to call; and to that End return'd to London with all speed, and summon'd all his Nobles together at Westminster. By the Way it was much wonder'd at, that the Duke of York was carried as a Prisoner, but Somerset went at large. Before the King and his Council thus met the two Dukes charged each other with great Crimes. York urged all the popular Accusations, as the Loss of Normandy, Bribery, and Oppression of the People with much Zeal, and many Aggravations. Somerset answer'd them all, and added further, That the Duke of York had long ago resolv'd upon the Ruin of the King, and the House of Lancaster, that he might make himself King, and transfer the Crown upon himself and his Family, and to that End had conspired with many others how he might do it with most Certainty and least Danger: That if the Duke of York and his whole Family were not now punish'd with Death for these Crimes, such a Civil War would ensue as would prove the utter Destruction of the King and Kingdom. The Duke of York utterly denied this heavy Charge, and the Council was inclined to accept his Denial, as an Argument of his Innocency, partly because they thought, that if he had really been guilty of any such Crime, he would not have dismissed his Army so easily, and partly because there was a Rumour spread abroad, that the Earl of March, the Duke of York's Eldest Son was coming up to London with a great Army of March-men to deliver his Father, which concurring with some Necessities of State to use the King's Army in Gascoigne, which Province having sent the Earl of Kendall and Lord D'Espar to offer their Obedience again, if they could be sure of Defence from the French, the Duke of York was discharged after he had taken an Oath in St. Paul's Church before the King and all his Nobility, to

to this Effect. ' That he is, and ever would be the King's humble and faithful Subject, and bear him Faith and Truth all the Days of his Life; That he would at no Time assent to any thing attempted or done against his noble Person, and if he had Knowledge of any such Purposes would discover them to the King's Highness, and do all he could to hinder them; That he would never take any thing upon him against the King's Royal State or Obedience, nor suffer others so to do, but come always at the King's Commandment, unless hindered by Sickness; That he would not for the future assemble or gather together any People unless at the King's Command, or in his own Defence, but if he were wronged or aggrieved would proceed after a Course of Law for Remedy of them: All this he promised to observe and keep by the Holy Evangelists, which he laid his Hand on, the Cross, which he touched, and the Holy Sacrament, which he was about to receive; and desired that if he ever attempted any Thing by Arms against the King's Majesty, he might be forever accounted a forsworn Man, and deprived of his Estate and Dignity; declaring, that he did all this without any Constraint, and so subscribed and sealed it. The Duke of York being set at Liberty by these Means went to his Castle of Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, and there kept himself as it were in Private, yet not without his Spies upon the Court, and the Duke of Somerset's Actions, who after his Departure was freed from his Rival, and rose higher in the Favour of the King and Queen than ever, ruling and governing all, as he pleased.

The King and Council having wisely composed this Domestick Broil, though indeed it was but like a Sore skinned over for the present, which breaks out more violently, fell close to a Consultation, how to answer the Expectation of the People of Gascoigne, who being oppressed with the King of France's Army, and with Taxes longed for the old Liberty they enjoyed under the English, and grew weary of the French Yoke. Delays in this Case are dangerous. The Commons are fickle and unconstant. The Gascoignes if not eased might and would change their Minds, and turn to the French again: Whereupon an Army was dispatched into France under the Command of the valiant Lord Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, who though a Person always diligent, yet in this Case out-did himself, and with 3000 men arrived in the Isle of Madocke before he was suspected. His Design was to march directly to Bordeaux, but was stopped in his Way a few Days by the strong Town of Fronsacke, which held out against him, yet after a fierce Assault yielded; and he used the Inhabitants the more severely, because he would terrifie the neighbouring Towns, which without more ado returned to their Obedience. The City of Bordeaux hearing of Talbot's Arrival sent Messengers by Night to him to take Possession of the City, which he neglected not one Moment to do, and got before the Town, the French having no Suspicion of them. At his Arrival the Citizens opened a Gate to give the English Entrance, which when the French Garrison observed, they endeavoured to have saved themselves at a Postern, but being pursued most of them were taken and imprisoned, but very few or none slain, either of them or the Townsmen. The Lord D'Espar and his Friends were very serviceable to the English in taking the Town. The Lord Talbot fixed here a while to fortifie the City, and confirm them in their Duty to K. Henry, that he might more safely leave them to regain the adjoining Country.

A. D. 1452. Reg. 31. King of France raises an Army to oppose the Lord Talbot.

While he was doing this, K. Henry sent over a Recruit of 2200 Men to join with him with Victuals and Ammunition under the Command of the Bastard of Somerset, Sir John Talbot, Son to the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Molins, Harington and Camois, and some others, with which he marched into the Country about Bordeaux, and obtained many Towns and Villages without striking a stroke, the Inhabitants gladly embracing the Opportunity of submitting to the English under the Pretence of Fear and Force, to which they had such Inclinations through the Severity of their new Lord. The King of France hearing of this Invasion by the English, and with what Success they went on in taking Towns, raised an Army to oppose them, and sending his Son-in-law Count Clermont, and Messieurs de Lorhac and Orvall with 600 Horse, and 1200 Crossbow-men to put some stop to their Progress till he could gather a bigger Force, came in a few Days to them with 22000 Men, of which he kept 15000 in a Body, and sent the rest under the Marshal De Lorhac to besiege Chastillon, a Town which had lately revolted to the English. The Lord Talbot was as zealous to keep what he had gotten, as gain more, and therefore made haste to raise the Siege, having with him 5000 Foot, and 800 Horse. In his Way he took a Tower fortified by the French, and meeting with a Party of 500 which were come out a Foraging, he encountered them, slew and took many of them, the rest flying to the Camp at Chastillon, gave Notice to them of Talbot's Approach. The French hearing it were afraid to hold on their Siege, and withdrew in good Order into their Camp which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with Ordnance. Talbot had Information, that the Siege was remov'd, and that the French had so placed themselves, that he could not attack them but at a great Disadvantage, yet knowing that the main Army of the Enemy was near, and that it would be almost impossible to free himself of it without fighting, he went on and assaulted the Camp with so much Fierceness, that he at last gain'd the Entry into it, after a long and dubious Contest; but riding himself in the midst of his Soldiers to encourage them in this brave Action, was surrounded by his Enemies, and with an Hand-gun-shot through his Thigh, which killed his Horse, and he fell to the Ground, and so being in their Power was slain. His Son Sir John Talbot, Lord Lisle was close by his Father when this Accident happen'd, who advised him to save himself by Flight, because the Victory was lost, and it would be Fool-hardiness, not Courage to oppose a desperate Fate. He was young, and might do his Country Service, if he would reserve himself to a more lucky Juncture, but it would stain all his former Actions so to do. The young Man though never in a Battel before, yet had so much of his Father's Courage in him, that he would not shrink back, and chose rather to die with his Father than accept that Advice which might make him look not like his Son. With him died also Sir Henry Talbot his Bastard Brother, and Sir Edward Hall with 300 others, Men of Note and Valour. The Lord Molins and 60 more were taken Prisoners, the rest that saved themselves escaped to Bordeaux, the Slain on the English Side were 1000, the French say 2000. The Lord Talbot being thus kill'd in the 80th Year of his Age, and the English Army routed, Chastillon surrender'd it self into the Hands of the French upon Conditions, That the English

A. D. 1453. Garrison might march out with their Goods, and pass safely to Bordeaux. The Body of this brave Man lay sometime among the Dead undiscover'd, but being after found out by his Friends, was carried to Whitchurch in Shropshire, and there interr'd. After this Defeat, the French Towns revolted as fast from the English as they before came over to them, so that the French King in a few Weeks recover'd all Gascogne except Bordeaux, which being the last that held for the English, the French King besieg'd it in Person with his whole Army, resolving not to leave it till he had taken it. The Citizens valiantly defended themselves as long as they had any Provisions left, but being oppress'd by Famine, were forc'd to capitulate. The French King willingly accepted their Proposals, and granted them almost as easie Conditions as they could desire; for his Army was as severely afflicted by the Plague without, as the Besieged were by Famine within; so the City of Bordeaux was yielded to the French on these Conditions.

Bordeaux retaken.

I. That the English might have Liberty with all their Substance to depart safely into England or Calis, and the Gascognes enjoy their Goods and Possessions.

II. That the Lords D'Espar, Duras, and 30 others, should never upon pain of Death be found in any of the French King's Dominions.

And thus was the Dutchy of Aquitain wholly lost, after it had been in the English Hands near 300 Years.

Reg 32. In the Beginning of this Year of his Reign, had King Henry a long Sickness at Claringdon, in which he was in great Danger of his Death, and happy had he been, if God had taken him away from the Troubles, which were shortly to come upon him; but it pleased the Almighty to lengthen out his Life, and by the Use of Means to restore him to his former Health, which concurring with another great Blessing to the Royal Family, the Birth of a Prince, caus'd great Joy at Court, and thro' the whole Nation, with those who bore a good Will to the Lancastrian Line. For Queen Margaret was deliver'd of a Son at Westminster, October 13. who was shortly after Christned by the Name of Edward. But the Yorkists, who sought to establish the Duke of York and his Family in the Throne, and were hot in contriving the Ways to it, spake disgracefully and scornfully of this Birth; and gave it out, That the King was insufficient and unable to get a Child, and therefore it was an adulterous Brat; but others thinking this Slander too notorious, because the King was not above Two or Three and Thirty Years Old, and might well enough be suppos'd able to father a Child, unless a natural Impotency could have been prov'd against him, which neither was, nor could be, denied not that the Queen had a Child; but dying soon after its Birth, the Prince was another's Child put in his stead. The King and Queen were much disturb'd at these vile Reports of their Enemies; but the King was not at all displeas'd with the Queen, which shew'd he had no Suspicion of her; and it can't be reasonably suppos'd, that a Person of such eminent Piety, as K. Henry was allow'd to be by his Enemies, would be privy to so ill a Design, as to accept another's Child for his own, so that the Satisfaction which the King took in the Birth of the Prince, and testified in Feasting the Court, and creating divers Noblemen as his Two Brethren by Mother's side, he made Edmund, Earl of Richmond, and Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, must be allow'd Arguments sufficient to clear the Queen's Innocency with all impartial Persons, tho' they would not satisfy their Enemies, who were resolv'd to deprive both Father and Son of the Crown.

John Norman, who this Year was made Mayor of London, was sworn at Westminster according to the common Custom, upon the Morrow after the Feast of St. Simon and St. Jude's Day; but whereas formerly the Mayor used to ride with great Pomp, attended with the Aldermen, and a numerous Train thro' the City to Westminster, to be sworn. This Mayor was rowed in Barges to the great Advantage of the Watermen, who foreseeing the Profit, made a Song upon his Commendation, beginning, Row the Boat Norman, Row to the Lemman, &c. From him and his Time hath the Custom been deduc'd which still continues, for the Mayor to go by Water to Westminster to be sworn, and pity it is, it should be ever alter'd, which is so beneficial a Custom to the poor Watermen.

A little before Christmas in this Year died John Kemp, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was translated from the See of Tork to that See in the Room of John Stafford. Thomas Bouchier, Bishop of Ely, Son to the Countess of Stafford, and Brother to Henry Bouchier, Earl of Essex, was remov'd to the See of Canterbury, being made Bishop of that See, by Nicholas V. then Pope of Rome. He behav'd himself so well in this great Station, that King Henry made him his Chancellor, and Pope Paul II. rais'd him to the Dignity of Cardinal, so that he was as great a Man, as ever sat in that Archiepiscopal Seat.

The Wars of France being now at an End, the Civil Dissentions between the Houses of Tork and Lancaster began in contending for the Crown. Richard, Duke of Tork, was the Author of this War, and tho' he had sworn to King Henry never to disturb his Peace, nor move any Rebellion against him; yet his ambitious Desire of Rule would not let him rest, till he had the Crown on his Head. His Title indeed was very fair according to the Laws of this Realm, being the great Grandson of Lionell, Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, by whom the Three Henries derived their Right to the Crown. But King Henry VI. tho' his Title was not so fair and clear, yet not being the Usurper himself, but succeeding upon the Usurpation of his Father and Grandfather, Two most excellent Princes, and being himself of known Goodness and Piety, had so deep an Hold in the People's Affections, both for his Father's Sake as well as his own, that any barefac'd Pretensions to the Crown, especially considering that none of the Line of the Duke of Clarence were ever in Possession of the Throne, would have appear'd both strange and ridiculous. And therefore the Duke of Tork spent most of this Summer in insinuating Jealousies into the Heads of the People, and by common Bruits and Reports to foment their Discontents. The Two Things which he chiefly buzz'd into their Ears, were,

1. That King Henry, tho' a very pious, good Man, was too meek and mean-Spirited to rule a Kingdom, which not his Enemies only thought of him, but his Friends, who abus'd his Weakness, and usurp'd his Power; the Queen and the Duke of Somerset ruling all at their Pleasure, and leaving him nothing but the Name of King, which certainly was an intolerable Encroachment upon the People, and a Shame to England all over the World, to be govern'd by a Woman and her Minions. That the Condition of the

Reg. 33. 2. That notwithstanding he had once taken up Arms to rescue the Kingdom out of the Hands of the Duke of Somerset, and bring him to an Account for the unfaithful Management of his Trust in his Regency in France, in losing the whole Dukedom of Normandy, and had by Agreement laid down his Arms upon the King's Promise, that Somerset should be kept in safe Custody, and give an Answer to all Accusations brought against him the next Parliament, which was soon to meet for that Purpose, yet nothing was done in it. The Duke enjoy'd not only Liberty, but was in greater Favour and Power than ever, and no Parliament likely to meet, so that the Kingdom was in as bad or worse Condition than before; and the Men who were the Ruin of the Nation, were honour'd and encourag'd. A lamentable Posture of Affairs! And shall the Lovers of their Country stand still and see its Destruction, without putting an helping Hand to deliver it?

York's Friends.

By these and such like Speeches he had dispos'd the Nation to a Rebellion, not against the King, (for no Harm was meant him good Man, who did no Ill to any Man, and desir'd the Nation's Welfare in all Things) but against the Queen, Duke of Somerset, and the rest of the Cabal, who usurp'd the King's Authority. The Duke in the mean Time wrought himself into the good Opinion of the Nobility, who most of them hated the Queen's Doings, and envied Somerset's Greatness, and especially made the Two Nevills, Father and Son, the one Earl of Salisbury, and the other Earl of Warwick, his Friends; Salisbury the most eminent for Policy and Council, the Earl of Warwick very popular, and admir'd for his innate Valour and Magnificence, Men able to raise and depose as they pleas'd. Things being thus concerted among these Noblemen, and contriv'd to be put in Execution. The first Attempt they made was upon the Duke of Somerset, whom they caus'd to be arrested in the Queen's Bed-Chamber, and sent him to the Tower of London, where he kept but a sad Christmas, under the Fears of his Enemies Malice, who were preparing a Bill of black Accusations against him to be ready for the Parliament, which was to meet soon. The King was very sick and hardly sensible when these Things were done by the Duke of York, to whom, as some write, the Regency of the Kingdom was committed by the Council, during the King's Weakness, and by Virtue of this Authority it was, that he call'd the Parliament to meet within a few Weeks after Christmas, and there openly before all the Lords and Commons assembled, accus'd the Duke of Somerset of High-Treason, and many other heinous Crimes, as the Loss of Normandy, and the late Mischance which happen'd in Guen. But the Queen, who was as intent for the Deliverance of the Duke of Somerset, as his Enemies were on his Destruction, had so contriv'd Matters, that nothing should be done against him; for the King being something amended, and come well to his Senses, she caus'd him, tho' very weak, to be carried to the Houses, and there to dissolve the Parliament for the present; and so nothing was determin'd in the Matter. This being done, Somerset was immediately set at Liberty, and that he might be out of the Reach of his Enemies Malice, he was made Captain of Calais and Guisnes, the only Parts of France that remain'd in the King's Hands, which caus'd a fresh Discontent both among the Nobility and Commons, who did not spare to say openly, That he was a very unfit Person to be entrusted with those important Places, who was better at surrendering Towns than keeping of them; and if he was not afraid to yield up all Normandy to the Enemy, he would not scruple to deliver Two Forts only.

The Duke of York being thus enrag'd at his Second Disappointment, grew resolute to revenge himself by Arms, and having obtain'd an Absolution from the Obligation of his former Oath from the Pope, went into Wales, accompanied with his special Friends, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, the Lord Cobham and others, to gather another Army, and come up to London, which being known to the King and his Party, they prepared what Aids they could for their own Defence, and having gotten together a Body of about 2000 Men, the King himself in Person, with the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the Earls of Northumberland, Dorset, Devonshire, Wiltshire and Pembroke, left London, (because it was thought the Duke of York had too many Friends there) and march'd May 21. to meet and engage him by the way. They came the first Night to Wadford, and the next Day to St. Albans, where hearing of the Approach of the Duke of York, he encamped and pitched his Standard in a Place call'd Goslow, or Sandisford, in St. Peter's Street. The Duke of York by his Spies knew all the King's Motions, but still kept on his March to St. Albans, and encamped in Keyfield near the same Town, his Army consisting of about 3000. The Duke and King being thus in Sight of one another with their Forces, the King after his peaceable Manner, sends Messengers to the Duke (tho' others say, that the Duke first sent Letters to the King) viz. the Duke of Buckingham and some other Nobles, to know of him what he meant by appearing in such an hostile Manner, to the Disturbance of the Peace and Quiet of the Nation, contrary to his former Oath and Promises. The Duke of York return'd them Answer, 'That both he himself and all with him were the King's faithful and loyal Subjects, and intended no Harm to his Person, but came to require that wicked and haughty Man the Duke of Somerset, who had lost Normandy, neglected Gascoigne, and brought the Realm into this miserable State; That whereas it was once and lately the Terror, now it is the Scorn and Derision of the World; That they would not be put off with fair Promises as they had formerly been, but would have him that hath deserv'd Death, or die in the Quarrel; yet if it would please the King to resign that bad Man into their Hands, they were ready without Trouble, or farther Breach of the Peace to lay down their Arms, and return into their own Countries. The King hearing this Answer, grew angry, and told the Messengers from the Lords, 'That he would not deliver up the Duke of Somerset, nor any Man in his Army to his Enemies, who had faithfully adhered to him against them, commanding them all to lay aside their Arms, and threatening them to hang them as a Terror to others, if they should dare to appear or fight against him. As soon as the Duke of York receiv'd this Answer, he turned himself to his Men and said, 'Since our Sovereign Lord will not be reform'd by our Intreaties, nor understand the Intention of our Meeting together, but is fully purposed to destroy us, and hath confirm'd his Resolution with a great Oath, let us consider

And God Almighty, who reigns in Heaven keep us in our Right, and make us strong to oppose the Malice of them that seek our Ruin. And so gave Order to sound for the Battel. But while these Things were doing at one End of the Town, the Earl of Warwick arriv'd (n) with his March-Men at the other, and with great Fury fell upon the King's Vanguard, which having routed before the Duke of Somerset could come to relieve it, he brake into the Town about the middle of St. Peter's Street. The Duke of York seeing that fell on also with his Men, and so a furious Battel was commenc'd, which lasted some Hours with so much Slaughter, that it was thought there would not have been a Man left on either Side alive; but the Duke of York being much the stronger Side, and having kept back a certain Number of Men to renew the Battel, when the rest were wearied and tired, he so ordered the Matter at last, that by their Means the Victory became compleatly his; the King's Army was routed with the Loss of 800 of his Men, among whom were Edmund, Duke of Somerset, Henry, Earl of Northumberland, Humphrey, Earl of Stafford, Son to the Duke of Buckingham, John, Lord Clifford, and many other Persons of Note. Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham was wounded, and left the Battel when he saw that it would go against the King, as did also James Butler, Earl of Wiltshire, and Tho. Thorp, Lord Chief Baron, with many other of the King's Retinue, who gave a bad example to the timorous Soldiers, and lost the Day. The King, tho' none of the best Warriors, remain'd till the last; but seeing himself forsaken, retir'd into a poor Man's House, where he might lurk as he thought unsuspected, till the Enemy withdrew, and he might have Opportunity to provide better for his own Safety; but he could not lie hid long.*

The Armies of the King and Duke of York encounter at St. Albans, and the King is vanquish'd.

The King taken by the Duke of York.

The Duke of York had Notice where he was, and immediately went to him, with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and being come into his Presence, besought him on their Knees, to 'forgive them what they had done that Day, and accept them for his Loyal Subjects; for now the Duke of Somerset, the common Enemy of the Nation, and the Cause of this Commotion, was dead, he and all his adherents would remain during their Lives his faithful and obedient Subjects, and be ready in all Points to serve him as their Duty obliged them; and the Kingdom being in Peace, he should now reign in the greatest Happiness that ever King did; so that the Destruction of Somerset was his Preservation. The King being little comforted at these good Words, desir'd them to take care there were no more Hurt done, and keep their Soldiers from plundering and killing his People. (For the Northern Men after the Victory, behaved themselves very outrageously to the Townsmen and others, who had fought on the King's Side, killing and robbing as they pleased) Whereupon the Lords put out a Proclamation in the King's Name, That all manner of Persons should lay aside their Malice one to another, and not commit any Acts of Hostility against any Man: And so all was quieted. The Duke of York and the Lords with him, having the King in their Power, conducted him with great Honour and Reverence to St. Alban's

Shrine, and after to his Lodgings, where he rested that Night. The next Day they removed with the King to London, and took up their Abode in the Bishop's Palace, where they kept their Whitsuntide with great Mirth and Solemnity, concluding there to call a Parliament to settle and compose all Things for the Good of the King and his People. This Battel of St. Albans was fought May 23. The Bodies of the Noblemen slain in it were buried in the Chappel of our Lady in the Abby there, and the rest in the Field adjoining. The Duke of Somerset left three Sons, Henry, Edmund and John, who to revenge their Father's Death took always King Henry's Part.

The Parliament met as by Appointment of the King and Lords upon July 9. and settled all Things according to the Lord's Minds, but under the Pretence of doing them for the common Good. Some few Acts of Parliament were made for a Colour of the Justice, and Care of the Lords to the common Safety, viz. That Servants of Persons lately deceased, who have embezzill'd their Master's Goods before the Executors could enter upon them, shall be attainted of Felony if they are found Guilty: That whereas the Officers of the Exchequer were guilty of great Extortion in exacting Fees on the People, it was hinted what Fees should be taken by them in the several Causes there adjudged and decided: That there should be but Six Common Attorneys in Norfolk, Six in Suffolk, and Two in Norwich, because it was found by Experience, that the Multitude of Attorneys in those Countries stirred up and procured many Suits at Law for small Treppasses, little Offences, and small Debts. These Acts were only to be a Specimen to the People, what a Reformation there would be if the popular Lords had the Rule, which was a curious Prologue to what followed, and was chiefly intended, and which began with these Votes.

A. D. 1455. Reg. 33. K. Henry carried by the Duke of York to London.

Fifteenth Parliament, its Acts.

Popular Votes, and a Settlement upon it.

1. That the Government as it was managed by the Queen, Duke of Somerset, and their Friends, had been of late a great Injustice and Oppression to the People.

2. That the King, who was of himself a pious and good Prince, had been abused by those that counselled and advised him, to his great Dishonour.

3. That the Duke of Gloucester, whose Memory had been stained with a Charge of Treason and Rebellion since his Death, was a true and faithful Subject both to the King and the Realm.

4. That all Alienations and Gifts of the Revenues and Lands of the Crown, whether made by the King himself or his Parliament, from the first Year of his Reign should be revoked, and the said Lands and Revenues resumed and taken into the King's Hands.

5. That no Person or Persons should judge or report, that the Duke of York, Earls of Salisbury and Warwick were guilty of Rebellion or Treason in coming in a Warlike Manner against the King at St. Albans, since the Action was necessary and taken in Hand to free the King from Captivity, and bring Peace and Safety to the Nation, but all the Blame was to be laid upon the Duke of Somerset, Lord Chief Baron Thorp, and William Joseph, Esq; who out of a malicious and evil Design kept a Letter sent by the Lords from the King's Knowledge, which if it had been deliver'd to the King's Majesty would have taken away the Occasion of these Disorders.

(n) Hall says the Earl of Warwick fell upon the King's Men while there was a Treaty of Peace on Foot.

A. D. 1455. By these Votes and Acts they made way for the Resolution, which was the main drift of all, and by which it was appointed, That the Duke of York should be the Protector of the Realm; That the Earl of Salisbury should be Lord Chancellor, and to that End the great Seal was delivered to him, and the Earl of Warwick was made Governour of Calles, and the Territories thereunto belonging, and so all Authority both Civil and Military was in a manner put into the Hands of the Lords, and Henry had only left him the Name of a King, nor should have that, 'tis probable, but that his Innocency and Holiness was had in so great Veneration among the common People, that had K. Henry suffered any Evil from the Lords, they would have immediately forsaken them, and turned their Fury upon them. This the Lords were very sensible of, and therefore would venture no further against him, than might fairly justify their Pretences to reform the former ill-Government, and establish the Commonwealth in its ancient flourishing Condition, and to this End they displaced all such Persons from Offices of Trust in the Court, and from the Privy-Council, as the King loved, or Queen favoured, had any Principle of Loyalty, or had been Supporters of the Lancastrian Line; They were also careful to administer Justice impartially, and avoid Delays of Suits, and punish Bribery to ingratiate themselves with the People. And tho' they ventured upon one Thing, which never any King durst do, which was to take John Holland, Duke of Exeter out of the Sanctuary at Westminster to imprison him in Pomfrist-Castle, a Sacrilege much complained of by the Abbot and his Monks, and contrary to an Order made in the last Parliament, yet the plausible Pretence of doing it for the publick Good made the People to swallow it patiently, and dispense with the Injury done to the Church.

Reg. 34. The Queen, who while the King was in his Enemy's Hands, and ruled by their Councils, or rather over-ruled by their Threats and Policy, beheld all these Transactions with great Regret, as soon as he was delivered, sought all means to revoke what they had settled, and place the King in his Throne again with his undoubted Authority and Power. She was sure of the Assistance of several eminent Lords in this her Design, and being a Person of a Masculine Spirit was not afraid to undertake any Thing to keep up the Dignity of her Husband's Crown. Henry Beaufort now Duke of Somerset by the Death of his Father, was eager to revenge it, and Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, who at the same time lost his Son and Heir, was no less zealous to pull them down, who had raised themselves upon his Loss. All the Lords of the Lancastrian Faction, evidently seeing the Tendency of the Duke of York's Actions to be towards the Crown, thought it for their own Safety to join with the Queen in pulling him down from his Usurpation, and to that End they all met in a Great Council at Greenwich by the Queen's Appointment, and after a full Debate upon what had passed came to this Resolution. That the King was no Child, and consequently needed no Tutor, but it being a Reproach to his Majesty to be governed at the Discretion of others, the Duke of York should be put out of the Protectorship, which he had so injuriously assumed, and the Earl of Salisbury deprived of his Chancellorship, which the King being very easily perswaded to do, an express Order under the King's Seal was dispatched to them to resign their Offices. The Duke of York was amaz'd at this sudden turn of Affairs;

but since it was an undoubted Prerogative of the Crown to place or displace the Officers of it as he pleased, he dar'd not oppose it, least he should be plainly guilty of Rebellion, and so with a fained Patience he yielded to it, tho' to the great Discontent of his own Party; but immediately left the Court, as if being discharged from publick Business, he would retire to attend his Private, having still in his Mind the same Designs of raising himself to the Throne, as well as of revenging this Affront, when Opportunity offered it self, which could not be long to such restless Spirits, as both he himself and many of his Party were of, who if they find not an Occasion to execute their ambitious Contrivances will make one. And this seems to be first attempted within a few Months after in the City of London, where the Duke of York had many Friends ready to stir up Tumults for his Advantage, and who watched the least Stirs to inflame them into open Rebellion, which thus first happened.

In May a certain English Merchant, who while he was in Italy had been prohibited by the Magistrates to wear a Sword, or any other Weapon, according to the Custom of England, met an Italian in Cheapside wearing a Dagger, and told him, That since the English were not allowed to wear a Sword in Italy, he ought not to wear one in England. The Italian angry at this Rebuke gave him a rough and uncivil Answer, which so provoked the young fiery Merchant, that he not only took away the Italian's Dagger, but with it broke his Pate. The Italian immediately goes to the Mayor and complains of the Abuse, and the Merchant being summon'd to answer for it, was for want of a good Excuse imprison'd. The seditious Citizens, and especially the Prentices made this an Occasion of rising, and gather'd together in great Numbers to deliver the Merchant out of Newgate, which when they had done, they in great fury went and pillaged the Houses of the Italians in several Parts of the City. The Mayor and Aldermen with the Assistance of many grave Citizens opposed the Rabble, and at length appeased them, putting several of the Chief of them into Newgate. The Queen and her Council, who now again ruled all, hearing of these Tumults in the City, and easily guessing at the Reason and Cause of them, sent the Dukes of Exeter and Buckingham with some other Noblemen to join with the Mayor and Aldermen in punishing such as were in hold for it severely, that they might be a Terror to others; but when the Commons of the City heard of it, and that the said Dukes and Mayor were set to try them according to their Commission, they rose again, and threatening the Judges, if they determin'd any thing severe against them, so frightened them, that they left Guild-Hall and departed, and so nothing was done that Day. But afterward the Mayor calling together a Common-Council took such effectual Course with the Wardens of the several Companies, that all were still, and the Commissioners had Liberty to sit in Guild-Hall, where they condemned several Persons for this Riot, Three of which were hanged at Tiburn, and the rest fined.

The Queen, who was as suspicious and watchful as her Enemies were active, was very busie to countermine all their Contrivances and Plots; and because she had some Fears, that the City of London was false to the Regal Interests, she caused the King to remove his Court from Westminster to Coventry in Warwickshire, yet under the Pretence of taking the Air, and spending some

A. D. 1456. some time in the pleasant Pastimes of Hawking and Hunting. Here in the Intervals of their Sports she and her Council had many private Meetings to contrive the Ruin of the Duke of York, and his two potent Confederates Warwick and Salisbury, as knowing, that as long as he lived, and had such potent Friends to abet his Claim to the Crown, it was impossible that K. Henry could quietly enjoy his Throne. Divers Ways were propounded, but at length they agreed upon this, which they judged most plausible and likely to take effect, viz. That it should be pretended, that some Matter of great Importance to the State had unexpectedly happened, which required the Council and Advice of the wisest and sagest Peers of the Realm, and that the King and Queen extremely desired that the Duke of York, and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury should be present, with other Lords to consult about it, and to that End the King should send to each of them a very kind and obliging Letter under his Privy-Seal to desire their Attendance and Assistance at Coventry upon a certain Day and Hour therein named, with a Charge not to fail in their personal Appearance. The Duke, and Earls believing all these fained Pretences to be real, and having not the least Suspicion of Danger, set forth at the time appointed to wait upon the King at his Commands, as their Duty obliged them, but in the Way they received a certain Information from some Friends, what Mischiefs were really intended them, which they would hardly be able to avoid if they ventured themselves into the City. Whereupon the Lords, who were surprized at such base Treachery, thought it best to provide for their own Safety, and sending their Retinue before them into Coventry, as tho' they themselves were coming, they fled every one to their Castles, viz. the Duke of York to Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, Salisbury to Middleham in Richmondshire, and Warwick to Calis, having contrived and agreed at their Parting upon a secret Way of holding Correspondence by Letters, till they could meet again with greater Terror to their Enemies. The Queen was not a little disappointed at this their Retreat, and loss of her Prey, but was forced to sit down contented with the Satisfaction, that tho' she had not obtained her Desire, yet she had so terrified them, that they were parted one from the other for Safety, and so were become less formidable to her.

Two Prodigious ap-pear in England.

In November in the Island of Portland not far from Weymouth in Dorsetshire was seen a Cock with a great Crest upon his Head, great red Gills, and Legs half a yard long, who stood upon the Sea and crowed Three times, turning himself every time a several way, and nodding his Head towards the North, South and West, he was particoloured like a Pheasant, and when he had so done he vanished. A little after there was taken at Erithe within 12 Miles of London Four wonderful Fishes, viz. Two Whales, One Sword-Fish, and a Fish called Mors Morina. These Prodigious were a little amazing to all Men, and such as would venture to prognosticate the Signification of them, gave it out, that they were Fore-runners of Wars and Troubles in England, which after proved true.

A. D. 1457. King of France plunders the English Coasts.

The Dissentions which had for some time been in England between the King and his Nobles, continuing and daily increasing, put the French King in Mind of revenging the Wrongs and Injuries, which France had suffered from the English; and tho' he could not pretend any Right or Title to the Crown, nor hope to form an Invasion with Success, yet he might endamage and plunder the Coasts without any Resistance or great hazzard to his Men. And for this End he caused all suitable Preparations to be made both of Ships and Men against the Spring, which when equipped and fitted out he divided into Two Navies, and sent them to Sea under the Command of William, Lord Pomiers, and Sir Peter Bressy. At the Mouth of the Saine these Two Fleets parted, and went the one Eastward and the other Westward. Sir Peter Bressy, who sailed East, coasted along the Shore of Sussex and Kent, but not daring to land, staid in the Downs till they could get Information about the State of those Counties, and being at length certified, that Sandwich was neither well Peopled nor fortified, because being lately infected with the Plague, the Magistrates and most of the chief People were remov'd out of it, and gone to the neighbouring Villages and Towns; he entered into the Haven, and pillag'd the Town, taking such poor Stuff as was found therein, and then hastned away, because he heard that the Country was rising upon them. The Lord Pomiers, who took his Course Westward, in the mean time committed the like Outrages in Devonshire, in plundering and robbing the Town of Fulney or Fowey, (o) which done, they both retir'd into Bretagne, but hardly with Prey enough to recompense the Charge the French King had been at in setting them out. While the French thus molested the Coasts, the Scots, who ever join'd with the French against England, invaded the Borders, and entering Northumberland in a good Body under the Command of their King, Jame II. burnt and plundered several small Villages and Houses. But the Duke of York hearing of their Attempts, got together a good Army, and hastned with all speed to drive them out of the Country, which when the Scots had Knowledge of, they immediately return'd Home with little Profit to themselves, tho' they had done no small Damages to the English. Besides these Troubles which England suffered from her Enemies Abroad, the Disorders caused by the Nobility at Home, wrought no small Prejudices to it; for at the same time in the Northern Parts there happen'd a great Fray between Sir Thomas Piercy, Lord Egremont, and the Earl of Salisbury's Son, whom the said Lord hated for his Father's Sake, as being of the opposite Faction to himself and Family, fell upon them and their Retinue in open Field, and slew and wounded many of their Followers, and then fled. The King and Queen, tho' they did not much dislike the Action in themselves, yet least by overlooking the Wrong, they should provoke their Father and his Friends to any new Attempts, they gave out strict Orders for apprehending the said Lord, and having taken him, he was examin'd and tryed before the King's Council, by whom he was found guilty of an high Misdemeanour, and condemn'd to pay a large Fine to the Earl of Salisbury, and because he would not pay it, nor give him Security for the same, was committed to Newgate, with his Brother Sir Richard Piercy, who was guilty of the same Riot, but whether thro' the Negligence of the Keeper, or by the Weakness of the Prison, in a little time after he made his Escape, and let out several other Prisoners with him, to the great Trouble of the Sheriffs of London, who were oblig'd to find them out again.

Not long after the like Dissention happen'd between the Young Duke of Somerset and Sir John Nevil, the Earl of Salisbury's Son, who met at Salisbury with large Retinues, and threatned each other with Slaughter and Destruction, but by the Vigilance and Care of the Mayor, who kept strong Watches and Guards upon both Parties, they were hindred so long from joyning, that by the Mediation of Friends their Anger was pacified and no harm followed at that time. Thus was England miserably harass'd at Home and Abroad thro' her own Divisions, and she that was so lately formidable to all her Neighbours, was made a Prey to the Meanest of them.

The Troubles of Reginald Peacock, Bishop of Chichester. Soon after the Feast of St. Michael in this Year began the Troubles of that learned and godly Divine Reginald Peacock, then Bishop of Chichester. He had for many Years lived in very great Reputation for his Holiness and Piety, and for the promoting of the Truth of the Gospel had wrote several Books, which he entitl'd, 1. Of the Christian Religion in general. 2. Of Marriage. 3. Of the just expressing of the Holy Scripture in Three Parts. 4. The Donet of Christian Religion. 5. The Follower of the Donet. 6. A Book of Faith. 7. The Book filling the Four Tables. 8. The Book of Worshipping. 9. The Provoker of Christian Men. 10. The Book of Counsel. Besides these Writings which were intended chiefly for the Benefit of the People, he had moved several Questions in the Universities about the Annates, Peter-pence, and the Jurisdiction of the Pope which he exercised here in England, and delivered his Opinion freely concerning them, but no ways in Favour of the Pope. He is also said to have pitied the Ignorance of the People so much, that he spent many Years Labour in translating the Bible into the English Tongue. By all these Things he very much angered the Hierarchy, but nothing was attempted against him so long as his great Patron, and Favourers of his Piety and Learning lived Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, by whose Means he was first made Bishop of St. Asaph, and then of Chichester. But soon after that good Duke was murdered, the Bishop was then exposed to his Enemies, who reading over his Books and picking up his Assertions delivered in his Disputations brought an heavy Charge of Heresie, and other Crimes against him to Thomas Bourchier, then Arch-bishop of Canterbury, who being a Person zealous for the Papal Grandure and Power was forward and active in the Prosecution of him. This Arch-bishop began his Process against him October 22. sending out a Citation to all Persons who had any thing Heretical and Erroneous to charge the said Bishop of Chichester with, to appear before him within 20 Days after Summons, to speak, propound, alledge and affirm fully and sufficiently in Writing whatsoever they had to say against him, strictly forbidding all Persons as well of the Clergy as Laity in the mean time to inveigh against any Propositions laid down by the said Bishop in his Books so long as the Examination of them was depending in the Arch-bishop's Court. Upon the Day appointed not only the Enemies of the Bishop, but the Bishop of Chichester himself, being as valiant for the Truth as his Enemies were furious against him, appeared before the Arch-bishop, and the Divines and Lawyers belonging to his Court at Lambeth. The Articles laid to his Charge by his Adversaries were these, viz. That he had in his Books, Works and Writings asserted many Heresies and erroneous Doctrines contrary to the true Catholick and Apostolick Faith: As, 1. That it is not necessarily to be believed, that Jesus Christ after his Death descended into Hell. 2. That it is not necessary to Salvation to believe in the Holy Catholick Church. 3. Or in the Communion of Saints. 4. That it is not necessary to Salvation to believe the Body of Christ to be materially present in the Sacrament. 5. That the universal Church may err in Matters of Faith. 6. That it is not necessary to Salvation to believe, that what every general Council doth ordain, approve or determine should be holden and approved by all Christians. Other Opinions and erroneous Assertions he was charged with, as that he said, That the Office of a Christian Bishop is chiefly to preach the Word of God; That Bishops who bought their Admission to their Sees of the Bishop of Rome did sin; That no Man is bound to obey or believe the Determinations of the Church of Rome; That the wilful begging Friars were an idle and needless Order; That Spiritual Persons ought not to have any Temporal Possessions; And that personal Tithes were not due by the Law of God. But these last with many of the like Nature were imputed to him to blacken his Name, and make his Condemnation seem deserved. The former Six were in all probability the Articles proved upon him out of his Books, Sermons and Disputations, when he was brought before the Arch-bishop in his Consistory, and these he defended very strenuously and boldly in the Presence of the Arch-bishop and many great Lords, but at length partly by Menaces and Threats, and partly by Flattery, and Perswasions, he was prevailed withal by his Brethren the Bishops to recant his Opinions, which he did Decemb. 4. at St. Paul's Cross in the English Tongue, consenting that his Books should be burnt as a Terror to others, and exhorting all Men present to give no Belief to any of the Doctrines delivered in them. But tho' he recanted, yet he was not thought by the Bishops themselves to renounce his Errors heartily, and therefore he was not only deprived of his Bishoprick, but kept in Prison all the remaining part of his Life, where whether he died of Trouble and Grief, or was destroy'd by his Enemies is uncertain, but sure it is he lived not long after. King Henry and his Council observing, that notwithstanding several Provocations had been given the Lords to rebel by the Queen and her Friends, yet they retained a great Desire of Peace, as they had testified partly by their living quietly upon their Estates, and partly by sending their Friends to him to mediate for an Agreement, removed to London about Christmas, and soon after his Arrival summoned a great Council, and there freely and openly declared, That since he perceived that the Divisions which of late had happened between himself and some of the chief of his Nobles had been the only Encouragement to the Scots and French to molest and invade his Kingdom the last Summer, and would still more embolden them to do the like, if these Home-Animosities continued, it was his Desire, that a Reconciliation should be made with all convenient Speed, promising upon his Salvation, that no Injuries done to his Person or Friends should be any Impediment to a perfect Amity between them, but at their Desires all Things should be forgotten and forgi-

A. D. 1458. Reg. 36. ven, and the Duke of York and his Friends taken into especial Favour and Love, that so the Nation might unanimously oppose its Enemies.

The King, who was at all times a Stranger to Dissimulation, was immediately by all the Council judged to speak these Things with his usual Candour, and out of a pure Desire of the Peace of the Nation, and therefore pursuant to his Order certain Persons of Quality, who were judged fittest to mediate between the King and the Duke of York for their Gravity and Moderation, were dispatched to the Lords of the York Faction, to command them to repair to the King's Court without Delay, there to treat and consult with the King about a Pacification of all Parties for the good of the Publick. This Message was accepted by the Lords with great Readiness, and accordingly on the 15th Day of January the Earl of Salisbury with a Retinue of 500 Men arrived in London, and lodged by the King's Appointment at his own House, called the Harbour, and on the 26th of the same Month came the Duke of York with a Train of 400 Men, and took up his Residence at Bainard's-Castle. Soon after him came the Dukes of Exeter, Buckingham and Somerset with a mighty Throng of Attendants, viz. 800 Men, and had their Lodgings ordered them without Temple-Bar. Next arrived the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford with a Train of 1500 Men, and had their Quarters allotted 'em in the Suburbs of the City. The Earl of Warwick, who was Captain of Calis, and resided there, required a greater Time to prepare and come over, and therefore came up to London not till February 14. but appeared with the greatest Splendour, having 600 Men to attend him, all in Red Jackets with White ragged Staves embroidered on them behind and before, and made his Abode in the Black-Friers. When all the Lords were arrived, the King and Queen followed on March 17. with a very strong Guard and Attendance, and lodged in the Bishop's Palace. And tho' the King and his Council had well provided, that the two Factions might be so separated, viz. the one in the Suburbs, and the other in the City, that there might happen no Quarrels between them; yet least any unexpected Difference should arise, the Mayor and Magistracy of the City were order'd to keep up a Body of 5000 armed Men to maintain the Peace indifferently between them, who accordingly Day and Night kept a strict Guard, and rode up and down the Suburbs and City with them to prevent all Disorders which might arise. The King and his Nobles on the one part held their Consultations apart at first in the Chapter-house at Westminster, and the Duke of York with his Party met at Black-Friers to debate upon such Conditions of Peace as they should agree to accept, and when Things were settled among themselves the Arch-bishop and Bishops, who perswaded both Parties to moderate Terms, brought 'em to a Communication together, and at length after many Debates and hot Contests on both Sides, they promised to forget all Wrongs and Injuries done on either Side, and to be Friends to each other, and obedient to the King, but upon these Conditions, which being set down in Writing were signed, sealed and delivered by both Parties March 23. and were to this Effect, viz.

The Lords accept the King's Offer, and come to London.

Articles of Agreement between the King and Lords.

I. That the Duke of York and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury should settle 40 l. a Year upon the Abby of St. Albans for ever, for Suffrages and Obits to be kept, and Alms to be employ'd for the Souls of Edmund, Duke of Somerset, Henry, Earl of Northumberland, and Thomas, Lord Clifford, with the rest of the King's Friends, who were slain in the Battel of St. Albans, which Lords were declared faithful Subjects to the King at their Deaths, as well as the Duke of York, and Earls of Warwick and Salisbury.

II. That the Duke of York should pay Eleanor, Dutches of Somerset, and Duke Henry her Son, the Sum of 5000 Marks to be divided as the King should think convenient among the younger Children of the said Dutches, and the Earl of Warwick 2000 Marks to the Lord Clifford to be distributed among his younger Brethren and Sister by the King.

III. That whereas Sir Thomas Piercy, the Lord Egremont, and Richard Piercy, Sons of the Countess of Northumberland were fined to pay to the Earl of Salisbury, his Wife and Sons, Thomas and John Nevill 14800 Marks for Trespasses found by Richard Bingham and Ralph Pool the King's Judges to be done to the said Earl of Salisbury and his Sons, it was agreed, that the said Sums should be released by them to the said Offenders, yet upon Condition, that the Lord Egremont and his Brethren should enter into a Recognisance in Chancery to keep the Peace with the said Earl of Salisbury, his Wife, Children, Servants and Tenants, and the said Earl should discharge the Tenants of the Earl of Northumberland and Lord Egremont from their Obligations to stand to their Order and Government.

IV. That all Variances, Discords and Debates, all Controversies, Appeals and Actions personal, that are or have been between any of the said Lords and their Servants shall be for ever determined and ended, saving to every one their Title, Action and Right to all Arrerages of Rents, Services, Accounts, Detinues or Debts due by any Contract or Deed, and that Releases should be given to each other accordingly.

V. That if any Action, Suit or Quarrel chanced between any of the Servants or Tenants of the said Lords for any Matter or Thing, that none of the said Lords should support, maintain or aid the Persons so suing, but use their utmost Endeavours to bring them to Peace and Quietness.

VI. That if any Party complained of the Breach of this Agreement he should not bring his Action, unless the King's Council see just Cause to allow it.

VII. That if any Variance arose about the Recognisances, Releases or Acquittances between the Council of both Parties, it shall be determined by the two Chief Justices.

VIII. That whereas the Persons bound in Chancery by this Award were obliged to obey it in great Sums, the King should not pardon them without the Consent of the Party aggrieved; and if they were recovered, the King should have one Moiety and the Complainant the other.

This Award and Agreement was sealed with the Great Seal at the King's Palace of Westminster, March 24. in the Thirty Six Year of the King's Reign; and the next Day being openly proclaim'd and publish'd, was receiv'd with universal Joy, and a solemn Procession celebrated by the King and Court, within the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, in Testimony of their Thankfulness to God for this happy Union. In this Procession all Things were contriv'd to declare a perfect Amity between the Factions; for before the King, went the Duke of Somerset, and Earl of Salisbury Hand

The King came behind them in his Regal Robes, and the Crown on his Head; and after him the Duke of York leading the Queen, who was very familiar with him, as if she had a real Favour for him; but as she was always a great Artist at Dissimulation, so she never more used it than at this Juncture, when it ought to have been quite laid aside, as the following Transactions will evidently shew.

Earl of Warwick takes Six Spanish Ships. All Things being thus concluded, the Lords parted from the King and Queen with all outward Signs of Friendship; and the Duke of York and Earl of Salisbury went to York, but the Earl of Warwick staid at the Court a while about the Business of Callis, and about Witsundside passed over to his Charge. While he continued there, he went out with Fourteen of the King's Ships, (for he was also made Admiral of the Narrow Seas) to scour the Coasts, and met with a Fleet of Spaniards laden with Merchandize, but well furnish'd for their Defence. The Earl was not able to deal with them, yet being unwilling to part with so rich a Prey, he resolv'd to encounter them, and so began the Fight, which they as resolutely maintain'd against them. The Battel continued almost two Days, but at last determin'd in Favour of the Earl, who took Six of their Ships laden with Wine, Oil, Wax, Iron and other rich Merchandizes, worth 10000 Pounds Sterling; and sunk and put to flight Twenty-six more, having slain a 1000 of their Men in the Fight, and taken many Prisoners, with the Loss of not above an 100 Men. This Victory not only increased the Fame of this great Earl, but by his generous Temper in carrying (q) over into England the Goods he had taken; he caused those Things to be sold for a Shilling which before would have cost Two.

The Genoefes take some English Ships, and are punished for it. Among this Fleet of the Spaniards were Five Genoa's Carricks, of which Three were taken; and the other Two which fled Home, bringing the News of the Loss, incensed the Genoefes to revenge it upon such English Ships as they could light on, which not long after they did in this Manner. One Sturmyne, a Bristol Merchant, had been travailing some Years in divers Countries of the Levant, and other Eastern Parts, from whence he was returning with rich Merchandizes, and as was said, brought green Pepper and other Spices with him, to have set and sown in England. The Genoefes having Intelligence of his Return, laid wait for his Ship, and taking it, spoiled it of all its Goods, and several others with it. The News of this Action being heard of by the King and his Council, an Order was sent out to seize all the Merchant Genoefes in London, and commit them to the Fleet, till they could find sufficient Security to answer the Damages done by their Countrymen to the English Merchants; and because they did not or could not do it, they were made to pay 6000 Marks for the Damages done to Sturmyne and this Realm, and then dismissed their Imprisonment.

Printing used in publick this Year. In this Year Historians say, that Printing began to appear in Publick, which had lain hid about Ten Years, after this Manner. One John Faustus, a Goldsmith and Citizen of Mentz, having casually engraven some Letters upon a Piece of Metal, laid Ink upon them, and finding they made a fair Impression, fram'd them into Words, and so arriv'd at some Probability of improving it into a more speedy Way of putting out Books, which he communicated to certain Friends of his of the same City, viz. John Cuthemburge and Peter Schafferd, yet with an Injunction to keep it secret for a Time, that they might improve it. John Cuthemburge being a Man of a more publick Spirit, could not endure to keep so useful an Art private long, and therefore this Year began with Faustus to exercise it in publick at Strasburg, and by imparting the Knowledge of it to the Inquisitive, he was a Means, that it not only was much improv'd by others, but was carried into several Parts of Europe, as Rome, by Conradus Gallus, a German, and to England by William Caxton, a Mercer of London, who introduced it into the Abbey of Westminster in 1471, and afterward it spread it self into many other English Monasteries.

A. D. 1458. Reg. 37. The Earl of Warwick about Michaelmas return'd into England, and remain'd about the Court, moving and carrying on divers Affairs, as well in reference to the Publick as belonging to his own Charge. In November it happen'd, that as he sat in Council in the Palace-Royal at Westminster, one of the King's Servants affronting a Yeoman of the Earl's Attendants, they fell to Blows, and the Earl's Servant having sorely hurt and wounded the King's, he fled to secure himself. The King's Guards and other of his menial Servants, seeing their Fellow-Servant harm'd, and the Offender escaped, reflected upon the Earl his Master, as an Enemy to the Court and King, and since they could not be avenged of his Servant, resolv'd to have amends of his Master, as being an Encourager of him in the Attempt; and watching him when he return'd from the Council-Chamber to his Barge, suddenly set upon him and his Retinue, the Yeomen with Swords, and the Cooks and Black-Guard with Spits and Fire-forks. The Earl's Men made as good a Defence as they could, while their Master, not without great Danger, by the Help of his Friends got into the Barge, and fled into the City of London, but many of them were dangerously wounded and hurt. The Queen shewed more than ordinary Concern in this Affair, and as tho' she had been engaged to make good the Quarrel, (which some from thence believed she was the Mover of) commanded that the Earl should be apprehended and imprisoned in the Tower, where she determin'd to have put a Period to his Life. This the Earl being advertised of by some of his Friends, feared to stay longer in the City, and therefore departing to Warwick, he took his Journey into Yorkshire, where he found the Duke of York and his Father, to whom he declared the Occasion of his coming, and what Danger he had escaped from the Queen and her Servants, (r) which malicious Intention, as he thought, was not to be pass'd over without just Resentments; and he would leave it to their Judgments to take such Methods to do it as were proper, while he should go over to Callis to secure that important Garrison; for it was not to be doubted, but the Queen would endeavour all she could to wrest it out of his Hands, and put it under the Command of some of her Friends, and so he posted away with all speed thither, and was receiv'd by the Garrison with Joy, and all due Respect to his Authority. He was scarcely arriv'd there, and put Things in good order for his own Security, but the Queen, who imagin'd that the Earl of Warwick had raised this Stir to begin a new Quarrel, and set the Crown upon the Duke of York's Head, by the Advice of the Duke of Somerset and Buckingham, sent a Messenger with an Order under the Privy-Seal to him, that he should resign the Captain's-Office of Callis, because she had given that Charge to the Duke of Somerset, whom the King intended shortly to send over thither. But the Earl of Warwick reply'd, That he was made Captain of Callis by Authority of Parliament, and would not resign his Charge but into their Hands that gave it him, and therefore could not obey the King's Seal, because he was accountable for so doing to him in Parliament; and so he held out the Garrison against her. While these Things were done at Callis, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury, with their Friends, entered into a deep Consultation about the Assault offer'd to the Earl of Warwick by the King's Servants, and concluded, That this Disorder proceeded purely from the Queen's Malice to them, who encouraged her Servants to slay the Earl of Warwick, that they might be the more easily suppressed and destroyed; and that now since Oaths and Promises were of no Force with the Queen and her Friends, but even the sacred Pretences of Peace and Friendship were made use of to draw them more securely into their Snares, it was high time for them to stand upon their own Guard, and with Sword in Hand to demand Satisfaction for the Injury intended, so that if they would not hearken to Reason, they might be brought to it by Force. And to this End, it was agreed, That the Earl of Salisbury should take such Troops of their Attendants as were in readiness, which amounted to a Body of about 5000, and should go up to London to the King, and put up his Complaints of the Wrong done to his Son the Earl of Warwick, contrary to the late Agreement made between himself and his Lords, and demand the Satisfaction in Reason due; which if granted, he would lay down his Arms; but if denied, their future Actions would be justifiable in the Sight of all Men. The Earl of Salisbury according to this Plan began his March from Middleham Castle a little after Candlemas, and took his way thro' Lancashire, to go towards London; which, tho' the furthest Way about, yet he hoped to augment his Troops there. The Duke of York in the meantime was to raise another Army, and as Occasion required to go to meet him, and so jointly oppose their Enemies, if they stood upon the Defence of the Quarrel. The Queen who kept a watchful Eye upon all the Motions of the Lords, and at the first Beginning of this Contest imagin'd, that the Earl of Warwick had purposely raised this Combustion to set the Crown on the Duke of York's Head, thought it now unnecessary to talk of any Parleys, and therefore by the Advice of her two chief, but enraged Counsellors the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham contrived to suppress them by Force, and to this End, dispatched Orders in the King's Name to James Touchet Lord Audley, who was a very potent Man in those Countries, thro' which the Earl of Salisbury was to march, to raise an Army with all speed, and by surprize to apprehend him: And that she might engage many Gentlemen of those Parts to assist him with their Persons and Interests in this Attempt as she could, she sent down to several of them a Badge of her Favour and their Loyalty, a white embroidered Swan, which they should wear in Token of their Love to the King. By these Arts she drew so many to her Party, that the Lord Audley, who prosecuted his Commission with due Zeal and Expedition, got together a Body of 10000 Men out of Cheshire and Shropshire in a very short Time, and ranked them in Order of Battel, ready to receive him. The King and Queen hearing in what Readiness the Lord Audley was to encounter their Enemies, came down towards him to be under his Guard as it were, and the King remain'd at Coleshill in Warwickshire, but the Queen lay at Ecclesale in Staffordshire, expecting a good Event of this Undertaking. The Lord Audley and his Spies had Intelligence of the Earl of Salisbury's Motions, and hearing that he drew near him, ranged his Men upon Blore-Heath, near Draiton in Shropshire, where the Earl was to pass, ready to receive him. The Earl of Salisbury not suspecting this Opposition, was surpriz'd at the first Sight, but considering, that his Retreat would be disgraceful to him, resolv'd to abide the Battel, tho' much inferior in Strength, and pitched his Camp in the Front of his Enemy; a small River, but pretty deep, being between them, and so remain'd the following Night. In the Morning, which was St. Tecla's Day, the Earl of Salisbury caused his Men to shoot a great Flight of Arrows upon the Lord Audley's Camp, and then ordered them to make a Retreat, as tho' they intended to fly; which when the Lord Audley saw, he commanded his Men to pass over the River, and pursue them, giving charge to them to take the Earl of Salisbury if possible, alive or dead, as the Queen had order'd him; which they accordingly obeyed: but in the Hurry and Confusion, before Half the Army was gotten over, the Earl of Salisbury and his Men return'd in good Order upon the Lord Audley's Army, and fell upon them with great Fury, which tho' they courageously opposed, yet thro' Disorder and Surprise, they were after a sharp Battel routed, and the Lord Audley and all his chief Captains slain, with above 2400 common Soldiers. In this Fight were the Two Sons of the Earl of Salisbury, Sir John Nevill and Sir Thomas Nevill dangerously wounded, and going into a neighbouring Town for Cure, were set upon by some of the Queen's Friends, and taken Prisoners, with Sir Thomas Harrington, who accompanied them, and all of them carried to Chester Castle; which Misfortune was a sad Allay to the Victory in the Earl of Salisbury's Mind, because he knew that the Queen would immediately put them to death, unless they were delivered; which happen'd as soon almost as desir'd; for the Townsmen, who themselves were well affected to the Duke of York, having received a Message from the March-Men of Wales, That unless they were forthwith released, they would come and pull down the Castle; were glad of the Pretence to set them at Liberty, and so sent them away to their Father, who welcom'd them with all Joy.

The Duke of York having receiv'd the News of this Victory, resolves no longer to conceal his Intention; and since the King and Queen sought his Ruin, as a Competitor with them for the Crown, he determin'd either to get it, or perish in the Attempt; and upon that Account hastens to meet the Earl of Salisbury, that they might join their Forces together, and take all necessary Courses to augment their Army so as to fear no Opposition, which they after Consultation did, by sending into all Parts of Wales, Shropshire, and other Counties in the Marches of it. They wrote also to Callis to the Earl of Warwick, to bring over to their Assistance some Troops of his most experienc'd Soldiers, which he

he did, under the Command of Andrew Trollop, and John Blunt, Two Captains of great Experience and approved Policy in the late Wars in Normandy and Guien; which all being united into one Body, assembled in October, and encamped at Ludlow in Shropshire. The King had Intelligence of the Lords's Proceedings, and that he might put a Stop to their further Designs, sent out Commissions into all Parts of the Nation, where he had any Friends, to raise an Army with all speed to suppress them; which he had no great Difficulty to do, because many out of Love and Duty to the King, but more out of Fear of the Queen, flock'd to his Standard, so that he had gathered a mighty Army in a short Space. With it the King in Person, accompanied with the Dukes of Buckingham, Exeter, and Somerset, and others of the Nobility, who were Favourers of the Lancastrian Line, marched forwards towards the Lords, and came to Worcester, where staying a while to refresh their Army, it was after some Consultation agreed, That a Messenger of some Account should be sent to the Earls and Duke, to offer them a free and general Pardon of all their Offences, if they would lay down their Arms, and become obedient Subjects. The Bishop of Salisbury, Richard Beauchamp, was the Person thought fittest to be employed in this Affair; and accordingly was sent to them with a Message of Pardon, which he delivered to them with the Gravity and Seriousness of a Prelate. The Lords gave no Answer till they had consulted among themselves, and then by the Earl of Warwick reply'd, That they dare not trust to the King's Pardon, because they had several Pardons before, and those confirm'd by Parliament, and yet found them of no Security to them, but rather a Snare to draw them into Danger of their Lives, as the late Assault upon the Earl of Warwick manifestly shewed, by which he had perished, had not God wonderfully preserv'd him. Yet if any Way could be devised for their Safety, to which they might trust without fail, they were ready to submit to his Grace, and sue for his Favour. This Answer being brought to the King by the Bishop, did not at all please him, and thereupon he commanded his Standard to advance towards them; but before he and his Army arriv'd at their Camp, he received a Letter from the Lords, declaring, That as they had heretofore given Demonstrations, that they only sought the Prosperity of his Majesty and the Nation, with the Security of their own Persons and Estates, so, if they knew their own Hearts, they intended nothing else by being now in Arms, and therefore they kept themselves in the furthest Parts of the Nation, not with any ill Design, but to abide his Majesty's coming, that they might in all humble and submissive Manner beg his Grace and Favour, and have all Grievances redressed; and tho' they were unjustly and untruly defamed as Traitors and Rebels, and their Lordships and Tenants robb'd and spoil'd, against his Peace and Laws, yet they were so tender of the Effusion of Christian Blood, that they would not stand up in their own Defence till Necessity compell'd them; and therefore besought him to accept them as his true and faithful Subjects, and hear their Complaints and Answers to the Calumnies of their Adversaries, that the Nation may be restored to its Quiet, and they to their Estates. This Letter bears Date October 10. and is subscribed, R. York. R. Warwick, R. Salisbury.

The King having read this Letter, was not much better satisfied, but gave a Second Order for his Army to march towards them, till coming within half a Mile of the Enemy, they pitched their Camp, and the King immediately put out his Proclamation, That whosoever would lay down their Arms, and come over to him and beg Mercy, should be pardoned for this Attempt. Which Act of Grace being heard in the Duke of York's Camp, begat a great Discontent and Murmuring, the Generality of the People fearing a bad Issue of their Rebellion, and desiring now to provide for their own Safety. Trollop and Blunt with their Calistian Troops, were amaz'd to see themselves engag'd against their King, whom they always had served, and in whose Pay they still were; for the Earl of Warwick, who sent them over, had not declared to them the Reason of their coming; wherefore as soon as they saw where they were, they fled the next Night to the King's Army, and advertised him of the Duke of York's Design, to set upon his Camp suddenly, that he might at once destroy the King and his People; and by their Example drew many others to do the like, which much lessened the Lords's Forces. This sudden Desertion of the Captains, in whom they put much Confidence, and of many of their People, was a Discouragement to the Lords to attempt any Thing further. They saw their Counsels betray'd, their best Soldiers gone, and the Remainder not willing to fight, and thought it in vain to run the certain Danger of Life, and so they resolv'd to provide for their own Safety, and depart. The Duke of York with his Younger Son Edmund, Earl of Rutland, fled privately into Wales, and from thence sailed into Ireland, where he was received with an universal Joy. The Irish offering him to live and die with him, as if he had been their Natural Prince. The Earl of March, the Duke of York's Eldest Son and Heir Apparent, accompanied with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and Sir John Wenlock, went into Devonshire, where by the Help of John Dinham, Esq; afterwards Treasurer of England in Henry the Seventh's Days, they bought a Ship at Exmouth for an 110 Marks, and sailed into Gernsey, and so to Callis, where being let in at a Postern by Sir William Nevill, Lord Falconbridge, the Earl of Warwick's Uncle, who kept the Town and Castle, they were joyfully received by their Friends. The News of their Flight being carried to the King's Camp, he sent out some Troops of Horsemen to pursue them, but all was in vain, they were got out of their Reach and out of Danger. As for the private Soldiers, who by the Retreat of their Leaders, were left to the King's Mercy, they were all pardoned and sent Home, except some few, who being remarkable for their Forwardness in this Rebellion, were some of them fined, and others hang'd and quarter'd. The Town of Ludlow, which belonged to the Duke of York, and had sided with him in this Rising, was plunder'd and robb'd to the very Walls. In the Castle the King took the Dutches of York with her Two Youngest Sons, whom he sent to be kept under Confinement by the Dutches of Buckingham her Sister. And the Duke of York and his Sons, with the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury were proclaim'd Traitors to the King, Enemies to their Country, and Rebels to the Crown: And then having made the Earl of Northumberland and the Lord Clifford, Wardens and Keepers of the Northern Parts of England, as his trusty and most faithful Friends, and Henry, the new Duke of Somerset, Captain of Callis, he began his Journey towards London.

When K. Henry was come to Coventry in his way Home, he call'd his Parliament to meet there Novemb. 20. and being met they attain'd of High-Treason, Richard, Duke of York, and his

D. 1459. his Eldest Son Edward, Earl of March, Richard, Earl of Warwick, Edmund, Earl of Rutland, Richard, Earl of Salisbury, Sir Thomas Harrington, Sir John Wenlocke, Sir Thomas and John Nevill, the Earl of Salisbury's Sons, and many others, their Goods were confiscated, their Lands seized, and their Heirs disinherited to the Ninth Generation. As soon as the Parliament was risen, the Duke of Somerset was sent over with a choice Company of valiant and hardy Soldiers to take possession of his Government at Callis, but when he came to enter the Haven, the Artillery shot so hotly upon him both from the Town and the Rice-bank, that he was forced to retire out of Danger, and land at Whitsunday, from whence he sent his Commands to the Captains of the Town to receive him, shewing them his Commission for the Lieutenancy of it, but not being regarded, he betook himself to the Castle of Guifnes, and resolv'd by Force to bring the Town into Obedience to him, for which end he maintain'd daily Skirmishes with the Garrison of Callis, tho' more to his Loss than Gain. In the mean time the Mariners, who carry'd him over, bearing a greater Affection to the Earl of Warwick than him, convey'd their Ships into the Haven of Callis, and in them certain Persons, who were the Earl of Warwick's Enemies, as Jamin Findill, John Fellow, and some others, who being presented to the Earl of Warwick he caus'd them forthwith to be beheaded.

A. D. 1460. The News of the ill Success of the Duke of Somerset being related to the King and Queen, they sent over Richard, Lord Rivers, and Sir Anthony Woodville his valiant Son with 400 Men to aid the Duke of Somerset at Guifnes against the Garrison of Callis, who went down to Sandwich in order to pass over, but lay there some time to expect a Wind. The Earl of Warwick who kept the Narrow-Seas with a good Navy, having Intelligence of the Design watched his Opportunity, and sent Sir John Dinham with a small Number of Men to surprize them, who entering the Town took the Lord Rivers and his Son in their Beds, and having plundered the Town return'd, carrying all the King's Ships, which were laid there to transport them, along with them, except a Vessel nam'd Grace de Dieu, which could not be stirr'd, because it was very leaky, all which he presented to the Earl of March, of whom he had due Praise and Encouragement. With these Ships which were well Victualled and Manned, the Earl of Warwick immediately sail'd to the Duke of York in Ireland to commune and consult with him about their Return into England, and divers other Matters of Importance. The Wind and Weather were so favourable to the Earl's Voyage, that he pass'd and repass'd from Callis to Dublin in less than 30 Days. The Duke of Exeter, who was then Lord High-Admiral of England, hearing of the Earl of Warwick's Voyage into Ireland, lay in the Way of his Return with a competent Number of Ships well mann'd to have seiz'd him as he pass'd by them, which the Earl of Warwick being aware of, prepared to give him Battle: But the Duke of Exeter when he came to put in Execution his Design found such a great Inclination to the Earl of Warwick in his Captains, Mariners, and many of his Soldiers, that he durst not meddle with him, and so let him pass unattacked. Soon after the Earl's Return to Callis, because all Attempts against him had proved Unsuccessful hitherto, the Queen entertain'd a groundless Proposal to destroy him made to her by Sir Baldwin Fulford, a Man of more Daringness than Prudence, who undertook upon pain of losing his Head to kill the Earl of Warwick; but after he had spent the King 1000 Marks he return'd again without having done any Thing.

The Earl of Warwick being return'd out of Ireland, and bringing his Mother to Callis, gave some Suspicion to the King and Queen, that there were some fresh Resolutions of invading England entertain'd by them of his Party, and that they might make their Endeavours in vain, two Methods were made use of as most effectual. 1. To suppress all such Persons as were known to favour the Duke of York and his Party in England: And 2. To guard the Coasts well with a sufficient Navy, that they might not dare to land any Forces, which could not be done without Hazzard. In order to the former of these the Earl of Wiltshire, Treasurer of England, the Lord Scales, and the Lord Hungerford were sent with the King's Commission to Newbury, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, to inquire out such as favour'd the said Duke, some of whom being found Guilty were hang'd and quarter'd, and the whole Town was plunder'd and spoil'd. From thence the Earl went to Southampton, and other Places, where he used the like Severity. The Fame of these Actions and Dealings, tho' just, much terrified such Towns as knew themselves obnoxious to the same Punishment; and because Kent had given greater Proofs of their Affection to the Lords Side several times this Reign, than any other County had, not only in Jack Cade's Rebellion, but in betraying Sandwich, they expected nothing but Ruin, unless they could come under the Protection of the said Lords: To that End they sent a Message to them at Callis to invite them over to their Defence, promising them their utmost Assistance. The Lord's tho' in some Forwardness for their intended Design, yet would not venture till they had better Knowledge of their Sincerity, and therefore sent over the Lord Falconbridge to try their Resolutions, and concert with them about their further Proceedings. Sir Simon Manford, who for some time before was laid with a Navy of Ships well mann'd and victuall'd to defend the Sea Coasts against all such Attempts, was ready to oppose his landing, whereupon arose an hot Dispute between 'em, but the Victory at length fell to the Lord Falconbridge, who took Sir Simon himself with many other Prisoners, and sent them over to Callis to the Earl of March, where he with Twelve of the chief of his Captains were beheaded upon the Rice-bank. The Lord Falconbridge having thus removed all Impediments of his Landing was receiv'd into Sandwich with an hearty Welcome, and the Gentry of that Country and the adjoining Shires immediately resorted to him, shewing him their Causes of Fears from the Queen and her Friends, and earnestly requesting the speedy Return of the Lords to free themselves and the whole Kingdom from apparent Destruction, promising them their utmost Help and Concurrence. The Lord Falconbridge could not distrust their hearty Protestations, which had all the Signs of Veracity in them, and therefore dispatch'd away a Messenger to the Lords at Callis, to assure them, that he found a general good Inclination in all People in those Parts to them, and a Readiness to do them all the Service they could both in Body and Goods, and it was his Advice, that they should lose no Time, but passing over the Sea should land in England, while the People were so hotly affected to them. The Earls were sensible of the Fitness of this Opportunity to

The Lord's Declaration. The Sum of their Declaration was to this Effect, That the Duke of York, Earls of March, Warwick and Salisbury had divers Times offered and sued to come into the King's Presence to have declared for their Duty to God, His Highness, and Prosperity of the Realm these following Matters, viz.

I. The great Extortion, Murther, Robberies and Oppressions done to the Church and Ministers of it, against the Laws both of God and Man.

II. The Poverty and Misery of His Highness himself, who being cheated and defrauded of the Revenues of the Crown, which might and would support his Royal State, by the Destroyers of the Commonwealth, was forced to oppress and spoil his Subjects.

III. That the Laws were partially and unjustly executed and made to support their Injustice and Oppression, by such as should most love and tender them.

IV. That the Commons were marvellously taxed, and their Goods taken from 'em without Payment, because he permitted the Destroyers of the Land to live upon his own Revenues, suffering all the King's Possessions in France to be lost.

V. That the People begin to have new Impositions laid upon them, viz. every Town to find Men for the King's Guards after the Example of the French our Adversaries, which if continued to our Heirs, will be such a Charge and Bondage, as none of our Ancestors were subject to.

VI. That divers Lords had caused the King to write Letters to his Enemies in Ireland and France to conquer the said Kingdom and take Callis, which Letters were shew'd to the Duke of York by the Irishmen with Detestation of their Villany.

VII. That since the barbarous and shameful Murther of Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester at Bury, it hath been studied and conspired to have destroy'd and murther'd the Duke of York and his Issue of the Royal Blood, as also the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, for no other Cause but for the true Heart they have ever born and do bear to the King's Profit and Wealth of the Realm.

VIII. That the Earls of Shrewsbury and Wiltshire, and the Lord Beaumont, the mortal Enemies of the said Duke and Lords, having the guiding of our Sovereign Lord, would not suffer the King to receive and accept them as he would have done, into his Presence, dreading the Charge, which would have been brought against them for destroying the Nation.

IX. That the said Earls of Wiltshire and Shrewsbury, and Lord Beaumont, not satisfied with the King's Revenues and Goods, had stirr'd up and excited His Highness to hold his Parliament at Coventry, where an Act was made by their Provocation and Labour to destroy the said Duke of York, Earls of March, Rutland, Salisbury and Warwick, and their Issue and their Estates and Tenants were given up to their Hands, who robbed them, and hang'd many of them without the King's Consent or Approbation.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 38. These Mischiefs they declared, they could not but behold with Grief, and therefore now purposed again to offer themselves to the Presence of their said Sovereign Lord to declare them to him in the most reverent Manner, that he may have Pity and Compassion on his miserable Subjects, and not suffer these Mischiefs still to reign. To the effecting of which they required all People to whom their Declaration should come, in God's Behalf and their own, to assist them doing their Duty to their Sovereign, his Person and Dignity, to whom they have been and ever would be true as any of his Subjects alive, to which they called God, the Virgin Mary and all the Saints in Heaven to witness.

What Effect this Declaration had appeared in a short time: For the Earls of March, Warwick and Salisbury, who in a few Weeks after arrived at Sandwich with 1500 Men only, were no sooner arriv'd, but the Lord Cobham met them with 4000 Men, and when they had refreshed themselves a few Days, they march'd thro' Kent to London, and were in their Way joyn'd by several Gentlemen and their Friends, who came in so thick, that before they got to the City they were increased into a Body of near 40000 fighting Men, many Gentlemen and Yeomen of the South-parts joyning with them near London, which they enter'd July 2. and were joyfully receiv'd by the Mayor and the whole City, whether also came the next Day Thomas, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Lincoln, Salisbury, Ely and Exeter, with many other Priors and religious Persons to congratulate their Arrival, by whose Means they hoped for a Reformation of all Abuses in Church and State, tho' not such as follow'd.

The King, who at the Time of the Lords landing was at Coventry, was not unactive as far as in him lay, to stop the Progress of this Rebellion, for which End he appointed the Lord Scales to assemble what Troops he could, and get Possession of London, as the most important Place of the Kingdom, and which if secured, would alone baffle their Attempts. That Lord with the Earl of Kendall, Lord Lovell and others was zealous to obey the King's Command, and with all Expedition marching towards that City, arriv'd there before the Lords, and demanded Admission in the King's Name, assuring the Mayor and chief Citizens, that their coming thither was only to defend and keep the City from the Spoil of those Traitors, who, as the King was credibly inform'd were hastning thither. The Mayor, who secretly favour'd the Lords Undertakings, answer'd, That he needed no Help either to defend or govern the City committed to his Charge, nor would permit any armed Men to come within his Jurisdiction. This Reply much incensed the Lord Scales, who evidently saw the Disloyalty of the Citizens by it; and that he might annoy them, as much as was possible, he entred into the Tower and threaten'd them, that he would with his great Ordnance beat down their City, if they receiv'd the Rebels, which Menaces he endeavour'd after to make good.

The Queen in this Time (for the King hated Wars, and would not mind his own Defence) gathered a good Army about Coventry, (which Place was then call'd, The Queen's secret Harbour) and making the Duke of Somerset (who was in June come from Guisnes into England) the Duke of Buckingham, and divers other Lords, the Captains and Commanders of it, march'd with it, having the King himself with them, to Northampton, where when the Queen saw, that she had Power enough to encounter

While the Queen was thus preparing for her own and the King's Defence, the Lords at London were in great Consultation how to proceed in their Business, and having, to keep up the same shew of Loyalty, to which by their Declaration they had pretended, taken an Oath in a full Convocation of the Clergy at St. Paul's, that they had, and ever would bear faithful and true Allegiance to King Henry, and had no other Intentions, than to redress the Grievances of the Nation, and remove the Destroyers of their Country from about the King's Person; it was agreed, That the Earls of March and Warwick, William, Lord Falconbridge, and Henry, Lord Bourchier, call'd also Earl of Eu, should march with an Army of 25000 Men towards the King and Queen, leaving behind them, to keep the Londoners in their promised Obedience, the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Cobham, and Sir John Wenlocke, who by their Vigilancy kept not only the City in Order, but defended it against the Lord Scales, who annoy'd it with his great Ordnance, and did much Harm to the Citizens; but these Lords by mounting Guns on the other side of the Thames over against the Tower, and preventing all Supplies of Victuals to be sent, put him to equal Straights and Losses. When the King and Queen heard that the Earl of March and Warwick drew near them, it was advis'd, that the King's Army should pass over the River Tyne, and encamp themselves strongly in the open Fields, and wait their coming, which was accordingly done. On July 9. the Earls with their Army encamp'd between Toucester and Northampton, and resolv'd the next Day for the Fight; but at the Mediation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other Bishops which were present, it was thought convenient, that the Bishop of Salisbury should be sent to the King to beseech him to admit the Earl of Warwick into his Presence to declare his Innocency, and offer such an Accord, as that all Things might be settled without Blood-shed. This Request was deny'd by the Duke of Buckingham, and though repeated again and again, yet had no better Answer, the King's Party, it seems, trusting so much to their Strength and Ordnance, and being encourag'd by the Bishop of Hereford to fight, would not hearken to any Proposals of Peace.

The Lord Scales in the Tower annoys the City.

The Lords sue for Peace, but being rejected come to a Battel.

The Earl of March, who being in the heat of his Youth, and very courageous, consider'd not so much the ill Effects of a Battel as the Laurels he longed for, seeing all Proposals of Peace rejected resolv'd to set upon the King's Army without Delay, and in the Night remov'd his Camp towards Northampton, marching in order of Battel; The Earl of Warwick led the Van-Guard, the Earl of March the Body, and the Lord Falconbridge the Rear. About Two a Clock in the Afternoon, July the 9th, the two Armies met, and the Earls of March, and Warwick having given a strict Charge to their Soldiers, that they should none of them lay Hands on the King, nor the Common People, but the Nobles and Gentlemen only, the Battel began and lasted for Five Hours, (or as others, Two Hours) with great Fierceness on both Sides; but at length by the Treachery of the Lord Grey, who went over to the Enemy with a good Party and assisted them, the King's Side was vanquish'd with the Loss of 10000, partly drown'd and partly slain, among which were these Men of Note, Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, the valiant Son of as valiant a Father, Thomas, Lord Egremont, John, Viscount Beaumont, and Sir William Lacy. The Duke of Somerset escap'd narrowly, and with the Queen and Prince Edward fled into the Bishoprick of Durham. Many were taken Prisoners. The King himself, who remain'd in his Tent during the Battel, being left alone, fell into his Enemies Hands, but the Earls of March and Warwick assuring him, That they sought the Welfare of his Person, and Happiness of the Realm, in destroying their malicious Enemies, he was much comforted; and being led to Northampton with Procession, he tarried three Days there, and on July 16. arriv'd at London, where he was lodg'd in the Bishop's Palace.

This Victory reduced the Lord Scales to a low Condition, so that despairing of Help he resign'd the Tower upon Terms, which yet he supposing hardly secure enough, to preserve himself, he endeavour'd to have fled to the Queen in Disguise; but being discover'd by some of the Earl of Warwick's Watermen they slew him, and stripping him of his Cloaths, left his Body naked on the Shore, and wallowing in his own Blood many Days. After this great Inquiry was made for the Favourers of the Lancastrians, and many of them find, and some executed for Treason. Judge Thorp, second Baron of the Exchequer, was taken in a Monk's Habit with his Crown shaven, and imprison'd a while in the Tower, and after executed by the Mob at Highgate.

Queen Margaret hearing, that the King was taken, and that most of her Fast Friends were dead, was in great Perplexities what to do; and fearing she might also with her Son be betray'd to her Enemies, she fled into Wales to the Castle of Harbrough, having only Eight Persons with her, and so got into Scotland, but in Lancashire was robb'd of all her Goods to the Value of Ten Thousand Marks.

The Victorious Lords having the King now in their Power, and ruling all Things almost at their Pleasure proceeded vigorously in the Execution of their Designs; and first call a Parliament to meet at Westminster, October the 8th following, but in the King's Name, and then send into Ireland to the Duke of York to acquaint him with their Success, and invite him to come with all convenient Speed into England, which when he heard he was greatly pleas'd, perswading himself, that now no Obstacle remain'd between himself and the Crown. Ambition needs no Spurs, Preparations are made with all Speed for the Duke to pass into England. At Dublin he and his Retinue took Ship, and in a few Days landed at the Redbank near the City of Chester, and from thence by long Journies came to London upon Friday, October the 10th, which City he entred with Trumpets sounding, and a naked Sword born before him, accompany'd with a great Train of armed Men.

The Parliament was met Two Days before, and the Duke having passed through the City went directly into the Upper-House or Chamber of the Peers, and placed himself in the

When he had stood so a while he turned himself to the Lords; and looked upon them stedfastly, as tho' he would read in their Countenances their Thoughts and Resentments of that Action. After he had stood a while in that Posture, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Bourchier, whom King Henry, who was then in the Queen's Lodgings, had sent to him, came into the House, and having paid him the usual Reverence, asked him, Whether he would not go and see the King. The Duke at this Question was observ'd to change his Colour, and then answer'd him in a Passion, That he knew none in this Kingdom, to whom he owed that Duty or Honour; but on the contrary, all Men owed it to him, and therefore King Henry ought to come to him.

Duke of York calls himself King, and possesses himself of the King's Lodging, and claims the Throne in Parliament. The Archbishop having received this Reply, went back to the King to let him know it; which the Duke of York perceiving, he rose up, and following him into the Palace, got Possession of the King's Lodgings, breaking open several Doors and Locks, that he might enter them. He stayed there but a little while, and then returned to the House again, leaving his Servants and chief Attendants to keep them for him. Being again settled in the Regal Throne, he boldly made his Demand of the Crown, and the Regal Authority of England, in Words to this Effect. (t) 'That he approached that Throne, as the Place to him in Justice belonging, which, he said, not as requiring their Favour, but friendly Indifferency, and true Administration of Justice, for the High and Mighty Prince, Richard II. Son of Edward the Black-Prince, Eldest Son of King Edward III. was the true and undoubted Heir of these Realms, and was in Possession of the Regal Dignity, with all the Rights and Priviledges thereunto belonging, till Henry, Earl of Derby, and Duke of Lancaster and Hereford, Son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, Fourth Son to the said King Edward III. and Younger Brother to my Noble Ancestor, Lionell, Duke of Clarence, Third Son of the said King Edward III. by Force and Violence, contrary to his Duty of Allegiance done and sworn, raised War against the said King Richard, imprisoned him, and usurped and intruded upon his Royal Power, and assumed the Name and Authority of King, and after compassed his Death and Destruction, upon whose Decease, having no Heirs lawfully begotten, the right and Title of the Crown, and Superiority of this Realm, lawfully reverted and return'd to Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, Son and Heir to the Lady Philip, only Child of the abovesaid Lionell, Duke of Clarence, to which Roger's (u) Eldest Daughter Ann, being my dearest and Well-beloved Mother, I being the True and Lawful Heir, have an undoubted Right to the Crown. And if the Title be mine, why am I kept from it? If my Claim be good, why have I not Justice? For Men of Knowledge must own, that usurp'd Possession, tho' strengthened with a lineal Descent, can nothing prevail, if continual Claim lawfully made, and openly publish'd by the Right Heirs, as it hath been by Edward, Earl of March, my Uncle, Richard, Duke of York, (x) my Father, and my self; but thro' sinister Counsel and unjust Detention, I can neither obtain nor recover it, so that I am compell'd to make use of Force to regain my Right, and settle the Peace of the Realm, which thro' a Succession of Usurpers has been miserably ruined, and undone, especially in this last Reign; and therefore I have, and now do take Possession of the Royal Throne, trusting thro' the Assistance of you, the Peers of this Realm, to beautifie and maintain the same to the Glory of God, Honour of my Blood, and publick Welfare of all my People (y). This Speech struck all the Auditors with a kind of Consternation, and the Lords themselves sat mute, neither whispering nor moving, as if in some Discontent at what he had said, or at least in a doubt what to do; for King Henry's Piety and Holiness, Succession in the Third Degree, and Thirty eight Years Possession of the Crown, had so far confirm'd most of them in the Opinion of his Right, that they were loth to be instrumental in deposing him, whose very Innocency and Goodness entitl'd him to a better Crown than ever he had worn. The Duke of York, whose Eagerness to be King, taught him to expect a ready Compliance with his Desires, was much disappointed, when he saw no Man almost seconding his Wishes; wherefore being neither well contented, nor willing to seem much displeased, he advis'd them to consider thoroughly of what he had said to them, and do to him, what in Justice and Wisdom they judged Right; and so departed to his Lodgings at Whitehall. (z) While the Duke was thus declaring and shewing his Title to the Crown in the House of Lords, it happen'd, that in the House of Commons a Crown, which hung up in the Middle of the Roof to adorn a Branch set up for Lights, fell down suddenly, without any imaginable Cause, and also another Crown upon the Top of Dover-Castle, which were both looked upon at this Juncture as ominous Accidents, which did betoken that the Crown should some way or other have a Fall, and that there would be sudden Alterations in the Government.

The Crown hanging now in doubt as it were, between King Henry and the Duke of York, and Consultations being held every Day by the Lords about their Titles, on whose Head it should be settled; The Duke of York taking upon him a

(f) He did not sit down on the Throne, he only took hold of the Cloth of State.
(t) His sitting on the Throne, and making this Speech, is very much to be doubted: For John Whethamsted, Abbot of St. Albans, who was present in the House of Peers, makes no Mention of any such Speech in the History that he wrote of this Reign, and particularly this Revolution. Hol. 655.
(u) As a Proof of the Forgery of this Speech, we shall instance one Mistake, which could not come from the Mouth of the Duke of York, he says, Which Roger's Eldest Daughter Ann — She was not the Eldest Daughter, the Lady Elinor Mortimer, as we have said elsewhere was Elder, tho' she left no issue, and so the Right of Inheritance devolv'd to Ann. But this may be an Error of the Author; and indeed in the original Speech 'tis only said, Unto which Roger's Daughter call'd Ann, &c. See Hol. pag. 656 The Nonsense of the Oration is as remarkable as the Subject of it, He tells them in the first Paragraph, This Noble Realm, and our Natural Country shall never be Unbuckled from her daily Feaver, except I as the Principal Physician, and you as the Trusty Apothecaries consult together in making of the Potion, and try out the Clean and Pure Stuff from the Corrupt and Putrified Drugs.
(x) His Father was not Duke of York. His Uncle Edward had the Title, and his Father only that of Earl of Cambridge, which Earl was beheaded for Treason at Sourhampton in the Third Year of Henry V.
(y) He did not make use of the Term My People, and it had been arrogant in him. His Words were, To the Publick Wealth, as well of you all here present, as of all the poor Commons of this Kingdom and Regiments.
(z) Whitehall was not then built. He went to his Lodgings in the King's Palace at Westminster, near the Abby.

kind

*A. King of Scots, to quit the English Dominions. King (a) James at the Duke's Request had entred the Kingdom of England with a powerful Army, and besieged Roxborough, upon the Promise, that he would restore to him the Towns which the English had taken away from him. (For that King was very unwilling to meddle in the Dispute, and would not be induced to it but by this Advantage.) The Duke had his Messengers tell the Scotch King, that the Siege was so displeasing to him and all his People, he could hardly keep them from taking up Arms to relieve it, thanking him for his Assistance, and telling him, that he had now no more need of him. The King of Scots answered, He was glad at his good Success, and asked the Messengers, Whether they had a Commission to deliver up the Towns to him according to the Duke's Promise? They answer'd, No. Whereupon the King reply'd, Neither will I quit the Siege, which for all these Threats, whether his, or People's, I hope to put a speedy End to. And play'd upon the Town with his Cannon more furiously than ever, with a Resolution to gain it before any Succour could come; but ere he could effect it, he was slain by the Breaking of a Cannon, no Man else save the Earl of Angus being hurt by it. Yet this Accident did not put an End to the Siege, for the Scots continued their Assaults rather the sharper, and the Besieged being reduced to a low Condition by their great Losses, yielded themselves to the new King James III. their Lives and Goods being saved. About the same Time died Charles, King of France, in a strange Manner; for he being sick, some of his Courtiers inform'd him of a Design to poison him; whereupon he forbore any Food for Seven Days, and after not being able to eat, died.

Charles, King of France died.

The Crown disputed, but at last settled on these Conditions.

While these Things were doing, many hot Disputes had passed between the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, about the Settlement of the Crown; some thought it very unreasonable to call King Henry's Title in Question, who had been so long in Possession of the Sovereignty, and so much the rather, because the Duke of York himself had in swearing Allegiance to King Henry so often, and declaring him his lawful Sovereign, tied up himself from Claiming the Crown, if he had any Right to it. But on the other Side, the Duke of York's Friends (which were not a few) argued that the Duke's Title was so clear, and so well known to them all, that it would be the greatest Injustice in the World to deny him his Right, and tho' King Henry, it is true, had been long in the Possession of the Throne, yet his Usurpation being so evident, he ought to be as willing to recede from what he was wrongfully possessed of, as they were in Justice bound to declare him deprived. 'Tis true, they said, the Duke of York had often sworn Allegiance to King Henry, and taken him for his lawful Sovereign, yet he never renounced his Right, and 'tis plain, his Oaths and Promises were out of Fear or Force, not willingly. These Arguments were thought strong on both Sides, and therefore the middle Way was pitched upon by the Lords, and upon All Saints-Day, an Agreement was made between these two Princes, King Henry, and Richard, Duke of York, under these Articles.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39.

I. That notwithstanding the clear and undisputable Title of Richard, Duke of York, to the Crown of England, as Heir to Lionell, Duke of Clarence, the said Duke tenderly desiring the Wealth and Prosperity of this Land, and to lay aside all that may be a Trouble to the same; and considering the long Possession of the said King Henry, who hath all his Time been named, taken, and reputed for King of England, and Lord of Ireland, is contented, and agreed, that the said King Henry, shall be taken and reputed King of England, and Lord of Ireland, during his Natural Life, and the said Duke shall honour him as his Sovereign Lord.

II. That the said Richard, Duke of York, with his Two Sons, Edward, Earl of March, and Edmund, Earl of Rutland, shall promise and bind themselves by solemn Oaths, neither to do, procure, or suffer any Thing to the Prejudice of the Natural Life of King Henry VI. or to the diminishing of his Royal Dignity, but shall withstand to their utmost Power any Person that shall attempt it, as God shall help them.

III. That Richard, Duke of York, shall from thenceforth be called and reputed the Very and Rightful Heir to the English Crowns, and after the Decease of the said King Henry, the said Duke and his Heirs shall immediately succeed to them.

IV. That the said Richard, Duke of York, shall have by the Authority of this present Parliament, Castles, Mannors, Lands and Tenements, with their Appertinances, to the yearly Value of 10000 Marks over and above all Charges and Reprises, of which 5000 Marks shall be for his own Estate, 3000 for the Earl of March, and 2000 for the Earl of Rutland, yet with such Intents and Considerations, as shall be declared by the Lords of the King's Council.

VIII. That all Statutes and Acts of Parliament, made in the Time of Henry IV. or V. to entail the Crown on their Heirs, shall be annul'd and repeal'd.

IX. That the Duke of York shall be Protector of the Realm for the future, and be called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester.

(a) He was so far from entering the English Dominions at the Request of the Duke of York, that he came to revenge the Death of the Duke of Somerset, his Mother's Brother, whom the Duke of York had been the Means of killing at the Battel of St. Albans.

A. D. 1460. Reg. 39. This Agreement drawn up in the Form aboveſaid, was engroſſed, ſealed, and ſworn unto by both Parties on All Saints-Day, and then it was enacted by the Parliament, that it be made unalterable on all Hands. King Henry was obſerved to be very much pleaſed with this Agreement, not doubtleſs, becauſe he was willing his Son, ſhould be excluded from the Crown. But becauſe he feared more ſevere Dealings with himſelf, and hoped Time would better provide for his Son, and therefore appointed a ſolemn Proceſſion the ſame Day to give Thanks to God for this peaceable Settlement of Affairs. In it the King rode to the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, attended with the Duke of York, Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and many other Lords, with his Crown upon his Head, and heard Even-Song, and then return'd to the Biſhop's Palace, where he continued ſome Time. The next Day Richard, Duke of York, was by Sound of Trumpet ſolemnly proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown of England, and Protector of the Nation, during the King's Life. After theſe Things the Parliament made an Act, ' That the Parliament (b) at Coventry, Nov. 20. An. 38. Hen. VI. ſhall be repealed, and all the Acts Statutes and Ordinances made by the Authority of the ſaid Parliament, diſannull'd, becauſe that Parliament was unlawfully ſummon'd and holden, and the Knights and Burgeſſes not duly choſen, but privately appointed by thoſe Men, who ſought the Deſtruction of the Nobility and Commonwealth: And, that a Woman at Fourteen Years of Age at the Death of her Anceſtor or Parent, ſhall without any Difficulty or Queſtion, have Livery and Seizin of the Lands deſcend'd to her: And then the Parliament was diſſolv'd, being the laſt that ever King Henry call'd, or ended.

Duke of York rules as Protector, and cauſes the King to ſend for the Queen. And now the Duke of York's Power began, as Guardian of the King's Perſon, he took care of all Things, but chiefly of himſelf, how he might keep what he had obtained; for he very well knew that the Queen, who was a Woman of a maſculine Spirit, and the Lords of her Council, who were his utter Enemies, would make all the Oppolition they could to this Settlement, and either by Force or Fraud undo all; whereupon he cauſed King Henry to ſend for her, and her Son Prince Edward. But the Queen, (who by that Time the Meſſengers arrived, was got at the Head of a good Army of 18000 Men, which ſhe put under the Command of the Dukes of Exeter and Somerſet, Earls of Devonſhire and Northumberland, Lords of Clifford and Roſſe, who encouraged her with great Hopes of Victory, to engage her Adverſaries, and reſtore her Husband to his Dignity, and her Son to his Succeſſion) refus'd to go along with them. Which when the Protector had Knowledge of, he aſſign'd his truſty Friends the Earl of Warwick and Duke of Norfolk to be the Keepers of the King; and he himſelf, and the Earls of Salisbury and Rutland, with a ſmall Body of Men departed from London, December 2. to go into the North to repreſs the Queen, and her northern Adherents, ordering the Earl of March to follow him with all the Forces he could gather. Upon Chriſtmas-Eve, the Duke arrived at his Caſtle of Sandal, near Wakefield, in Yorkſhire, and there muſter'd up all his Tenants and Friends to the Number of 5000. With theſe he intended to oppoſe the Queen's Army, who, by his Scouts, he underſtood were marching towards him, which the Queen, and Lords of her Party halt- ned, that they might fall upon him before the Earl of March could join with him. When they drew near, the Duke found the Queen's Forces much to exceed his, and therefore it was the Advice of the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir David Hall, That he ſhould keep himſelf within the Walls till the Earl of March ſhould arrive, becauſe the Queen had no Artillery with her, and ſo could do them no Harm in that Time.

The Queen and her Army came before the Caſtle, and having laid two Ambuſhes under the Command of the Lord Clifford and Earl of Wiltſhire at the beſt Advantage, the Queen and Duke of Somerſet, who commanded the Body of the Army, preſented themſelves in Sight of Sandal, and going up to the very Walls, brav'd the Duke to come out and fight them. The Duke being hot and furious at this Bravado, and counting it a Shame to be ſhut up in a Caſtle by a Woman, which he had never been in ſo many Years of the French Wars, reſolv'd to venture out in the open Field, and give her Battel. All his Friends were much againſt it, but not being able to diſſwade him from it, by all the Arguments they could uſe, they all march'd out of the Caſtle upon the laſt Day of December, and going down the Hill in very good Order, came into the open Field before the Face of their Enemies, who immediately join'd Fight with them. Soon after the Battel was begun, the Ambuſhes roſe, and encompaſſed the Duke and his Men on every Side, ſo that within Half an Hour he himſelf was ſlain, with many of the Perſons of Note that were with him, valiantly fighting, and his whole Army utterly defeated, 2800 of them being killed. The Earl of Salisbury was wounded and taken, with ſeveral Gentlemen and others. Robert Aſpell, the Duke's Chaplain, and Tutor to the Earl of Rutland, who ſtood at ſome Diſtance to ſee the Event of the Battel, with his Pupil, who was then about Twelve Years of Age, perceiving that it was likely to prove unſucceſſful and fatal to his Lord, fled with the Young Earl to ſecure him, but was overtaken by the Lord Clifford, who in the Heat of his Fury, ſtabb'd the young Prince to the Heart, tho' the poor Child with Tears begg'd Mercy of him upon his Knees (c). The Chaplain pleaded much for the Child's Life, and promiſed the Lord, That if he would ſpare him, he ſhould be his Servant for ever. But Clifford ſwore fearfully, That as his Father had ſlain his, ſo he would be the Deſtruction of him and all his Race; and then ſlaying him, departed in Triumph to find the dead Body of his Father, whoſe Head he cut off, and having made a Crown of Paper, and ſet it on it in Deriſion, preſented it to the Queen, whoſe Tent was at Hand, and ſhe not long after, ſent it with other Lords to be ſet upon Poles over the Gate of the City of York. The Earl of Salisbury, who was committed to the Care of the Duke of Somerſet, and by him impriſon'd in the Caſtle of Pomfract, with a Promiſe to ſave his Life for a large Sum of Money, was a little after by the Common People, who hated him, pull'd out of the Caſtle, and beheaded, and ſo his Head, with others, was ſent to York.

King Henry, by the Inſtigatiſon of his Governours, the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Warwick, ſent Commiſſions into the Parts about Coventry, to raiſe what Forces they could to ſup-

A. D. 1461. The Queen having obtain'd this Victory over the Duke of York was ſenſible, that tho' the Advantage might do her much good, becauſe the Commons generally follow the conquering Side, yet it had done her Enemies Side but very little Harm, becauſe it was but a ſmall Party, and thoſe pick'd up in the Country about Wakefield, which ſhe had conquer'd. She knew Warwick's Courage and Interests were great in London, where he had a ſtrong Army to oppoſe her, and the Earl of March was gone into Wales, where his Father had many Tenants and Dependants to gather an Army, ſo that ſhe had no ſmall Difficulties to grapple with, before ſhe could accompliſh her Deſigns, and ſettle her Husband and Son in their Rights. She expected no ſmall Oppoſition on both Sides, and therefore after a ſerious Conſultation with the Lords and other grave Men that follow'd her Interests, it was reſolv'd, That ſhe her ſelf, the Prince and Duke of Somerſet ſhould march towards London with the greateſt part of her Army, and Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, Earl of Ormond and Wiltſhire, who raiſed a great Number of Iriſh and Welch to the Queen's Aſſiſtance ſhould obſerve the Earl of March, and gather freſh Forces out of her Friends to encounter him. The Earl of March in the mean time having heard of his Father's Death at Glouceſter, where he then lay, was ſtrangely amaz'd and diſcourag'd at the Accident; but being comforted by his Friends, who told him 'twas his Father's Raſhneſs, not his Enemies Power, that had been the Cauſe of this Miſfortune, he remov'd to Shrewsbury, and there declaring his Father's Death, the Queen's Cruelty, and the Ruin of the Kingdom to all the Inhabitants of that City, and the adjoining Countries, he got an Army out of the Marches of Wales, and the Places near, to the Number of 23000, who out of Love to Mortimer's Race offered themſelves readily to go againſt the Queen and his Father's Murderers. With theſe he departs from Shrewsbury to follow the Queen's Army, which was marching towards London, and revenge his Father's Death; but at his firſt ſetting out, hearing that Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke, and the Earl of Ormond with a great Army of Welch and Iriſh were purſuing him, he turn'd back to fight them, and on a large Plain near Mortimer's Croſs on the Eaſt-side of Hereford, met them. On Candlemas-day in the Morning, when the Sun at its riſing appear'd to the Earl of March like Three Suns, and ſuddenly running into One gave him (as he gueſſed) an Omen of Victory, the two Armies entred the Battel, and after a ſharp Conflict, the Earl of March put the Queen's Forces to Flight, with the Slaughter of 3800. The two Earls of Pembroke and Ormond fled, and many Gentlemen of Note were taken, and to propitiate York's Ghoſt were beheaded at Hereford.

Earl of March gathers an Army of 23000 Men, and engages the Forces of the Earl of Pembroke and Ormond and conquers.

The Queen, who was marching towards London with her Northern Rabble, who after they had paſſed the River Trent, plunder'd the Villages and Towns, as if they were entred an Enemy's Country, heard of the Diſcomfiture of her Friends; but being elevated with the Thoughts of her former Victory, and knowing that the Mayor and many of the chief Men of London were for her, ſhe went on confidently in hopes of ſoon recovering that Loſs. But when ſhe approach'd St. Albans, ſhe receiv'd the News that the Earl of Warwick and Lords, who had the Government of the King, were coming againſt her with a numerous Army, raiſed by the King's Authority, and having the King himſelf at the Head of them, (for the Commons of the City of London fearing they ſhould fall into the Hands of the Northern Men, flock'd to the Lords to defend the City againſt the Queen). The Northern Lords and others that were with the Queen, adviſed her to paſs thro' St. Albans and meet their Enemies on the other ſide of the Town; but the Earl of Warwick having ranged his Archers in the middle of the Town, they were forced to retreat, and find another Way; which having done, the two Armies joyn'd upon Barnard-beath on the North-side of St. Albans. The Battel was fierce, and the Victory remain'd dubious a certain time; but at length through the Treachery of Lovelace, who kept back the main Body of the King's Army from aſſiſting their Brethren, till they being over-power'd were forced to fly, the Queen's Side gain'd the Victory, and with the Slaughter of 2300 Men obtain'd the King into their Power, with the Lord Bonville and Sir Thomas Kiriell: Who upon the King's Promise of Safety to them ſtay'd with his Majeſty, but to their Coſt: For, when the Queen heard that the Commons had beheaded Judge Thorp at High-gate, ſhe cut off both their Heads.

After this Battel, which was fought upon February the 15th, the King and Queen with Prince Edward, now about Eight Years Old, and the Northern Lords went to the Abby-Church and gave Thanks to God for this Victory, and then the King made the Prince Knight, with Thirty others, who had ſignaliſed their Courage in fighting for her, which done the King and Queen were conducted to their Lodgings in the Abby. But the Town of St. Albans was not at quiet. The Northern Men ranſack'd and plunder'd the Houſes without Mercy: Whereupon the Abbot and chief Inhabitants made an humble Petition to the King and Queen to reſtrain the Soldiers Rudeneſs and Theft, which was granted, and a Proclamation accordingly put out; but they reply'd, That it was their Bargain to have all the Spoil of every Place beyond the Trent, and ſo they continued their pillaging and Robberies.

While the Queen lay at St. Albans her Army being in want for Proviſion, ſhe gave an Order to the Mayor of London to ſend her a ſufficient Quantity of Lenten-fare for her Soldiers, which he readily obey'd; and having fill'd ſeveral Carts was conveying it to her, but the Commons of the City in a great Company met them about Cripple-gate, and ſtopp'd them, ſaying, They would not feed them that would cut their Throats, and rob them of all they had. The Mayor with many mild Exhortations adviſed them to let them paſs, being for the Relief of the King and his Friends, but he could not perſwade them to it, and he ſaw it was in vain to uſe any Force with them: Whereupon the Mayor fearing the Queen's Diſpleaſure, ſent the Recorder of the City to the King's Council at Barnet, and the Dutcheſs of Bedford and Lady Scales with ſome Biſhops to the Queen to excuſe the Matter, and pacifie her Diſpleaſure, promiſing the Queen to admit her into London, when Things were a little better appeaſed among the Commons. The Queen was pleaſed with the Propoſals, and paſſed by the Diſappointment of Relief for her Army, ſending 400 Men

A. D. 1461. Reg. 39. 400 Men to prepare for her entring into the City, which if she could secure to her self, she hop'd to win all again.

But while these Things were acting, News came to the Queen, that the Earl of March, who had vanquish'd the Earls of Ormond and Pembroke was join'd with the Earl of Warwick, and the Forces escap'd from St. Albans, and that they both were coming towards London, making a mighty Army. The Queen fearing their Forces thought not fit to oppose them, and so withdrew from St. Albans into the North, (because she had few or no Friends in Kent or Essex). The Earl of March having certain Intelligence of the Queen's Departure, thought it not convenient to pursue her, but took his Way directly towards London, and was there receiv'd with universal Joy by all the Commons, and many other Citizens, February the 28th.

His coming to London being known, the Gentry of the South and East-parts flock'd to him, bringing great Numbers to his Assistance. In this Concourfe of People it was thought convenient to settle Matters fully, and place the Earl of March on the Throne, if possible: And to that End, March the 2d, the Earl of Warwick drawing up his Army into St. John's Field in the midst of Throngs of People, which he cast into a Ring round him, read the Agreement made the last Parliament between King Henry and the Duke of York, which having told them was notoriously broken by King Henry, and so his Crown forfeited, he demanded of them, whether they would have King Henry to reign still or no? They all cry'd out, No, no. Then he again ask'd them, Whether they would have the Duke of York's Eldest Son to reign over them, according to that Settlement? They unanimously cry'd out, Yea, yea. The Affection of the People being thus known, a general Council of the Nobles, Bishops, Gentlemen and chief Citizens was summon'd at Baynard's Castle, and there the Earl of March declared again his Title to the Crown, and recited the Articles made the last Parliament, by which he was to have Possession of it, if King Henry broke the said Articles, as undeniably he had. The whole Council after a long Debate at length concluded, That because King Henry had done contrary to the Agreement in the last Parliament made and concluded, and was insufficient of himself to govern the Realm, he was therefore to be deprived of all Regal Authority and Power, as being incapable of it, and a Detriment to the Commonwealth of England; and that Edward, Earl of March, Son and Heir to Richard, Duke of York, having the unquestionable Title to the Crown of England, was by them all unanimouf-

ly nam'd, elected and admitted for the King and Governour of this Realm. The Earl of March modestly declared his Insufficiency for so great a Charge, being as yet young (d) and unexperienced; but being encourag'd by the Arch-bishop and other Lords he accepted their Petition, and took upon him the Name and Title of King of England. The next Day he went in Procession to St. Paul's, and there offer'd his Thanks to God for this his Exaltation to a Throne by singing Te Deum, which done he was with great State conducted to Westminster; and there in the Great Hall set in the King's Seat with St. Edward's Scepter in his Hand; where being throng'd with Multitudes of People to be Spectators of the Ceremony, it was again ask'd them, whether they would have the Earl of March for their King, and serve, love, honour and obey him as their only Sovereign and Lord; they all joyfully answer'd, Yea, yea. Then he took the Homage of the Noblemen there present, and after was conducted by them to the Abby, where having sat in the Quire till Te Deum was sung, he went to St. Edward's Shrine and offer'd according to the usual Custom. Things being thus finish'd, he return'd by Water to St. Paul's, and took up his Lodgings in the Bishop's Palace, and the next Day was proclaimed King of England by the Name of Edward IV. in the Streets of London and adjoining Towns.

Thus ended the Reign of Henry VI. many Years before his Death (for he lived twelve Years longer) after he had reign'd thirty eight Years, six Months, and three Days, a Prince very Pious and Religious, but always attended with ill Fortune; for whatever Side he was of, the Victory ever went against him, as the former History shews. He had no Genius for Government nor Parts fit for the Management of State Affairs; but being a great lover of Charity and good Works, he might have been as good a King as England ever had, if he had been guided by a wise and good Council; but he was ruled by the Queen and her Favourites, who were envy'd by a proud Nobility, and was the Cause of great Miseries to the Nation. His Queen indeed may seem to have excell'd her Sex as much as the King sunk below the Dignity of his own, but her ambitious assuming the Regal Power beyond her Sphere, made it thought no Rebellion to take it out of her Hands, and put it where it would be better order'd and was more due. His Fall was much pitied, because as to his Person undeserv'd; but the common Good so much requir'd a Change, that it was judg'd better, That One suffer an Injury, rather than the whole Nation should perish.

EDWARD IV.

1461.

Richard,
Duke of York slain at Wakefield Fight
by Queen Margaret's Forces.

RICHARD, Duke of York overthrown by his own Rashness, and the happy Conduct of Queen Margaret, at the Battel of Wakefield in Yorkshire, left the Justice of his Title with a more prosperous Fortune to his Son Edward, Earl of March, and then Duke of York. His Head during Life, busied with Expectations of Sovereignty, was mock'd with a Paper Crown after his Death, and being fix'd on a Pole was set on the Walls of York. For the Queen, to make his Pretensions to the Kingdom the common Scorn, forgot that Compassion she ow'd Human Nature in Calamity, and in a phantastick Cruelty expos'd it thus to the barbarous Mirth of the Be-holders. With him died his young Son Edmond, Earl of Rutland, then but 12 Years Old, coming too soon with his Tutor to the School of War; and learning at first the sharpest Lesson from the Lord Clifford, who most inhumanly stab'd him prostrate at his Feet, intreating but for Life.

The unlucky Fate of
Richards.

In the very Haven, after a long and tempestuous Voyage, thus perish'd the Duke of York; as if it had been in the Fate of all the Richards, who were either in Fact or Title Kings of England, to end by violent Deaths. Richard the First and Second preceding him: His Son Richard the Tyrant, and Richard, Duke of York his Nephew, following him in the like Disaster, though several Ways, and upon different Quarrels.

Edward,
Duke of York perishes in his Father's Claim, and gathers an Army to
his Death.

This great Overthrow was suddenly rumor'd thro' the whole Kingdom, and stretch'd up to the Highest, to advance the Reputation of the Queen's Felicity. And soon it arriv'd at Gloucester, where Edward now Duke of York lay with some small Forces, expecting Directions from his Father: By whose Death perceiv- ing himself in so foul Weather to sit alone at the Helm, he began more warily to steer his Course: And considering how dangerous Delay is to increase the Approaches of Misfor- tune, remov'd to Shrewsbury. By the way his Army swel'd up to 23000 fighting Men; which might appear strange if we weigh the necessary Unexperience of his Youth, being then but 18 Years of Age, and the slender Retinue that usu- ally waits on Infelicity. But now he was the Head of the great Body of that Faction, which his Father at the Expence of so long Trouble, had purchased to his Side; and whom the Queen's implacable Nature had made resolute, and only to hope for Safety by running into the common Danger. Moreover all the Men of Pow- er who inhabited between Gloucester and Shrews- bury, had Dependency on him as Heir to Mortimer; or held in chief of his mighty Confede- rate the Earl of Warwick.

1461.

With this sudden and unexpected Addition of Forces, he entertain'd a Confidence to be able to revenge his Father's Death, and obtain that Greatness which as yet had been in vain at- tempted. He therefore look'd about, where he might on the best Advantage make Experience of his Fortune: Fortune appearing easie to be courted by him as if enamour'd with his Youth; having been seldom observ'd but froward to Age, in any Design that depends chiefly upon Courage.

And Occasion was immediately offer'd: Cer- tain Discovery being made of a great Power rais'd by the adverse Party, with purpose to sur- prize him in the Amazement of the late Mis- fortune. The Army consisted of Welsh and Irish, according to the several Nations of the two Commanders, Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, and James, Earl of Ormond: Pembroke half Brother to Henry VI. as Son to Queen Catherine, Dowager to Henry V. by Owen Tudor: And Ormond a most faithful Servant to the House of Lanca- ster, by whose Gift in England he enjoy'd the Earldom of Wiltshire.

Against these two the Duke of York led back his Forces, and in a large Plain near Mortimer's Cross, near Ludlow in Shropshire, on Candlemas- Day in the Morning, gave them Battel. Before the Fight, the Sun (as by many Authors it is asser- ted) appear'd to the Earl in the Resemblance of Three Suns, and suddenly united into One: The Truth of which I will not dispute, but certainly the Pretension of such Apparitions strangely prevails with the superstitious Multi- tude, and therefore it hath been both the Pra- ctice and Advantage of the most expert Com- manders to set them on Foot: Yet how this O- men could be expounded happy to his Design, I understand not, unless we seek the Interpreta- tion from the Event; for that indeed gave him the Victory, and brought the Glory of the two adverse Generals over to his Side, so that the three Suns which with equal Brightness appea- red in the Morning, before Evening shin'd alone in him. For the two Earls and their whole Army were put to Flight, with the Slaughter of 3800 on the Place: Many Welsh and some English of Name were taken Prisoners, and af- terward at Hereford beheaded, among whom an extraordinary Fortune hath made Owen Tudor, the Father of the Earl of Pembroke, most the Discourse of Posterity. For the good luck of an amiable Person, wrought him into the Affection, and soon after advanced him to the Marriage of Catherine, Daughter of France, and Widow

This Victory raised Edward's Imaginations high, so that now he resolv'd to spend his Fortune no longer in small Enterprizes: And left the Spirit of his Army should begin to languish, having no Enemy near to find him Employment, he resolv'd to search for one about London, whither he had Intelligence the Queen with her triumphant Forces directed her March, not without Hopes of obtaining Admission, because the Mayor and others were her Friends: Moreover, it concerned the Policy of his Affairs, to retain the Possession of the capital City of the Kingdom, whose Commons continued firm to his Service, and in which the Lords of his Party had the Custody of King Henry's Person, left to their Faith, when the Duke of York went his last fatal Expedition.

Edward's Title to the Crown of England. But in Edward's first Entrance on the Kingdom the popular Suffrage (which in the Inauguration of Christian Princes is of ancient Custom esteem'd a convenient Ceremony) met with a just Title. For he by his Grand-mother, Ann, Daughter and Heir of Roger Mortimer, Son and Heir to Philippa, only Child of Lionell, Duke of Clarence, third Son to Edward III. King of England; of necessity must have (where Women are admitted to inherit) better claim to the Crown than Henry VI. though in the fourth Descent from Edward III. by John of Gaunt, being but his fourth Son. For however Casuists may dispute, or civil Lawyers argue; that the being remov'd one Degree further, can no way prejudice Succession, whereby the younger Brother may come to be prefer'd before the Elder Brother's Son, if by chance the Elder die during his Father's Life; yet 'tis an Injustice so against Reason and Custom, that whosoever yet attempted it, was reputed to violate the Laws of Nature.

Edward accepts the Kingdom. From St. John's Fields, the Principal of the Army, and Common-Council of the City, brought News of this Election to Edward, Earl of March, remaining at Baynard's Castle: Who soon as he understood the Intention of their Address (with such Modesty as some Clergy-Man may have used at his Consecration, who by simoniacal Practice hath obtain'd a Bishoprick) refused that a while, which most ambitiously he coveted. But soon the Animation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Warwick, the Bishops of London and Exeter, and divers others of Eminence prevail'd, and he at their Request took on him the Royalty.

King Edward declares his Title to the Crown, but requires the Peoples Approbation which he had again. That Night he rested, the next Morning with as much Ceremony and State, as the Shortness and Unquietness of the Time could license, in solemn Procession he went to St. Paul's Church; whence after Te Deum sung, and Oblation made, he rode to Westminster, there seated in the most perspicuous place of the great Hall, with the Scepter of St. Edward the Confessor in his Hand, himself made Declaration of his double Title to the Crown. First, By descent, as Heir to the third Son of Edward III. the Line of whose eldest Son Edward the Black Prince extinguish'd in the Deposition and Parricide of Richard II. procured by Henry of Bullingbrooke, first King of the House of Lancaster, Edward the Third's second Son William dying without Issue. Secondly, By Authority of Parliament, which upon Examination of the Duke of York's Title, conferred the Possession of the Kingdom immediately on him or his Heirs, when Henry VI. should make Forfeiture of it, by Death, Relinquishment, or Breach of that Accord sworn there so solemnly by them. And that this Accord was broken, the Slaughter of the Duke oppos'd with unequal Numbers on K. Henry's Party at the Battel of Wakefield, did sadly manifest. Nevertheless he protested himself ready to forgo the Justice of his Claim, rather than to enter upon it without the free Vote. At which unanimously the Assembly cry'd K. Edward, K. Edward, joyful that their Voices might confirm him King, who had daign'd them so humble a Complement, as to profess that he would not receive the Title without their Suffrage. The Formality of this second Election thus past, he went in Procession to the Abby; whence after much Solemnity and Homage of all the Nobility there present, he return'd by Water to the Bishop of London's Palace, and was immediately proclaim'd King throughout the City by the Name of Edward the Fourth.

The first Fortnight of his Reign was dy'd, I will not say stain'd, with the Blood of Walter Walker a Grocer, who keeping Shop at the Sign of the Crown in Cheapside, said he would make his Son Heir to the Crown; a bold Jest broke in an evil Time, yet do I not side with them in Opinion, who tax the King of Severity in this Execution, unless I could clear this Man from being particularly factious for the House of Lancaster, or know that these Words were utter'd in innocent Mirth, without any Scorn to King Edward's Title. And however perhaps the extraordinary Punishment of such saucy Language, was not then unnecessary to beget Authority, and make Men cautious to dispute the Descent of Princes, when the Question was so nice, and Arguments not improbable on either Side.

But here in her very first Courtship, Fortune rais'd K. Edward higher than the Endeavours of a long Ambition had done his Father. For now was he consecrated King in the Imperial City of this Realm, adorn'd with every Circumstance of Sovereignty; and all his Enterprizes hitherto so flatter'd with Success, that he could promise nothing but Prosperity to his Hopes. Yet was the Ground whereon he built uncertain, and his State brought into Comparison with his Competitor, frail and obnoxious to Ruin.

For Henry had equal Dignity with the Advantage of a long Reign, an uninterrupted Descent in Majesty for 60 Years, a Sovereignty acknowledg'd Abroad by all Christian Princes, and obey'd at Home by all English Men without Dispute, a Title according to the Law Salick indubitable, and which had been confirm'd at the first Entry of his Grand-father Henry IV. into the Kingdom, not only by Resignation of Richard II. by general Acknowledgment of all the Nobility, and by Authority of Parliament, but even by Approbation, nay particular Negotiation of Edmond, Duke of York; Edward, Duke of Aumerl; Richard, Earl of Cambridge, Grand-Father, Great-Uncle, and Great-Grandfather to the late anointed K. Edward IV. Only a feeble Judgment, and a long evil Fortune rendred Henry VI. inferiour, which to counterpoise Q. Margaret and the Lords of her side were daring and vigilant, omitting no Stratagem or Endeavour that might add to the Honour or Safety of their Designs.

Whereupon she continu'd still in the North, and obliging that People every Day more to her Service, labour'd to prepare such an Army as might upon the worst of Fortune be able enough for Defence: And soon she found how much her own and the Authority of the great Lords of her Side prevail'd, having rais'd 60000 fighting Men, and they all resolv'd with Expence of their Blood to buy back that Majesty, which the House of Lancaster by evil Fate had lost. The Army being committed to the Charge of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford.

K. Henry's Army, commanded by the Duke of Somerset, &c. Among these it was resolv'd that Ferribrig, in regard of the Consequence of the Place, was at any hazzard to be recover'd, and the Enterprize left to the Undertaking of Clifford; who early the next Morning, least Delay might betray his Design to the Enemy, with a competent Number march'd thither, and that with such Diligence and Secrecy, that before there was the least Suspicion of an Assault, the uncircumspect Guard was entred upon and defeated. With the Tumult the Lord Fitzwalter, and the Bastard of Salisbury were awaken'd, and suspecting a Mutiny among their own Soldiers, rose hastily from their Beds, and coming down encounter'd a merciless Enemy, who deny'd all Quarter, and on the Place slew them.

Lord Clifford gains Ferribrig of Edward's Men. The Loss of this so comodious Passage and Slaughter of such eminent Persons came first to the Ear of the Earl of Warwick, who somewhat too much transported with the evil Fate of their first Attempt posted in all haste to K. Edward, in whose Presence he kill'd his Horse, and said, Sir, God have mercy on their Souls, who for love of you in the Beginning of your Enterprize have lost their Lives, yet let him flie who will flie, by this Cross (kissing the Hilt of his Sword) I will stand by him who will stand by me, fall back, fall edge.

Great Men have their Frailties. Words certainly, tho' mingled with a high Resolution strangely distemper'd, and representing so much of Danger as might have troubled the Courage of the Army. And howsoever partial History in mentioning the Actions of Great Men, will not allow them to participate with the Vulgar in the Weaknesses incident to human Nature, yet every greatest Spirit hath his Alloy of Imbecillity. The most knowing Scholar hath found a Period, beyond which his curious Search could not move; the wisest Politician hath discover'd where he err'd, and blush'd at the Mistake; and the boldest Soldier at some time

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1. or other hath found the Coward trembling in him. We may by our Endeavours raise Nature somewhat above her Frailty, but never triumph over her till Death.

King Edward's Courage and License to his Soldiers to depart. And certainly Warwick was too much amaz'd at this Accident; but soon he settled himself, and by his stout Comportment animated the fainting Army: But King Edward, whose Youth was beautified with Valour and Wisdom, even to Wonder, soberly entertain'd this sad Report, and to oppose against any Fear which might shake the Souldier; caused immediate Proclamation to be made, That it was lawful for any Man whom the present Loss, or Fear of future Danger discourag'd safely to depart; That whosoever should perform the Duty of a Soldier and fight manfully, should have a certain and a most large Reward: On the contrary to any Man who should continue in the Army, and hereafter fly away, the severest Punishment and Liberty for any one to kill such a Coward, with promise of double Pay.

None left the Army for fear. No Man accepted the Offer of so contemptible a Safety; and indeed the Body of his Army consisted of Southern Men, whose Flight had perhaps been as unsafe as the present Danger: Moreover the Example of the Valiant perswaded the rest, who blush'd to appear single in their Fears; whereby not being known they grew afterward to have equal Title, with the most daring to a glorious Victory.

The King seeing the Spirit of his Army so bold, and so devoted to his Service, thought the Loss of Time might endanger the Loss of his Design; and thereupon resolv'd with the first Convenience to bring his Fortune to the Tryal of a Battel. The Lord Falconbridge and Lord Fal- Sir Walter Blunt, in regard the Duke of Norfolk was then disabled by Sickness, had the leading of the Vanguard, who finding the Passage of Ferribrig impossible on the sudden to obtain, three Miles above, at Castleford past the River; and soon after about Dindingdale discover'd the Lord Clifford, whom they suddenly overtook and encompass; in vain labouring to retire to the main Battel. But he perceiving no way to escape from his Enemies but thro' Death, defended himself bravely with his small Forces even to the Envy of them who overcame, till shot with an Arrow thro' the Throat, he perish'd. The Lord John Nevill, Son to the Earl of Westmerland with almost all those unfortunate Troops fell there with their Leader the Lord Clifford; who in too mild a manner paid them the great Debt he ow'd to Justice for the Murder of the Young Earl of Rutland.

K. Henry and K. Edward's Army come to a Battel at Towton. Next Day being Palm-Sunday, early in the Morning both Armies came in Sight: A fatal Meeting, which like the Union of the Soul with the Body, never parts but by Death. The Field was between Caxton and Towton, from the latter of which this Battel afterwards took Name. On full Survey of King Henry's Host so dreadful in advantage of Number, Proclamation was made in King Edward's Camp, that no Quarter should be given nor Prisoner taken. A necessary Cruelty not to be avoided but with danger of his own Ruin: In regard otherwise the common Soldier might in hope of Spoil, or of the Ransom of an Enemy, be wanting to his Duty.

It was about the Hour of Nine, when the Armies drew near; 60000 for Lancaster, for York scarce 40000; only the Presence and Courage of King Edward made an Equality. The Lord Falconbridge, to whom the Van was committed, and who was most able for the Place, when

A. D. 1461. Reg. 1. The Lord Falconbridge's good Conduct. when the Fight was ready to begin, charg'd his Archers, soon as they had shot, to fall Three Strides back, and make a Stand, whereby they might avoid the Arrows of the Enemy: Which Stratagem happen'd as was expected; for the northern Men with a sudden Fury answer'd the Onset, and having emptied their Quivers, hastened to hand Blows. But the Arrows, which they had discharged at Adventure by reason of the Fogg, having never reach'd them against whom they were shot, turn'd now to their Annoiance and Trouble, so far, that the Splinters of them sticking in the Ground, pierc'd and gaul'd their Feet, and forc'd them to a confused Stop. In this Trouble the Southern Men shot another Flight, and the Wind conspiring with their Cunning, blew a Tempest of Hail and Snow into their Faces; by which the Vanguard of King Henry, led by the Earl of Northumberland and Andrew Trollop, gave back.

Yet did not the main Battel tremble with this Motion; but, as if the Enemy had gain'd no Advantage, continued with the first Constancy. Ten Hours Victory hung in Suspence; equal Courage appeared on both Sides, equal Hopes of Good, equal Despairs for Fear of bad Success, which occasion'd so much Cruelty in the Fight. But at length (the Field stain'd with Blood, and the Earth groaning with the Burden of so many Heaps of dead and dying Bodies) the Northern Men began to hope for Safety only in flight. Neither did they yield to the prevailing Fortune of the Enemy, until their Courages were dismay'd with sight of so many eminent Persons slain before their Eyes. For the Earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, the Lords Beaumont, D'acres, Gray and Wells, and Andrew Trollop, who was famous in the French Wars, with divers others of the greatest Reputation, for Nobility and Courage, had already fallen, and in their Slaughter taught the Survivors what to expect. The Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, seeing all Things desperate, the greater Part of the Army slain, the rest broken and flying, posted to York, to carry the fatal News of this Overthrow to the unfortunate King, whose Vertue yet had a Patience greater than his Ruin.

In no Battel was ever power'd forth so much English Blood; for in this, and the Two precedent Days were slain 36776 Persons, all of one Nation, many near in Alliance, some in Blood, fatally divided by Faction; yet all animated with the same Zeal to maintain their Princes's Right, which being so difficult to resolve, doubtless made the Quarrel on either Side, how ruinous soever to their Families, not unsafe to their Consciences. And it is worthy Observation, that in this so long and cruel Conflict between the Two Houses, never any Stranger of Name was present at our Battels; as if we had disdain'd to conquer or perish by other Weapons than our own.

K. Henry's Flight into Scotland. King Henry perceiving how desperate his Hopes were in England, with the poor Remains of his Party, secured himself by flight into Scotland. And with such hast, that before King Edward got to York (where he hoped to have surpriz'd him dismay'd with the late Discomfiture) nothing was there left but the City humbly devoted to the Dispose of the Conqueror. But on the Walls yet remain'd the Heads of Richard, Duke of York, and his Friends, an ignominious Spectacle, unluckily there standing to incense him to Cruelty. For on sight of so barbarous an Injury, he gave present Command, that Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, should be beheaded with Three others taken in the former Battel; that these new Heads might relieve them, who had stood Centinel so long; and that his Father and Friends might not want that busie Part of the Body to be inclosed with them in the Grave. An Action too much favouring of the ancient Heathen; the Souls of Christians no way requiring their Murthers to be reveng'd, or their Injuries appeased with such an Offering.

After this dire Oblation, he sent Part of his Forces to clear the Coasts toward Scotland, from the Dreggs of War; where to terrifie that People prone to Innovation in King Henry's Quarrel, some Examples of Severity were made. In the Interim, he, with as glorious Triumph and large Joy as a Victory could beget, which brought no less to him than absolute Sovereignty, march'd toward London. By the Inhabitants whereof, who were deeply interested in his Fortune, he was with all the Solemnity of a secure Gladness entertain'd June 29. To the Triumph of his Entrance, soon succeeded that of his Coronation, perform'd on the 29th of June, with usual Ceremonies, but most unusual Congratulations.

Immediately, that no Circumstance of Sovereignty might be wanting, a Parliament was summon'd; by which his Title might be reconfirm'd, his Partakers rewarded, his Enemies punish'd. And tho' private Respects were his chief Business, desiring to disannul all Acts made heretofore in Prejudice to the House of York and its Adherents; yet the outward Pretension was the Safety and Quiet of the Realm. For he publicly profess'd his only Care to be, that such wholesome Laws might be enacted, as might redress Disorders crept into the State, by free Licence given to Rapine in the former Troubles. By which Appearance of Sollicitude for quieting the Kingdom, he gain'd Authority among the Wise, and created a Belief in all, that his Government in Peace would be as fortunate as his Success in War. Having by his Wisdom and Providence thus gotten the good Opinion of the Generality, he bestowed his Graces on particular Persons, whom Blood join'd with Merit rendred dear to him. His Brothers, George and Richard, he created Dukes, the Elder of Clarence, the Younger of Gloucester. John, Lord Nevill, the Earl of Warwick's Brother, he made Viscount, Mountacute, Henry Bourchier, Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Earl of Essex, and William, Lord Falconbridge, Earl of Kent. He rais'd divers others to the Title of Barons, and honor'd many with Knighthood. The Conclusion of this great Assembly was Punishment; for John, Earl of Oxford, Aubrey Vere his Son, Sir John Tiddenham, Knight, William Tirrel and Walter Montgomery, Esquires, were without any Tryal convicted of Treason, and beheaded on Tower-Hill. A rough Proceeding, which favoured something too much of the Conqueror, and made John, Earl of Oxford, his implacable Enemy, Heir to the late Earl.

Business thus happily settled at Home, to check the Audaciousness of our transmarin Neighbours, (who had thrown Injuries on our Nation weakned by Discord) the Earls of Essex and Kent, with the Lord Audley, were sent with 10000 Soldiers to scour the Narrow Seas; who first landing in Brittain, took the Town of Conquet; and afterward invading the Isle of Ree, pillag'd that little Country, and with Victory return'd. By which Enterprize, tho' of no signal Consequence to his Affairs, yet King Edward

As likewise to terrifie all forreign States from adhering to K. Henry, who both in Courage and Fortune was so far inferior.

And now was the Prosperity of Edward in so full Splendor, and so dark a Cloud hung over the House of Lancaster, that Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and Sir Ralph Percie, forsook the Ruins of that Family they had so long endeavour'd to support. To King Edward the Submission of Two so eminent Persons appear'd as welcom as a Victory; and they by his Favour were presently restor'd to full Possession both of their Honours and (a) Estates; and the same Grace promised to any, whom their Example should perswade to return to their Allegiance.

Yet did not the indefatigable Queen lose any Thing of her Spirit or Endeavours, by her late so sad Discomfiture, and Revolt now of her chief Adherents, which were able perhaps to break her Fortune, not her. And having upon full reckoning perceiv'd, that she must account of no Power at Home, she made her Addresses to all Princes abroad, whom Alliance, Reason of State, or Compassion of so great a Disaster, might move to her Assistance. But, as it is in the Fate of all Women, who usurp on their Husbands, she had been unhappy in the Management of his Prosperity, and now was much more incapable to oppose against his so great and constant Infelicity. Great Undertakings being seldom successful in that Sex, whose Government over Man, as in Nature it is monstrous, so for the most part in it self hath it been disorderly and ruinous. But certainly, how erroneous soever it was heretofore, she was now defective only in the Event, which is not ruled by ours, but by a higher Mind.

For with the King of Scotland (with whom as in the nearest Place of Safety, she left her Husband) to confirm a secure Friendship, she contracted a near Alliance, by promising the young Prince her Son in Marriage to the Lady Margaret, his Sister. And that this Marriage might not seem a Gift but a Bargain, she bought the Lady by the Delivery of Berwick into the Scots Hands, the strongest Fort the English had in the North. But the Unfortunate are ever Losers in their Traffick, and forc'd to purchase what otherwise they would with Difficulty be perswaded to receive.

With Lewis XI. the French King, she prevail'd little, though near to him in Consanguinity; for the Discontent of his Nobility, held him in continual Suspicion. Otherwise she had Title to promise her self large Supplies from so potent and politick a Prince, whose Interest it must in Reason have been, by fomenting Discord at home, to hinder us from any Attempt abroad. After much Solicitation, she obtain'd that he declar'd himself for King Henry, by prohibiting all Favourers of the House of York Access into the French Dominions, and opening them to all those of the Party of Lancaster. A negative kind of Help, which rather shew'd there yet was Sanctuary left for Henry's unhappy Friends, than any considerable Aid to be expected.

Philip, Duke of Burgundy, tho' a mighty Prince, and near allied to Lancaster, (whose Wife's Mother was Philippa, Daughter to John of Gaunt) yet by Age, and a passionate Love to quiet, was become altogether unactive. Neither had Charles, Earl of Charolois, his Son, though of a daring Spirit, and an Affecter of Business, Leisure to look over into our Island, being engag'd in domestick Troubles, and suspicious of the Designs of the French King.

With Charolois, the Duke of Brittain held a strong Confederacy; and both of them Intelligence with the discontented Lords of France. The War which was afterward so known by the Name of the Weal-Publick being at that Time among them privately in Contrivance; so that all these neighbouring Princes, to whom the Affairs of England might seem considerable, were wholly taken up with Attention to their own.

The Emperor Frederick III. was more remote, and so cautious from entering into the Quarrels of other Men, that by any Art, and even with Loss he would decline his own. Moreover, he justly stood in continual Fear of the growing Fortune of the Turk; who, having lately subverted the Eastern, threatened now Ruin to the Western Empire: And questionless had not the great God of Armies miraculously given a Stop to his Victories, Christendom had now been only several Provinces enslav'd to his Tyranny. For Pride and Emulation had then turn'd our Arms upon our selves, and left our Bodies naked to the Scourge of the common Enemy.

Spain was far off, divided between a Christian and Mahometan Government, each labouring the Extirpation of the other, so that they had Liberty to be Actors in no Tragedy but their own. And indeed no Conflict is so fierce and irreconcilable, as when Religion animates to War, and makes it Piety to be cruel.

To her Father Renate therefore, who enjoy'd the specious Title of King of Sicily, Naples, and Jerusalem, but Possession of none of them, the afflicted Queen was forc'd to make a sad Retreat. A poor contemptible Lord, living now to see his Son-in-Law, once the greatest Monarch of the Christian World, a Prince as merely titular as himself. As if it had been the Fate of these Two, that the one could say, he might have been, the other that once he was a King.

Leaving therefore forreign States intentive to their own Designs, with her Son, whom to move Compassion she had carried up and down, the Queen return'd to Scotland; by her long but unsuccessful Labour, having gathered together 500 French; a Number so small and so unworthy the Name of an Army, that it was but a competent Retinue for so great a Princess. With these nevertheless she sail'd to (b) Timmouth, from whence she was repulsed by the Inhabitants as soon as she landed, and forc'd again to put to Sea. But there (for where may the Unfortunate meet with Friendship?) she found the Winds her Enemies, whose unruly Force drove her at length disorderly to Berwick; and the French under the Command of Monsieur Varrennes into the Hand of the Bastard Ogle, whom the King had sent to watch their Enemies; and he slew above an 100 of them, and took almost all the rest Prisoners, the Captain and some few only escaping.

(a) Mr Ibin in his History of the Dukes of England, says, that the Duke of Somerset had only a Pension of a 1000 Marks a Year granted him, which was never paid; and he places his Submitting to King Edward on the Second of December, in the Year 1463.

(b) She took Ainwick, and garrison'd it.

A. D. 1463. Reg. 3. K. Henry with an Army of Scots invades England.

Here some thin Regiments of Scots resorted to her, in company of whom she enter'd Northumberland; and having won Banbury-Castle, passed into the Bishoprick of Durham, her Husband marching in the Front, that the Name and Presence of K. Henry might invite the People to their ancient Service, and add Authority to the Design. But soon she found her Error; for Hope, not Compassion perswades to Danger: And the Commonalty sat still, when by rising they understood themselves only likely to share in the King's Misfortune: For having upon a just Account discover'd how War is only necessary to the most desperate, and that in the End it leaves them to nothing but Beggary and Punishment, they were reconcil'd to the Love of Peace, and every Man betook himself to Industry. And for the Nobility, the King had won them either by the Reputation of his Fortune, or Terror of his Courage; so that no Man of Eminency resolv'd to change Subjection: Only Henry, Duke of Somerset, and Sir Ralph Peirce, who not long before had forsaken K. Henry in his Tempest; now upon a false Hope of fairer Weather fled back again. For it is a ridiculous Cunning in Historians to ascribe the Actions of great Men perpetually to Policy, since Irresolution prevails equally in them as with the Vulgar. And why might not Despair beget Submission in these two to K. Edward, and a vain Appearance of a Return of Fortune to K. Henry's Side, perswade them to this last Revolt?

Upon this so weak Access of Power, Queen Margaret perceiving so unsound Friendship in her Husband's native Country, destroy'd it as if an Enemy's. And wanting Force to reach the Prosperity of her Competitor, fell cruelly upon the common People, who had hitherto been only subjects to his Fortune, bearing inwardly a most passionate Love to the Family of Lancaster. But this outrageous Carriage of the Army, chang'd absolutely their Affections to the Queen, who was questionless by Necessity compell'd to Things unlawful, whereby to prevent the Disbanding of her Forces, which were only paid and kept together by a licentious Spoil.

To oppose this Attempt, which only betrayed the Weakness of the Enemies, King Edward sent down John Nevill, Lord Mountacute, himself staying behind to raise an Army, besitting the Greatness of his Name and present Quarrel. Giving likewise Order that his Navy should guard the Seas, to hinder any Succours to the Queen from foreign Confederates: But this was an unnecessary Caution; no State Abroad being so desperate, as to embark it self in the broken Seas of her Fortune.

Mountacute at Land had a braver Occasion to shew his Courage; who having in the Bishoprick of Durham gather'd some convenient Forces, and receiv'd others from King Edward, then at York, march'd directly against K. Henry. By the Way the Lords Hungerford, and Ross, and Sir Ralph Peirce presented themselves to hinder his farther Course; but perceiving the good Order and Courage of his Army, all fled but the valiant Peirce. Who disdain'd to secure his Life with Loss of his Honour, or to shew the least Weakness beneath his Name or Spirit, fought it out with his Regiment, till over-press'd with Number, he and his were all cut to pieces. The valiant Knight contenting himself, that he had saved the Bird in his Brest, as he said; that is, died in his Loyalty.

Encouraged with this Success Mountacute attempts, without Expectation of any farther Succour or Direction, to finish the present War, and immediately marches to a Plain call'd Levells, near the River Dowell in (c) Hexhamshire, where King Henry's Army lay encamped. The Camp he suddenly assaults in the Night, and had taken it without any Loss, had not the Enemy beyond Expectation gather'd themselves into some Order and valiantly opposed. But no Courage could withstand the Fortune and Spirit of Mountacute, for the Queen's Camp at length was lost, and in it taken the Duke of Somerset, the Lords Hungerford, Ross, Moulins, and Sir Thomas Hussy, with Sir Thomas Wentworth and Sir John Findern: Somerset on the Place lost his Head, the rest sent to Newcastle to suffer there the same Punishment, with twenty Gentlemen more, but King Henry and the Queen escaped (d) into Lancashire at the first on-set, whose Tragedy drew not yet near the last Act.

King Edward whose Fortune fought for him, even in his Absence, encounter'd the News of this Victory in his march towards Durham; so that finding the Presence of his Person and Army needless he return'd towards York: Giving command to Warwick to take in all the Forts and Castles, which yet in the North held out, as (e) Alnwick, Banbury and Dustambury. On the Way he was certified of the Apprehension of King Henry's Person, who was surprized as he endeavour'd by shifting from Place to Place to have recover'd Scotland (f). With the Joy of which Report King Edward return'd to London, whither as yet he never came but glorious by the Accession of some new Triumph.

Thomas, the Son of Sir Edward Talbot of Lancashire, apprehended King Henry as he sat at Dinner at Waddington-Hall, in Cleatberwood in Lancashire, and forgetting all Respect due to so great a Prince, like a common Malefactor with his Legs tied under the Horse's Belly, (g) guarded him up towards London. By the Way the Earl of Warwick met him, who adding Indignities to his Affliction, with the general Reproaches of the People, (the Acclamations they give to the Unfortunate) arrested him, and taking off his Gilt Spurs, led him Prisoner to the Tower. The only Companions of his present Calamity were Dr. Manning, Dean of Windsor, Dr. Bedle, and Mr. Allerton a young Gentleman, all of so divine a Calling, as shew'd no Misfortune could separate him from his Piety, nor them from their Duty.

The miserable Queen seeing the Desolation of her Greatness, her Husband imprison'd, all her great Friends fled or slaughter'd, made again her Retreat into France; and with her Son Prince Edward, (whose Preservation flatter'd her with some hopes, that one day he might rebuild the now ruin'd House of Lancaster) fled to her Father's Court. A most wretched Sanctuary to her Fears, where she had only leisure

A. D. 1464. by long Patience to prepare her Mind for future Misery.

Reg. 4. But this her Dejection raised Edward up to an unsuspected Sovereignty, so that now he began to set strong the disjointed Body of his Kingdom. And knowing Liberality the only Ligament that ties Affection to a Prince, he resolv'd by attainting his Enemies to enable himself to reward the Services of his Friends. And tho' he pretended the Gate of Mercy ever to stand open to the Submission of the Lancastrians, yet few or none accepted the Favour, either distrustful of his Reality, or feeding their Hopes with Imagination, that the Tide of Fortune would not always flow with so impetuous a Torrent.

K. Edward attaints the Lancastrian Nobles, and gives their Houses and Estates to his Friends.

Sir William Herbert made Earl of Pembroke.

Lord Mountacute made Earl of Northumberland.

The Earl of Warwick and Lord Mountacute not satisfied with their Rewards.

K. Edward labours to endear himself to the People.

But King Edward angry, that a Faction so contemptible in their Ruin, should disdain his Clemency, proceeded to punishment (b). The Earldom of Pembroke, an Honour heretofore enjoy'd by Jasper Tudor, half-Brother to Henry VI. (who, with Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland was then fled with King Henry;) he bestowed on Sir William Herbert, a Knight of Wales, both for Descent and Power most eminent, and to whose Aid a great Part of the present Felicity was owing. To the Lord Mountacute, whose Person and Service he equally lov'd, he gave the opulent Possessions belonging to the Family of the Peircies, together with the Honour of Earl of Northumberland.

But the most open Hand cannot satisfy the Expectation of great Deservers, who set so high a Price upon their Merits, that they leave their Princes no Power of Reward. The greatest Benefit being received in the Degree of a Debt, not a Gift. And certainly Mountacute and his Brother Warwick, had by too much Merit even disobligh'd the King; what Honour soever they were in future to have, being so little able to cancel the Obligation, that it could scarce defray the Interest. And in that Way was this Title and Inheritance accepted, which gave the King occasion to distaste whom otherwise he would have with Passion embraced. Whereupon reflecting on the Danger of adding Power to them, who wanted only Will to do Mischief, and knowing how easily Innovation might be resolv'd on, when nothing but the Conscience was to be perswaded; he began seriously to wish the Mightiness of that Family he owed the Crown to in some Degree lessened. Yet that he might no way appear unthankful to so great Deserts, he thought fit to weaken their Strength, and yet to add to the Splendor of their Title. Whereupon he willingly admitted the Friends of Percy to interceed for Restitution both of his Honour and Revenue, and soon granted it; rewarding Mountacute with the more specious Stile of Marquess. But this State-trick was by the Brothers easily understood, and accepted with the same Brow they would have entertain'd an Injury.

This the King dissembled; and to build his Estimation high in the Air of popular Applause, endeavour'd by all the Arts of humble Greatness to raise himself into the Opinion of the Multitude. His Presence was easie to any Man's Love or Curiosity, his Aspect clear and smiling, his Language free and familiar. And to the Ladies, who have also their Share in the Motion of States, he applied a general Courtship, which used by a Prince of so amiable a Personage, made them, who are usually the Idols of others, to be Idolators of him. Among his Nobility he was so courteous and free in Gesture, and liberal in Affability, that he appeared King, not in his Assumption of State, but in their Application of Duty. This he did to win outward Applause; while to settle an inward Sense of his Wisdom, he look'd into Abuses of Officers, and reform'd them. Neither was there any Oppression or Mistake in Government, but what he relieved or corrected. And that it might appear how zealously he sought due Administration of Justice in greater Causes, he in Person sat Three Days together on his Bench at Westminster-Hall, to see a foul Rape on a Widow punish'd; which, tho' it little advanc'd the uncorrupted Execution of the Laws, yet it serv'd happily for Example, and created what he then most courted, a good Opinion of him in the Minds of all Men.

Thus he grew upon his People at home, while abroad the neighbouring States began to decline the Danger of his future Enmity, who ever measure the Power of Princes by that Sway and Affection they have among their Subjects. Charles, Earl of Charolois (a Widdower, but without Heir-male) Heir to a large and opulent Territory (the Seventeen Provinces with the Dutchy and County of Burgundy, and the greatest Part of Picardy, being subject to Duke Philip his Father) first made his Address; who, bearing an implacable hatred to Lewis XI. King of France, desired to gain so Potent a Neighbour to his Party; and that he might secure his Friendship against all Faultering, he, by his Ambassadors entreated a Marriage with the Lady Margaret, the King's Sister: A Motion heard in England with much Acceptance, and which, if every Circumstance were well weigh'd, brought both Honour and Security. But it was thought by some intimate with the Earl in his most secret Counsels, that really he never intended this Marriage, having from his Mother, Niece to John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, deriv'd an irreconcilable Malice against the House of Tork. And that this Negotiation aim'd only to temporize with England, in case the Duke of Brittain and the French King's Brother should desert him and make their Peace with Lewis, against whom these Three were then in Confederacy; but this I believe an Overcunning in Conjecture, since Marriage among Princes, as it seldom confirms a sound Friendship, so doth it never extirpate an ancient Hatred; the Proof of our and all Times shewing how false a Love is created by Alliance. But the Thoughts of Princes are so unknown to Posterity, that they are beyond the Scrutiny of the present Time. I will not therefore dispute what the Earl's inward Designs were; but certainly, both according to Reason of State and the Event (which is the best Light Historians can discern by) as it was pretended, so was it intended.

(i) The Marriage of his Sister being thus far advanc'd, the King began to advise with his Council concerning his own. A strong Alliance abroad was soon resolv'd most necessary both for the Dignity and Safety of his Crown; and among all the Princesses which that Time gloried in, and of whom several were propos'd to his Choice, viz. Margaret, Daughter of the King of Scots, and Isabel, Sister of Henry IV.

(i) This Marriage was not propos'd till the 6th Year of his reign nor effected till the 8th.

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4. King of Castile; the Lady (k) Bona was thought worthiest his Bed, in respect of the Excellence of her Beauty, Greatness of Birth (as being Daughter to Lewis, Duke of Savoy) and the mighty Marriage of her other Sister Charlotte, with Lewis XI King of France, with whom she then was. This last Consideration being a main Inducement, as by which all Fear might be taken away of a Tempest from that Coast, whence Queen Margaret seem'd to prepare a Storm.

The Earl of Warwick Agent for the King's Marriage. To this Negotiation the Earl of Warwick was deputed as the fittest Person, both for his great Faith to the King, and Authority in the Kingdom: Who, no sooner arriv'd at the French Court, where the young Lady then resided in Company of her Sister, but he was with all Triumph entertain'd, and his Motion heard with Joy and Acceptation.

The Consummation of it fought by both Parties. The Ambition of the French Queen to have her Sister married to so great a Prince, concurring with the many politick Respects, which overstay'd King Lewis. And soon after for an absolute Conclusion of all Business, Monsieur Dampmartin was design'd Ambassador for England. These Two Kings equally soliciting the Consummation of this Marriage. Edward, that he might without Fear of more Danger enjoy the Glory of a late recover'd Kingdom. Lewis, that freed from the Danger of an English Invader, and Importunities of Queen Margaret, for Assistance, he might give a Period to his basie Projects at home, by laying the Devil of Civil War, raised by a tumultuous Nobility.

King Edward's Love to the Lady Gray. But while Policy acted several Parts abroad, Love on the sudden chang'd the whole Scene at home. For the young King, after Hunting in Wychemood Forrest, coming to visit the Dutches of Bedford, at her Mannor of Grafton near Stony-Stratford in Buckinghamshire, for a Grant of some Lands taken from her Maintenance, was solicited by a fair Petitioner the Dutches's Daughter Elizabeth, Widow of Sir John Gray, slain on King Henry's Part at the Battel of St. Albans. The King could not but yield to any Request made by so conquering a Beauty, and presently himself grew as earnest in soliciting her, tho' in a more unlawful Suit. But she arm'd her Soul with a Modesty able to break the hottest Battery of Lust; and tho' on every Side assaulted by the Engines of Temptation, she repulsed her Enemy so nobly, by telling him, That tho' she knew her self unworthy to be a Queen, yet she valued her Honour and Person more, than to be the greatest Prince's Concubine; that he offered Parly upon honourable Terms. For when the King perceiv'd her adorn'd with a Chastity strong enough to resist him, who had scarce ever fail'd to be victorious in those Attempts, he grew enamour'd with the Beauty of her Mind, and resolv'd her Vertue was Dower enough to marry her to the highest Throne. Reason of State, which his Mother and Friends were not wanting to press him passionately with, argued sharply against a Marriage so unequal to Majesty, by alledging the Peril of angring so potent a Neighbour as K. Lewis, and so dangerous a Subject as Warwick, as likewise the Inconvenience of raising a Widow to his Bed, who could bring nothing with her but her Poverty, and an unprovided issue; who, if not advanc'd by him, would be a Scorn to his Children, if advanc'd a ruinous Charge to his Exchequer, and an Envy both to the Princes of his Blood, and the Nobility of his Kingdom. But Love like a cunning Sophister easily refell'd all politick Arguments, and perswaded Reason her self almost to be of his Side.

For he repeated to the King his own Prerogative, which being so large, why should he then be denied the Liberty of a free Choice, which is allow'd the meanest Subject? Why might not he wooe with his own Eyes, and make Election where his Fancy best delighted? As for the Lady her self he found her in the Treasures of her Mind most abundant, and in the Perfections of her Body excellent to please him, who, and not the State, was to marry. For her Birth, she was by the Father Sir Richard Woodville Noble in her Descent at Home, by her Mother of the House of Luxemburg, (l) a Family with which the greatest Princes of Christendom had near Alliance. As for marrying a Subject* and the Widow of his Enemy, the latter argu'd more Charity, and the former could not but tie the Affection of his People, when they saw their Prince disdain'd not Affinity with them. For a President to authorize these his intended Nuptials, he had Edward the Black Prince his Great Uncle, great indeed if not the greatest among all the Princes of his Name. And for the threaten'd Danger from King Lewis or the Earl of Warwick; from France he could never expect how near soever the Alliance had been but an unfaithful Amity; and should this his Marriage thrust Warwick upon rebellious Attempts, the Rebel would but fondly run upon his own Ruin, since it could not stand with the Majesty of a King, to hold his Crown by so base a Tenure, as to have his Actions aw'd by a Subject. These and such like Arguments, which

King Edward's Love to the Lady Gray. Love is cunning upon all Occasions to enforce, prevail'd so far with him, that though the Old Dutches of York his Mother most violently oppos'd the Match, by throwing the highest Calumnies upon the Lady Gray, and alledging a Pre-contract between him and the Lady Lucy; yet one Morning secretly did he marry her (m). For the Disparity of Birth or Fortune is no Impediment; and for the Pre-contract, upon Examination the Lady Lucy her self acquitted the King, only laying to his Charge the Guilt of a most winning Courtship, which she hop'd would end in Marriage. And though afterwards during the Usurpation of Richard the Third, in open Parliament it was alledged against the Lawfulness of King Edward's Marriage, that by strange Potions and amorous Charms the Lady Elizabeth Gray had bewitch'd him to her Love, and likewise another Pre-contract was asserted with the Lady Eleanor Butler, Daughter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Widow to the Lord of

A. D. 1464. Reg. 4. Sudly; I cannot but believe, that all those Scandals were by some of the Tyrant's wicked Instruments suggested to the Minds of that Assembly: For had there been a just Exception against this Marriage, neither George, Duke of Clarence, nor the Earl of Warwick, in their frequent Calumnies against the King being in open Rebellion, had left it unmention'd.

King Edward's Marriage distast'd by his Friends.

A. D. 1465. Reg. 5.

The Earl of Warwick incens'd at the King's Marriage, yet dissimbles his Anger.

The Queen's Kindred advanced.

The Earl of Warwick in Discontent, endeavours to raise a Rebellion.

But no sooner had King Edward obey'd his Fancy in taking her to his Bed, and in that tasted the forbidden Fruit (forbidden I mean by Politick Respects) than he saw himself Naked of Friends at Home and Abroad to oppose against any new arising Difficulty. But as yet by the Bravery of his Carriage did he add an Honour to the Act, Courage and Love, either denying him to foresee or to regard the Danger. Though as soon as the Marriage was divulged, he presently discern'd another Face of Men. Monsieur D'ampmartin, the Embassador Extraordinary from France, full of Indignation, return'd, and the Nobility in general look'd discontented, or else but forced a Smile. The so high Advancement of this one Lady and her Children, lately beneath so many in Fortune, begetting an universal Envy in the rest. But when the Earl of Warwick understood how mighty an Affront by this was given to his Employment; he entertain'd none but disdainful Thoughts against his Prince; and express'd so bold a Discontent, that Lewis of France, who was quick to perceive, and careful to foment any Displeasure which might tend to the Disturbance of another Kingdom, began to enter into private Communication with him. For ever after this common Injury, (so they call'd the Error of Love in the King) the Earl held a dangerous Intelligence in France, which after occasion'd so many Confusions to our Kingdom. Nevertheless upon his Return he dissimbled all Discontent, and in every Circumstance of Respect applied himself to applaud the Marriage, and in particular the excellent Personage of the Queen. The King interpreted the Intentions of the Man according to the Appearance, unwilling perhaps to rack his own Nature so far, till it had confess'd that his Carriage might dissimble Danger. And in the meantime he rais'd his Wife's Kindred as near as possibly to his own Greatness, he search'd out all Means for their Advancement (*). The Lord Richard Woodville her Father he created Earl of Rivers, and High-Constable of England, with an annual Fee of Two Hundred Pound out of the Exchequer, whom shortly after he made Lord Treasurer. Her Brother Anthony he created Lord Scales, the Daughter and Heir to which Title, by the King's earnest Solicitation, he not long before had wedded; and her Son Thomas he rais'd to the Honour of Marquess of Dorset, for whom he procur'd in Marriage the Heir of the Lord Bonville and Harrington. By his own free Gift enobling them with Titles, and by the Industry of his Mediation enabling them with Possessions, to make those Titles no Scorn to the Owners.

Every unmarried Lord imagin'd the bestowing of these two great Heirs on the Queen's Kindred, an Injury to his own Hopes; and Warwick thought every great Office conferred upon another misplaced. For his many Services begot so great an Insolency, that he scarce allow'd the King a Share in the Distribution of his own: Hereupon his Thoughts grew dangerous, and only Opportunity was wanting to thrust him into Action. He consider'd the Vastness of his Possessions, the Greatness of his Authority among the Commons, and the general Dependencies of the Men of War upon him; and hence concluded, it was as easie for him to uncreate as to create a King. But he found the general Humour of the Kingdom not yet fully ripe for Mischief; the Vulgar enamour'd on the much Curtesie of their Prince, the Lords nearest to him in Blood and likeliest to incline to his Faction dear likewise to the King, and all of the House of Lancaster who in Probability would at first Invitation take fire in any Combustion of the State, exil'd and poor. Sedition therefore for the present was but an Embryo in his Brain, which after when Time had deliver'd, became so vast and bloody a Monster: Nevertheless he was not unmindful of his Design, cherishing unkind Thoughts in any whom he saw distast'd at the King, and casting forth Speeches which might lessen the Honour of his publick and private Actions; with which Discourses, as with slow Poysons he infected many Limbs of the general Body. Then upon Pretence of Infirmary, and Prescription of Physicians for the Change of Air, with License from the King he retired to his Castle at Warwick. Where his Observation was, what Lords great in Power or Treasure resorted to him, and with what Countenance; whether they undervalu'd the Weakness of the King's Judgment, or hated the Advancement of the Queen and her Kindred; whether they were troubl'd at any private Repulse or open Affront, or generally at the publick Business, or whether they repented not the so violent Oppression of the Family of Lancaster; any Discontent making for his Purpose, which either pointed at the Errors of the King, Pride of the Queen and her Kindred, or the Mis-government of the State. Upon the Affections of the meaner sort he gain'd by a profuse Hospitality, an open Kitchen and Buttery perswading more with them than any Duty to Justice: Upon the Good-will of the better sort he won by bowing his Entertainment down to an endearing Familiarity, saluting every Man curteously by his Name, and engaging them by trivial Benefits. And with all sorts by his great Service to the Crown, and a Carriage Noble both in War and Peace.

The King, though he wanted the Virtue of Cowards, Suspicion, began nevertheless to have the Earl in some Jealousie; his unusual Retiredness from the Court, and so expenceful purchasing the Vogue of the People, argu'd both distaste against his Prince, and a Hope to maintain any unlawful Enterprize by Faction. But either in Policy he dissimbled his Distrust, not having yet any firm Ground to build a just Accusation, or in good Nature would not eclipse the Earl's Greatness, by which himself enjoy'd a Benefit little less than the Crown. But that the Storm threatned from France, for incensing King Lewis in the discourf'd Marriage of the Lady Bona, might be diverted; he made strong Confederacies round about him. With Henry, King of Castile, and John, King of Arragon, (that Spain, however far remote might be near in Friendship) he enter'd into a League, and upon the Conclusion of it, granted a License for the Transportation of certain Corsivold Sheep thither, a Grant that is complain'd of still, as a mighty enriching to the Spaniards, and as

A.D. 1465. Reg. 5. great an impoverishing to the English Merchants. With Scotland he made a Truce for Fifteen Years, that he invading France, or invaded by the French, might be secure however not to have that Nation, according to their Custom upon all Advantages, Enemies at his Back. His Embassadors in the Low-Countries, urged the Duke of Burgundy to the Accomplishment of the Marriage between his Son the Earl of Charolois, and the Lady Margaret the King's Sister. And so happy Success had this Negotiation, that though for some Years it had hung in Suspence, and Warwick now opposed it, as prejudicial to King Lewis his Friend, yet it was now absolutely agreed on, and the Bastard of Burgundy, and some others sent over with full Instructions and Power to give the Treaty a final Conclusion. For whatsoever Dissimulation the Earl of Charolois used at first, he now intended this Marriage seriously: In regard he found himself lie open to the Malice of King Lewis a most dangerous Neighbour, who by Policy or Fortune had broken all those great Confederacies the Earl had before in France. Wherefore there was now no Safety but in arming himself by a strict Amity with the English, a Nation forward and fierce to attempt any thing upon the French, and in their Attempts scarce ever but prosperous. Neither was the Courage of the King's Youth, and his continual good Success in War a small Inducement; considering it gave a certain Hope, that he upon any Invitation of Honour or Profit might be perswaded to cross the Seas, and undertake the ancient national Quarrel. And for the Danger of any Alteration in the Government, there was then no Ground for Suspicion: The King honour'd and lov'd by his People, the adverse Faction of no Power, and the Earl of Warwick having never yet declared himself but most passionately affected to the House of York. Wherefore in Reason of State being no Impediment, the Marriage was soon agreed on, and upon the Agreement, many Triumphs glorious but Martial according to the Nature of that Time, so addicted to Arms, were celebrated between the Bastard and his Retinue, and the English Lords and Gentry.

A.D. 1466. Reg. 6. But to interrupt the Jollity of these Triumphs, an Express came from the Low-Countries, with the News of the Death of Duke Philip: Presently the Bastard return'd, and our Council stood at a gaze, being in some Suspence what Alteration the Business might receive, the Earl now absolute in Possession of his Father's Dominions. But that Scruple was soon taken away, by an Embassadour sent to hasten the full Performance of the Marriage. Whereupon the Lady was carried over with all the Ceremonies of Greatness, and at Burges marry'd to Duke Charles (o). That Nation which exceeded all the World in Bravery and Riot, exceeding even it self, at this Triumph, in the Wantonness of a superfluous Pomp. In those Countries she liv'd some while his Wife, though ever barren, with as much Love from him, as he could spare from his ambitious Wars, but she continu'd long his Widow in much Reputation among the Natives and good Esteem with neighbouring Princes. Two Things render'd her much the Discourse of those Times. An extraordinary Love and Care in the Education of the Posterity of her Husband, and an extreme Malice against Henry the Seventh. To supplant whom, because there wanted true, she countenanced the Supposititious Princes of the House of York, and by continual Practices revenged in part the Injury of that Disrespect he ever cast upon her Family.

This so potent Alliance, and his Confederacies with Foreign States, made King Edward imagine himself in great Security, when indeed he was most unsafe: For during these Treaties Abroad and Triumphs at Home, the Earl of Warwick quicken'd so far his Designs, that now there appear'd a dangerous Life in them. The Body of his Faction was grown Mighty but Monstrous, being compacted of several Natures. For into the Conspiracy of this great Enterprize he had drawn the Clergy and the Laity, and most of them of Affections most opposite. (p) The Arch-bishop of York was the principal Actor, because he mov'd upon the Soul, and made Treason an Act of Religion. The same Multitude who build their Faith upon the Man, not the Doctrine, thinking it meritorious to rebel, in regard his Function seem'd to give Authority to the Action. With the Arch-bishop the Marquess of Montague consented, but secretly; either cunningly dissembling Mischief, or else wishing well to both Sides being in himself divided between a natural Love to a Brother, and an Allegiance to a Prince; or perhaps projecting to make his Benefit, out of which Party soever should prevail. With these agreed many eminent Persons of King Edward's Court, whom either Desire of War, having never lived but in the troubl'd Stream of Discord, or want of expected Recompence, render'd discontented.

All the Partakers in the Calamity of the House of Lancaster, most passionately at first Overture embraced this Motion, as Men whom Despair had made fit for the most hazardous Attempt; and who having found nothing but evil Fortune at Home, and contempt Abroad, were instructed in a Patience ready with Joy to suffer a not inglorious Death. Among whom Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter was a sad Example, who after his Ruin by the Fall of Henry the Sixth was reduced to so miserable a Condition, that all ragged and bare-footed he begg'd for his Meat in the Low-Countries, the absolute Prince whereof and he marry'd two Sisters, the Daughters of Richard, Duke of York. With this so unfortunate a Lord, all the rest who shared with him in Misery, ran violently into this War. But the wonder of the World then was at the powerful Sorcery of those Perswasions, which bewitch'd the Duke of Clarence, the King's Brother to this Conspiracy; but he was Young and Purblind in foreseeing the Event of Things, profuse in Expence beyond his Revenue, and almost beyond the King's Power to supply, grudging the Favours conferred upon the Queen and her Kindred; valuing his Birth too high, as who forgot the Brother of a King is but a Subject, forward upon any Terms to make himself greater, easily lending Ear to dangerous Whispers, and as rashly giving Consent. These Preparatives made this Young Prince fit to undertake any Mischief, which the Earl of Warwick ministred most plentifully.

And first to supply the Narrowness of his present Fortune, a Humour most Troublesom at the Instant, he gave him in Marriage the Lady Isabell his Daughter, and Co-heir to the Rich Earldom of Warwick: Whereupon in hatred

D. 1466. Reg. 6. against the Queen he concurred and in Discontent against the King's so slender Rewards; but in promising Greatness to Clarence's Ambition, he exceeded even Proportion, though not Probability, considering the Earl's unlimited Power. But first to make the Friendship strong by a near Alliance, they sail'd over for the Consumation of this Marriage to Calis, of which Town the Earl of Warwick was Captain, and in which the young Lady then remain'd with her Mother. Soon was this Ceremony past, and soon did the Earl invite his Son-in-law from the Softness of the Nuptial Dalliance, as who had contrived this Marriage for Business, not for Pleasure, and design'd the first Issue of their Embraces to be a Monster, and the most unnatural one; War between Brothers.

He acquainted therefore his Son-in-Law by what Line he had founded the Depth of the People's Affection to the present King, and what a Tempest he was able to raise when he should resolve for Motion. He told him how, in the North 15000 Men had been in Arms, pretending revenge upon the Governours of St. Leonard's Hospital in Tork, for converting the Alimony they receiv'd from the Country every Year in Corn to their own Use, by which they both defrauded the Poor, and the charitable Intention of the Doners; whereas indeed the arm'd Multitude were mov'd, first by his Counsel only, awaiting his Presence, with Resolution to run any Hazard of his Command. And tho' the Marquess Mountacute raised Forces in King Edward's Name, by which he quieted the Commotion, and beheaded Robert Huldron (q) their chief Captain, yet were the People ready upon the first Summons to reassemble; and the Marquess (who by such Appearance of Fidelity had won upon the easie Faith of the dull King) prepared to bring his Forces, and join in any Enterprize he should appoint. He shewed farther, how by this his Brother's Dissimulation, his Intelligence held perfect in the King's Council, and all the Resolutions of State might be without Difficulty prevented, since no sooner made but discover'd.

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8. The Duke, who before held the Earl's Courage and Authority with the People in great Estimation, now began to wonder at the so cunning Management of this so great Business. Neither could he suspect the Success, the Earl having so order'd Things, that he left little or nothing to Fortune; whereupon he gave his Judgment entirely up to his Father-in-Law's Discretion, with whom he return'd into England, openly professing and justifying his Resolution to Rebellion. The Vanity of Ambition sealing up his Eyes so far, that he could not perceive the Unnaturalness of his Revolt, and the certain Hazard of Ruin, in warring against a Prince so great both in Arms and Fortune.

Against their Return, the Archbishop of Tork had wrought so diligently to ripen Mischief, that the Multitude dispersed before, were again in the Field, but under Leaders of a far more eminent Name. For Henry, Son to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Henry Nevill, Son to the Lord Latimer (the one Nephew, the other Cousin-german to Warwick) had the Conduct of these Forces; both Gentlemen great in Blood and Spirit, but in regard of their unexperienced Youth, submitting themselves to the Directions of Sir John Coniers, a Commander bold in Courage and sober in Advice. Their March was not now directed against any petty Town in the North as before, but towards London, the Head of the Kingdom; and the Cause of their taking Arms, not upon any trivial Injury or Oppression, but out of Desire of publick Justice, by throwing down a licentious Usurper, and re-investing in the Sovereignty King Henry, their lawful Monarch, so injuriously detain'd Prisoner in the Tower. This Pretence carried with it much of Bravery, pleased the Humour of most of the Northern Men, passionately still affected to the Line of Lancaster, and took generally with the Commonalty, a Beast as prone to unseasonable Pity, as to inhumane Cruelty, and ever desirous to change Government, because naturally it can endure none.

The noise of these Arms waked King Edward; for he now perceiv'd his Title to the Crown, (for which he imagin'd he had had so clear a Sentence) brought again to tryal, and the Sword made Judge. He cast Eye his about him, and found every where the Way open to his Jealousie, and none to Security: And those Lords, from whom he might expect Supply, being near to Warwick in Friendship or Alliance, and the Marquess Mountacute, in whose Service he had ever found most Trust and Fortune, even Brother to his Enemy. How could he therefore believe, but notwithstanding all their outward Professions of Loyalty, privately they might favour Rebellion? As for the Queen's Kindred, (of whose Faith in regard of their own Interest, he remain'd secure) he could draw little Confidence: Their Greatness so Young, that it had yet taken no deep Root in Opinion, and their Forces only weak Beams shot from the Sun of the King's own Power. But no Consideration in this Trouble begot so much Scorn and Rage in him, as the Revolt of Clarence, whose giddy Ambition made him rather chuse to become a Ward to a rough and insolent Guardian, than to share with his Brother a King in the Treasures of Fortune. The Forces of the Rebels he weigh'd more by the Reputation of their Leader Warwick, than by the Number; though even that grew every Day more Formidable.

To prepare against these dangerous Motions in his English Rebels, he speedily sent to the Earl of Pembroke Commission to raise what Welsh Forces he could; having in this general Suspicion of his disloyal Subjects, most Confidence in the Valour of the Welsh, and their natural hatred against the English Name. He requir'd the Earl to give Battel by the Way, while himself gather'd as great an Army as the present Danger, and Cause in Controversie requir'd. The Earl joyful of the Command, puts suddenly into the Field with his valiant Brother Sir Richard Herbert, having under their Conduct 7000 Men. To them soon joyn 800 Bow-men, led by the Lord Stafford of Southwick, not long before created Earl of Devonshire. With these Forces he resolv'd to hinder the Rebels in their Journey, and having Notice by his Spies that they took their Way by Northampton, against them he led the whole Body of his Army: Having given Order to Sir Richard Herbert with 2000 Soldiers to wheel about, and charge the Enemy in the Reer.

Sir John Coniers was too valiant to be surprized, and so carefully had strengthen'd the Reerward, that the Welsh were repulsed with Loss, and forced by Flight to seek their Safety. Whereupon he retir'd to his Brother, while Coniers upon new Instructions, or else fearful

A. D. 1468. Reg. 8. left Pembroke in the Way might gain some Advantage, diverted from his direct Course to London, and march'd to Warwick, where the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick had levied a mighty Host. Pembroke waits close upon their Journey, expecting the Opportunity either to cut off some Part of the Enemy disorder'd, or to give Battel to the whole Army. But while he was constant in this Pursuit of Glory, and shewed all the Parts of a great Commander, a small Division between him and the Lord Stafford ruin'd the whole Attempt. For encamping at Banbury, a Question grew concerning an Inn, to which Stafford pretended as having long used the House; but in which Pembroke, in regard of his Preheminence as General, and Commodiousness of the Place, was resolv'd to lodge. This so trivial Distaste (if there were no farther Treason in it) grew so high, that Stafford withdrew himself, and his English Archers, leaving the Welsh in Arms and Number far inferior to the Enemy; which Defect nevertheless was supplied by their great Courage.

For when the Rebels, who soon had Notice of this unhappy Discord, gave the Earl's Camp next Morning a Camisado, or sudden Assault: The Welsh entertain'd the Charge so stoutly, that they took Sir Henry Nevill the Leader; but (what savour'd too much of Barbarism) most cruelly flew him in cold Blood. By which Act they rais'd so fierce an Appetite of Revenge in the Enemy, that the next Day they gave the Earl Battel, and the Fight was long and cruel. Neither had the Victory fallen so absolutely to the Northern Men, but that John Clopton, Retainer to the Earl of Warwick, appearing upon the Top of a neighbouring Hill with 500 ragged and disorder'd Men, under Warwick's Standard; and the Northern Men at their Approach crying out, A Warwick! a Warwick! made the Welsh believe all the Rebel Forces were there, and that it would be but foolish Desperation to fight it out against an Enemy fresh and so far Superior in Number; whereupon they fled.

In the Battel and Flight 5000 of the Welsh were slain, and among the few Prisoners, the Earl of Pembroke and Sir Richard Herbert were taken, whose Heads soon after were sacrificed upon the Scaffold, to the Ghost of Nevill. Their Valour and brave Conduct begetting an universal Sorrow to the King's Party for their Deaths, and even an Envy in the conquering Enemy. Neither did the Lord Stafford, the Author of this Overthrow escape condign Punishment: For by diligent Enquiry made by King Edward's Order, being found in (r) Devonshire, without legal Process, at Bridgwater he lost his Head. Having so inconsiderately manag'd his Business, that he betrayed King Edward's Army upon a false Apprehension of an Affront; and yet provided not thereby to win Favour so far with the Enemy as by their Arms to protect himself from the King's just Indignation.

This Victory added yet a bolder Courage to the Attempt of Warwick; but into the Northern Multitude it infused a Madness, not to be cured by any Council or Direction. For immediately some Companies of them retired into Northamptonshire, where associating to them certain of the most desperate Inhabitants, no Mischief was left unacted. The Name they gave their Commander, (if such a disorder'd Rabble could obey any) was Robin of Riddisdale, and their first Assault on Grafton, a Seat belonging to King Edward's Farther-in-Law the Earl of Rivers. The Place their wild Rage soon possess'd, and among the other Spoils violently taken there, were the Earl himself, and Sir John Woodville, his Younger Son. These they presently led to Northampton, and there beheaded without any Form of Law; that deform'd Body having no Ear open to any Discourse but to that of Blood and Fury. An envied Life and cruel Death was the Sum of all those Favours conferr'd by Fortune on this Lord, esteem'd so happy in his own Marriage with Jaquet, Widow of John, Duke of Bedford, and Daughter to Peter of Luxembourg, Count St. Paul, and in his Daughter's with the present King. For as the Ascent to these strange Heights is ever envied, so the Descent is ruinous and fatal; not any one of Seven Sons which this Lord was Father to, leaving behind him Issue to perpetuate his Name; some of them likewise extinguishing violently. A Misery either seldom happening, or not observ'd in meaner Families.

This great Defeat, and these Insolencies so beyond the Sufferance of a Prince, together with the Earl of Warwick's openly professing himself Head to this vast Body of Rebels, struck an Astonishment in the King's Army, and I will not say Fear, but strange Diffidence in the King himself; which inclin'd him to listen to the safer, though less noble Advice of them, who perswaded him to end all Dissention with the Earl by Treaty. For in this so universal Disease of the Kingdom, there was some sound Men, both of the Clergy and Nobility yet left, whom Faction did not engage in Mischief, and who out of Experience of past Miseries, were willing to prevent future. By their Mediation (tho' the Armies by this Time were so near encamp'd, that they could hardly part without Battel) were every Hour made new Overtures of Peace, and on both Sides not unwillingly receiv'd. The Earl of Warwick, (whose Pretence was that of all Rebels, The Good of the Kingdom) entertain'd these Treaties with a Humility beneath his Nature, and late Advantages; neither appear'd stubborn to bend down to the lowest Submission, so Provision might be made for the publick Benefit. Yet never in all these Appearances of a Calm, did he neglect to prepare himself against the roughest Storm of War, knowing the best Way to be reconciled upon safe Terms to an Enemy, is not to be necessitated to Peace.

But the King of a pliable Nature, apt to receive any Impressions which best pleased his present Humour, would not trouble his Quiet to believe there might be Fallacy in Warwick's Pretensions. Whereupon, imagining that had receiv'd Perfection which was then but in Agitation, he neglected the Order of War, and began in his Camp to taste the Pleasures of Court. Which evil Discipline observ'd by the Earl, he takes the Advantage, suddenly sets on the King's Field, kills the Watch, and in the dead of Night at Wollny within Four Miles of Warwick, surpriseth his Person, buried in a careless Sleep: So that, he no sooner waked, but found how false his Dream had been, which flatter'd him with Peace.

This so unhappy Negligence betray'd the King to an insulting Enemy, who upbraided his Prisoner in the most insolent Terms with Ingratitude to his great Merits; and boasted, It

(r) He was found at Brens near the River Axe in Somersetshire, and carried to Bridgwater the next noted Town in that Country, and there beheaded. Hol.

A. D. 1469. was now both in his Power and Resolution to plain that Mountain he had raised, and raise the humbled Valley of King Henry's Fortunes, up to the Throne he once possess'd. And presently sent away the King Prisoner to Middleham-Castle in Yorkshire, there to be kept by his Brother the busie Archbishop of that See; not daring to retain him longer, lest his Army might unite, and hazard the Recovery of their Prince.

In this middle and unsafe Course of managing his great Fortune, questionless the Earl committed a main Oversight. For either by a free Delivery with some Conditions advantageous to himself and Friends, (and what Conditions would the King not then have sign'd?) he should have cast a perpetual Obligation upon him, or else by destroying him, have secur'd his Design from after Hazard; knowing that no Prison could hold a Prince, which would not open to Corruption or Battery; and no Brother could have a Faith so strong which would not be in Danger to be weakned either by Threats or Promises. But perhaps this Way of Policy was only beaten by that Time; and the proud Earl took a Glory to keep the whole Kingdom at his Devotion, and the Two Competitors his Captives; for both of them his Fortune had imprison'd.

But K. Edward grew soon weary of the Restraint, as whom a long Practice in the Liberty of Pleasure, had not indued with such a Tamefulness as armed King Henry: He therefore presently casts his Eye about to find some Way to redeem his Person from Captivity, and his Honour from so dark an Error as by Negligence to have been surpris'd. And having upon Pretence of necessary Exercise for Health, obtain'd Licence to hunt in the adjoining Park, he so contriv'd with Sir William Stanley and Sir Thomas Burgh, that unexpected they came to his Rescue with a Number and Resolution far Superior to those who guarded him. With them he escapes to York, and so to Lancaster, where the Lord Hastings, Lord Chamberlain had gathered some Forces. With this Increase of Followers he march'd directly to London, his Company growing by the Way to such a Body, as might not unworthily be termed an Army.

Into the City he was receiv'd with the accustomed Triumph, the Affection of the Inhabitants being ever devoted to his Prosperity. The Occasion of which extraordinary Zeal was certainly either a Delight to continue him their Prince, whom their Voices first inaugurated King, or a Hope by his Re-establishment to recover those vast Sums of Money, his Necessities heretofore had borrowed in the City; or else a general Affection born him by the Merchant's Wives, who having (according to the uxorious Humour of our Nation) a Command over their Husbands, urged them on to side with that Prince, the Beauty of whose Personage, not the Justice of whose Title, mov'd them.

But the Earl of Warwick, as soon as he had Intelligence of the Escape, and the Fortune which attended it, was distracted with a Thousand several Imaginations. He had just Reason to suspect his Brother the Archbishop's Faith, as corrupted by the King's Persuasions; as likewise the Weight of his own Reputation in the Kingdom, grown lighter by so evil managing so good a Fortune. He condemn'd the Folly of his too much Confidence, in having disbanded his Army, and knew the Difficulty, if not the Impossibility, suddenly to reinforce it. But this was the inward Part of him; outwardly he descended nothing from the Height of his Greatness and Resolution. And to secure his former Design, he directed his Letters to all the Lords of his Faction, and advised them to reassemble for the common Safety.

The Solicitation of those good Men, who heretofore had labour'd Peace, continued still; and so effectually endeavour'd, that in fine they brought both Parties to agree upon an Interview in Westminster-Hall. There was Interchange of Oaths for Safety on both Sides, and nothing but a perfect Re-union of Friendship generally expected.

But no sooner was the Earl of Warwick (who came accompanied by the Duke of Clarence) wish'd to express his Desires, but he fell into a bold Expostulation of Injuries. And his Language swell'd to such Intemperance, so far beyond the Limits of that Modesty becomes a Subject's Mouth; that the King full of Indignation departed the Hall, and immediately took his Journey to Canterbury: On the other Side, the Earl, wild in his Anger, posted to Lincoln; both making Preparation for a Second Interview, when the Sword should both dispute and decide the Controversie. Whoever perswaded these Two great Spirits to this Meeting, err'd grossly in Judgment, how zealous soever they were in their Intention. For who could possibly imagine but the Thunder of War should necessarily follow that Storm, which the Recapitulation of Injuries must beget? Since Expostulations, (unless there be some apparent Mistake, or that the one Party by evil Fortune be bow'd to an over-low Submission) may well give a Growth to Rancour, but never extirpate it. But Experience condemns all Interviews, till by Commissioners (who with more Patience can argue) all Dissentions are reconcil'd. And most of all against any between a Prince and his Subject; since a Subject hardly contains his Language from Insolency, when by the disproportionate Greatness of his Fortune he is admitted upon even Terms to contest with his Sovereign; and a Prince goes down more than one Step from Majesty, when he is forc'd to descend so low, as to hold Parly with a Rebel.

The King understanding that the greatest Part of the Earl's Forces were under the Conduct of Sir Robert Wells, and that by his good Discipline they were become expert Soldiers, and had done some Service against Sir Thomas Burgh; sent for Richard, Lord Wells, his Father, that having Possession of him, he might either draw away the Son from Warwick, or at least take off the Edge from his violent Proceedings. The Lord Wells in Obedience to the King's Command, with his Brother-in-Law Sir Thomas Dimmock directed his Journey toward the Court; but having by the Way secret Notice of the King's high Displeasure, and how unsafe his Approach would be, secured himself in Sanctuary. But the King resolv'd upon any Terms to get him, granted a general Pardon, and receiv'd him with Promise of all fair Usage. Upon which he came forth, and only at his Approach to the King's Presence, was advis'd by Letters to recall his Son from Rebellion, and himself to bear a loyal Heart. These Letters dispatch'd with as much Authority as a Father could challenge, he remain'd in a kind of Twilight between Favour and Ruin, till the Messenger's return: Who, bringing back no Answer from the Son in Obedience to his Father's Command, but rather a Justification of his Enterprize, so far incensed the King, that he presently caused the Lord Wells and Dimmock to be beheaded at Stamford. For what just Grounds soever the King might have to build Suspicion on, that Wells did not effectually perswade his Son, or that inwardly he wish'd better to the Affairs of Warwick, yet ought he not to have violated his Word. And it is a most poor Excuse, to say a sudden Rage was guilty of this Mischief.

Sir Robert Wells furious to revenge his Father's Death is beaten, and after beheaded. The Report of this Execution clouded generally the Reputation of the King, but in Sir Robert Wells it begot nothing but Fury and Revenge. And indeed Rage so far blinded his Judgment, that contrary to all Perswasion and sober Direction, not attending Warwick's coming, who every Day was expected; he drew out his Forces, and charged the King's Army, who receiv'd him with equal Courage, and (while hope of Vengeance transported him too far) inclosed him, and with 67 more took him Prisoner. Upon the Place and in the Flight were slain of the Enemy 10000, on the King's Side only 1300, they who escap'd, to make their Flight the swifter cast away their Coats, which gave to this Battel the Name of Loose-Coat-Field. The Prisoners immediately were executed, Sir Robert Wells having only in his short Delay of Death the longer Liberty to express his Hatred against the King and his perfidious Cruelty.

The Earl of Warwick's Flight to Calis. This Overthrow forced Warwick to new Resolutions; for his main Forces by the Precipitation of the Commander being destroy'd, he foresaw that suddenly he could not recover an Army able to give the King Battel, and how open to be surprized the least interim would render him: Whereupon leisurely (for his great Spirit disdain'd any thing that resembl'd Flight) he retir'd to Exeter, whence having dismissed the Remainder of those Troops which attended him, he went to Dartmouth, there with many Ladies and a large Retinue he took Ship, and directly sail'd to Calis; while the King no way labour'd either by Land or Sea, to impeach their Journey, either content with the former half-Victory (for nothing could have made it perfect, but the Surprisal or Destruction of Warwick) or holding so little Intelligence even in a conquer'd Enemy's Camp, that he knew nothing of his present Design: The Earl having tried as strange a Vicissitude of Fortune, as in so short a Space, was ever observ'd in Story, by the Benefit of a prosperous Gale soon was brought before Calis, where being Captain of the Town he expected Entrance, but the Cannon was presented him, and no Commiseration of the Dutches of Clarence's being in Travail, could obtain so much as Admittance in her present Necessity, only the poor Relief of some few Flaggons of Wine, was sent her. Monsieur de Vaulere a (s) Knight of Gascoiny, Lieutenant of the Town, thus confidently refused his Captain Admittance; professing, that however he ow'd his present Command to Warwick's Bounty, his Loyalty to the King did cancel all inferior Obligations: By which Bravery of Carriage he won so great Reputation with the King and the Duke of Burgundy (who ever hated the factious Pride of Warwick, and even from the Beginning of these Troubles had labour'd to continue Vaulere firm in his Allegiance) that from the King he received by Letters Patents the Captainship of Calis in chief, and from the Duke an annual Pension of 1000 Crowns during Life. Monsieur Vaulere made Governor of Calis by King Edward.

to Warwick, while under-Hand by the Subtilty of Council he steer'd the Earl of Warwick to Safety, and by false-appearing Fidelity betray-ed his Prince: For he ascertain'd the Earl of his good Intentions to his Affairs; and that even now, but that he knew it could not but be ruinous to both, he would declare himself for him. For if the Earl entred the Town he would only imprison his Person, to be detain'd till the King were pleas'd to command it forth to Execution. Considering that the Inhabitants were but unsure Friends, and the Lord of Duras, the Earl's profest Enemy, Marshal of all the Forces in the Town. Moreover the Burgundian Territories encompass'd Calis by Land, and their Fleet was in Readiness to block it up by Sea, so that no Way would be open to his Escape: Wherefore he advis'd him for his present Security and future Hopes, presently to address himself to King Lewis of France, who was ever ready to entertain any Lord of another Nation in Quarrel with his Prince. But above all would welcome the Earl both in regard of the near Intelligence he had long held with him, and the Hatred he bore King Edward for affronting the Lady Bona, and the Duke of Burgundy for so often confederating with the Rebels of France.

By this Counsel the Earl of Warwick steer'd his Course to Deep, by the Way making Prize of whatever appertain'd to the Duke of Burgundy or his Subjects. And no sooner was he landed there, but he was most solemnly invited to the Castle of Amboys (u), where King Lewis then kept his Court. The Ceremony (short ever with Men of Business) past over at the first Meeting, suddenly they entred into Council how to renew the War, and restore King Henry; whose Re-establishment in the Kingdom Lewis ever most passionately urg'd, not in Respect of the near Alliance, Commiseration of his long Troubles, or Opinion of his better Title; but only because he knew him inferior in Courage to King Edward, and therefore the less dangerous Neighbour; and probably while any of the House of Tork remain'd, civil War likely to keep the English Arms bulied at Home.

Wherefore by his Importunity Queen Margaret (who hitherto had liv'd an Exile in France, and now upon the King's Invitation came to Court) was perfectly reconcil'd to the Earl of Warwick. Warwick, who before had chased her out of the Land, dethron'd her Husband, and opprobriously imprison'd him, cut off the many Branches, and almost pluck'd up the very Root of the Tree of Lancaster: But Necessity took away the Sting from Nature, and united them in the nearest Friendship. For that there might not be left any Footsteps of former Discontent or Path to future Jealously, a Marriage was concluded and celebrated between Prince Edward the Queen's Son, and the Lady Anne, younger Daughter to the Earl. And on this Marriage was agreed that King Edward should be deposed, King Henry re-inthroned, the Crown to be entail'd upon Prince Edward, and for Default of his Issue, to come to the Duke of Clarence and his Posterity: By which Conveyance human Policy did her Part to perpetuate the Succession of the Kingdom in the Posterity of Warwick. But the Almighty made a Mockery of this Babel, which fell soon to Ruin by Self-division and Confusion, not of Languages but Affections. For the Duke of Clarence began now to

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10. consider how by following the Earl's desperate Counsels, he had gain'd nothing but the Conscience of an unnatural Revolt, and how ruin'd he were if the Success of this Enterprize should not be Prosperous, and if Prosperous how upon the Destruction of a Brother, he had built himself a less Greatness than he might have enjoy'd, without Sin or Hazzard; there being a vast Distance between the Nearness of two Sons of one Mother, and only Husbands to two Sisters: Neither had he any sure Ground for Confidence, that when King Henry were restored, hereditary Malice might not prevail, and destroy him for the Crime of his Family. And now more than ever he found himself declin'd, being forced to submit not only to Warwick, but to a new young Prince; having before acknowledged no Superiour but the King and him a Brother. Neither was the Dutches of Clarence her self a weak Engine, on which this Alteration moved. For however, as a Daughter she might wish Prosperity to the Attempts of Warwick; yet ever since the last Agreement of Reinvesting the House of Lancaster in the Kingdom; she found in her Mind a strange Alienation from the Faction. And indeed either she began to dislike the Variety of her Father's Resolutions, as whom Ambition led violently to build and pluck down, or in Conscience thought the Justice of the Claim was wholly in King Edward; having in her Child-hood (and those Impressions are ever deepest) been instructed to affect the House of York, and approve the Title: Or (and that is the most probable in a Woman) she envied perhaps the Preferment of a younger Sister, hating that Fortune should throw down the Priority of Nature. However, it was, yet certainly by her Means King Edward labour'd to recal his Brother, and though not suddenly, yet in the End prevail'd: For having sent over a Gentlewoman (her Sex took away Suspicion from the Practice) with full Instructions both to advise the Dutches not to work the Ruin, or at best the lessening of her Husband by those Counsels held then between Queen Margaret and the Earl of Warwick, as likewise to promise (if she perswaded her Husband) to him and her as much Love and Greatness as the Tie of Nature, and so great a Merit might justly challenge: He in fine got a Promise, that as soon as the Duke were disintangled from his present Engagements, he would declare the natural Affection he owed a Brother.

This weak Hope, with the late Victory and seeming Banishment of his Enemies, loosened King Edward to his accustomed Wantonness and Riot. For certainly, never lived Prince whom Adversity did more harden to Action, and Prosperity more soften to Voluptuousness: So that by the Judgment on his Life, we may say, like a Stone cast into the Air, he was by Necessity forced up to Glory, while his Center remain'd beneath in the Sense of Pleasure: And so improvident was his Memory, that he forgot the greatest Injuries, and resumed the Arch-bishop of York into Favour, not bearing so much as a watchful Eye over a reconcil'd Enemy: By which his Counsels were betray'd and he perswaded to a false and most dangerous Security.

But the Duke of Burgundy, whose Recreation was Business, and whose Delight, Extent of Dominion; who by having long wrastled with Lewis XI. had learnt all the Slights of War and Peace, labour'd to disperse the Storm before it fell upon England. Whereupon he daily advertised King Edward of all Passages in the Court of France, his Intelligence holding good there, and who knew how near Danger came to him, should our King be overthrown. He advised him by vast Promises (which no way oblig'd Performance) to win some, and sowing the poysonous Seed of Emulation, to recal others: As likewise to send over some great Lord into France, who pretending Discontent, shall adhere to the Faction, and under-hand discover all their Counsels. But above all he solicited him to rig up and set forth his Navy whereby to prevent their landing: Affirming it to be a most ridiculous Madness in a King (unless urged by inevitable Necessity) to stake his Crown at a Battel against the Resolution of a Rebel.

The King, contrary to this sober Counsel never endeavour'd to hinder the Return of Warwick, but building on the Protestations of the Marquess Montacute, and the Arch-bishop of York, securely gave himself over to Licentiousness. In which Interim, the Earl with his Retinue, conducted by the Bastard of Bourbon, Admiral of France, sail'd back into England, King Lewis having furnish'd him with a full supply of Monies; and for Soldiers he needed no Foreign Levies, his Name and Faction was so great at Home: For though the Country by Civil War was much dispeopled, yet the Commonalty, being for the most part born and bred up in Tumults, were naturally addicted to Arms, and prone upon any Innovations to take the Field. Neither could the Duke of Burgundy, though most passionately he labour'd it, hinder the Earl's landing by giving him Battel at Sea; for the Winds fought for Warwick and dispersed the Burgundian Fleet (the best in that Age commanded upon the Sea) casting some Ships upon the Coast of Scotland, others upon the remotest Parts of Holland.

Neither did the King any way repent his Error when he understood the Earl was landed, but presently dispatched a Messenger to the Duke of Burgundy intreating him to continue his Army at Sea, to prevent Warwick's Flight back into France, as if he were ascertain'd Fortune would never deny him Victory. So secure was he grown by an over-bold Presumption, the Bastard-Daughter of a long Prosperity. But they whom Experience had instructed to more Caution, pittied his Mistake and forefaw his Ruin. And he himself not long after understanding how mightily the Earl increased in Power, began to think his Safety brought into Hazard; which he much more believ'd when he found the Nobility, whom he summon'd to his Aid to excuse themselves, and the common Stream of People to depart wholly from his Service.

And indeed, even in the City the adverse Faction was grown so strong, that Dr. Gooddiard, Chaplain to the Earl, at St. Paul's Cross in his Sermon dared even to act the Herald, and conclude Edward an Usurper. And thereupon to commend the most religious Intentions of the Earl, and to exhort the Audience to joyn with him in restoring their imprison'd Sovereign King Henry to his Scepter, and the Commonwealth to Liberty; and the like did most of the Clergy of England.

The credulous Multitude took this Heresie for true Doctrine, and with some of the zealously ignorant, it so far prevail'd, that in pure Devotion they committed High-Treason. But would to God the Pulpit might only speak Things Sacred; Matters of State having room enough to be discussed in Council-Chambers, and other

A. D. 1470. Reg. 10. A general Revolt from King Edward. other Places erected for publick Assemblies. For certainly how erroneous soever the Tenet be, if utter'd there by a Priest with Appearance of Religion, it gets too much Authority in the Ear, and too much Ground upon the Conscience, as this Opinion did, which was no sooner receiv'd, but all began to incline to Revolt; and with the first got away the late reconcil'd Arch-bishop, and the Marquess Mountacute his Brother; both having so often and so ceremoniously vow'd never to forsake the Title of King Edward, and both now perfidiously breaking those Vows, and with the loudest crying out, Long live King Henry.

The Treachery of Mountacute, who having raised in K. Edward's Name 6000 Men turn'd now with them to Warwick, and the general Defection of the Land threw the King down into extream Despair. For those few Lords who constantly adher'd to his declining Fortune, commanded over so small a Number, that to resolve upon a Battel were to betray themselves to Slaughter: And when Misfortune drove their Thoughts upon Safety by Flight, they knew not whither to resolve: No Land being willing to receive that Prince, who is forced to flee his own. But while his Imaginations remain'd thus confus'd, he had hardly escap'd a Surprise in the Night, had not his former Misfortune served him now for Instruction: And finding his Stay only begot Disreputation to his Quarrel, and Danger to his Person, he began his Flight towards Lincolnshire. But the Earl sent after him his Light-horse, following with the whole Body of his Army; and so close did the Light-horse pursue him, that with much Difficulty, and with Loss of all his Carriages in his Passage through the Washes he reach'd Linn. The Queen, who was the Cause of these Alterations, seeing her Husband gone, and with him all hopes of Safety, all Friends vanishing with Prosperity, was forced to betake her self in all haste, though great with Child, to the Divine Protection in the Sanctuary at Westminster, with a small Attendance; such as were faithful to her running to other Churches for the like Protection.

The Lord Hastings, faithful to the King in all Fortunes, and who had yet 300 Horse under his Command, stay'd some short Time behind; and now when he imagin'd the King past the reach of imminent Danger, he dismissed his Forces and follow'd after. At parting he commended the Faith of the Soldiers to their Prince, which nevertheless for the Present he advis'd them to dissemble, because there was no present Security, nor Hope of doing after-Service, but by Submission to the prevailing Faction. Ere long he promised to Return, when a better Fortune would invite them to show the Loyalty of their Affections; the Violence of the Storm being too mighty to continue, and King Edward in Faction at Home and Abroad too potent, so easily to quit a Kingdom; however for the present he withdrew himself a while.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. King Edward's Escape by Sea into Holland, and Danger in it. Having exhorted thus his Soldiers, he obey'd Necessity, and by speedy Flight went after the King: Who having hired Three Ships, one of England and two of Holland, presently embark'd, having in his Company the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl Rivers, the Lords Scales and Say, and in Retinue about One Thousand (*). As soon as they were put to Sea, the King encountered Dangers as great as he had escap'd at Land. For the Easterlings (a People ever famed for Sea Affairs, and then at Enmity both with France and England) had set forth not long before some Men of War; who having descry'd these Ships, and guessing them to be English, made Sail after them. The King by Benefit of the Wind got first to the Coast of Holland, and in regard it was Ebbing-water cast Anchor so near the Shore, the Easterlings (being Ships of far greater Burthen) could not reach them: But the next Tide infallibly had expos'd them a Prize to the Enemy, had not the Lord Grontere, Lieutenant for the Duke in Holland by mere Accident been at that time at Alquemare, a Sea-Town close joyning to them. He as soon as he understood by a Messenger sent from King Edward, that those Three small Vessels carried in them the Fortune of England, commanded the Easterlings to forbear Hostility, and license those Passengers a quiet landing. And presently himself came Aboard the King's Ship, expressing in the Obsequiousness of his Respects as much Ceremony and Love, as was due to so great a Majesty, and the Brother-in-law to his Prince. And no sooner had he attended the King Ashore, and found how unprovided of all Things necessary, the Suddenness of his Flight had made him and his Followers; but he furnish'd him and them according to their Quality and Want. For the King's Escape was so hasty, that not only his Apparel and other Furniture were lost or left behind, but even his Treasure: So that to defray the Charge of his Transportation he was necessitated to give the Master of the Ship a Gown furr'd with Martins; and remain beholding to the Lord Grontere for his Expences to the Hague, whither he was conducted to expect the coming of the Duke. Who as soon as he had perfect Knowledge of the King's so ruinous Success in England, and Arrival in Holland as to a Sanctuary, began to repent his so near Alliance, and cast about how to close with the adverse Faction. And now indeed his Time was to act the most cunning part of Subtily, by endeavouring to retain the good Opinion of his Brother-in-law, and yet secure himself from Hostility with the Earl of Warwick. Whereupon before ever he came to the Hague he dispatch'd his Agent to Callis, to show the chief Men of the Town, that the Peace heretofore concluded between King Edward and himself, was no way personal: But between whatsoever Princes should rule in either Dominions, and betwixt Nation and Nation, and therefore by no Change of King or length of Time dissolvable. Upon which Consideration he intreated (for loth he was at the same Time to wrestle both with France and England) that the Name of Edward might be chang'd into Henry, and the former League continue sacred as before.

The unsettled State of England, and the universal Desires of the Merchants of the Staple at Callis, soon effected the Duke's Purpose. For they who had continual Traffick into the Low-Countries, and vented all their Wool to the Subjects of the Duke, had been disabled to pay their usual Tribute to the King, if free Inter-course had been denied. Whereupon unwilling to discontent and impoverish so great a Body at home, and too hastily to run into a dangerous Quarrel with a most potent Enemy abroad, the Earl for the present dissembled his inveterate Hatred, and recall'd his Soldiers who had spoiled all the Duke's Territoir bordering upon Callis. And that the Duke might make himself

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. Strong in a Faction potent with the present Time, he renew'd his Friendship with the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, whom he solicited earnestly to endear him to King Henry, and revive in him the Memory of their so near Kindred. To acquaint him how zealous himself and his Father had ever been for the Honour and Safety of the Family of Lancaster, in which himself did so much participate. As likewise to promise all the perfect Offices of a Confederate and Neighbour, if so be that his Faithful Intentions might receive a true Interpretation.

Duke of Burgundy accepted into Friendship with Henry. This did the Dukes voluntarily offer to negotiate; Somerset in respect of Propinquity in Blood, Exeter, of those many Favours receiv'd in the Low-Countries during his so miserable Exile: Both out of an extream Malice to the Earl of Warwick, who had subverted their Families, and to whose Aid, they envied the King should owe his Restitution. And easily was the Duke brought upon good Terms with King Henry; his Neighbourhood and Friendship being of so notable Consequence, and the very Appearance of disclaiming the adverse Party (what secret Aid soever he afforded) being so disadvantageous to any Pretence King Edward might have to renew the War.

Duke of Burgundy keeps fair with K. Edward, who was then in his Court. This Aspect, full of a smiling Flattery, did the Duke of Burgundy bear to the present Fortune of the State. While upon King Edward he cast such a supercilious Look, as the World's wise Men usually do upon Men in Adversity. Often sharply he reprehended his so great Carelessness and Neglect of wholesome Advice, which had ruin'd him, and obliged him to this so wretched Flight. He objected the much Contempt this Misfortune would throw upon his Quarrel, and how loth Friends would be to adhere to his present Necessities, since he knew so ill to manage Prosperity. Yet remembering that hereafter there might happily be a Change in Fortune, he often chang'd his Humour, and amid these Reprehensions mingled some passionate Complements of Love. He protested seriously that he wish'd all Happiness to his Affairs, to advance which he would neglect no Industry; yet he desired his Pardon if for the present he dissembled, considering it might at once draw on a War from his Two most dangerous Neighbours, England and France; against both which Nations should he be necessitated to a Quarrel, he should be very unable to defend himself, much less to serve another. And when a Proclamation was set forth by the Duke, prohibiting his Subjects any Way to aid the Pretences of King Edward or his Faction, and that it was with much Indignation receiv'd by the King, he protested the Intention of it to be only to betray King Henry to an unsafe Security, that in the interim he might without Suspicion levy a greater Aid for his Designs. K. Edward (whom a short Adversity had already instructed much) appeared to take the false Coin of these Excuses for currant, and by Example of the Duke, practis'd to dissemble. But after this Time it was noted, that he never bore the Duke so sincere Affection as before. Princes best maintain a near Friendship by keeping at large Distance; Jealousie and Emulation take their Growth with Familiarity, and if either be necessitated to demand Supply, Reason of State oftentimes weakens Love, and roots up good Nature.

To increase King Edward's Discontent abroad, no News came from England but what spoke absolute Ruin to his Hopes. For tho'

here he heard first the Comfort of his being Father to a Son, Prince Edward, yet was this Son born poorly in Sanctuary, and christned without the Ceremonies belonging to a Prince, and if Fortune beyond Expectation alter'd not, Heir apparent only to his Father's Misery. Neither did that wild Insurrection of the Men of Kent, which ensued presently upon his Flight, effect any Thing, or so much as openly pretend for King Edward. But some disorder'd Companies gathered into one, hoped to fish fair in the troubled Stream of the Kingdom, and by the Advantage of the present Distraction of State to purchase Treasure to themselves. Whereupon they directed their March (if such Stragglers can be said to march) towards London; where by the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Mayor they were soon suppress'd, and some for the general Terror, made Examples in their Punishment, which much rais'd the Reputation of the Earl. But after this all Things tended presently to Quiet, and K. Henry being set at Liberty, (y) went in solemn Procession to St. Paul's Church, the Clergy, Nobility and Commonalty re-acknowledging all Obedience to him. And, as if there were left no Memory of King Edward, or Hope to re-establish his Title, every Man address'd himself to King Henry, and all his former Servants recover'd their lost Honours and Places. But that this might not appear to be the Act of Faction, but the universal Consent of the Kingdom, a Parliament was summon'd (z); wherein nothing was denied, which the prevailing Party thought fit to be authoriz'd.

King Edward therefore and all his Adherents were attainted of High Treason, their Lands and Goods confiscated. He and his Posterity for ever disabled to inherit not only the Crown, but any other hereditary Estate; his Claim to the Kingdom rejected as a most unjust Pretension, and his former Government condemn'd as of a tyrannous Usurper. And that there might be a great Example of their Justice, John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, Lord High Constable of England, and Lord Deputy of Ireland (having been apprehended in the Forrest of Wai-bridge, on the Top of a high Tree, which expressed the Precipice of his Fortune) was on the Tower-Hill beheaded.

Next they proceeded to entail the Crown upon King Henry and his Heirs Males, for Default of which, to George, Duke of Clarence, and his Heirs for ever. By which Intail, the Earl of Warwick shew'd not only the Extent, but the Insolency of Greatness, as if the Title of the Kingdom appertain'd to them, who were nearest in Alliance to him, not next in Blood to the Crown. For if the Justice of Lancaster's Claim had the Preheminence for want of Issue of King Henry, why should not the Sovereignty fall to the Duke of Somerset? Or if that Line were crooked in respect of Bastardy, why not to the House of Portugal, without any Blemish descending from John of Gaunt? Or if the House of York had the better Title, why was George, Duke of Clarence then set down but Second in the Intail? Or if the Right were in Warwick himself (for his Power order'd and disorder'd all) why was the Kingdom to descend first of all to the Younger Daughter? But preposterous Ambition never knew how to give an Account to Reason.

Then were the Earls of Oxford, Pembroke, and many others restor'd to their Estates and Titles, and the Duke of Clarence (that greater Hopes might not invite him to return to his Brother) possessed of the Dutchy of York.

And lastly, the Government of the King and Kingdom committed to the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick; so that King Henry (in whose best of Fortune it was never to possess more than the Name of King) seem'd not to be set at Liberty, but only to have changed his Keeper, and get his Prison somewhat more enlarged. But Queen Margaret and Prince Edward, tho' by the Earl recall'd, found their Fate and the Winds so adverse, that they could not land in England, to taste this running Banquet to which Fortune had invited them. And staid so long by Necessity; that Discretion instructed them, in the End there was no Hope of Felicity, scarce of Safety in their Return.

Vauclere revolts from K. Edward to the Earl of Warwick.

The Re-establishment of King Henry in the Kingdom by the universal Acclamation of the Parliament, and the general Silence of the other Faction, no Man so much as mentioning the Title of York, cool'd that Fervor of Respect with which the Duke of Burgundy had at first embraced King Edward; especially when the Treason of Monsieur Vauclere was apparent: For of Callit, both the King and the Duke ever thought themselves secure, he having declared himself so faithfully, and they rewarded him so liberally. But now the Traitor turned his Inside outward, and with the loudest proclaim'd his Joy for the Prosperity of Warwick: And so far did the Vanity of his former Services betray him, that he boasted even his Treason for Merit. And whatever Messages the King sent to him, he rejected with Scorn, to whose more notable Affront, he wore enamel'd in his Hat, the Bear and ragged Staff, the Earl's Cognizance.

K. Edward obtains Leave to depart, and an Assistance of Men and Monny from the Duke of Burgundy.

The Neglect which accompanied his Adversity, made the King weary of any further Dependances, and urge the Duke to have Licence for departing. For although the Dutchess neglected no Duty of a Sister, and woo'd him most passionately to a longer Stay, yet so little had his Fortune instructed him to Patience, that neither Love nor Fright of Danger could detain him longer. For the Duke was distemper'd with such an Ague of Discourteise, that those Fits which before came but every Third or Fourth Day, became now Quotidian; neither knew the King to how high and dangerous a Malice the Disease in Time might rise. His Importunity therefore in the End prevail'd, and under Hand obtain'd a large Supply of Monny, and some Men. Four great Ships of Holland, and Fourteen of the Easterling's Men of War well arm'd, he hired for the Transportation of his Forces; which consisted of the English who accompanied him in his Flight, and had escaped over after him, and 2000 Dutch Men. With the Ships he covenanted, that they should serve him till Fifteen Days after his landing; and to the Dutch Soldiers he gave such large Promises, that they vowed their Lives to the greatest Cruelty of his Fortune.

His Landing in Yorkshire.

At Ravenspur in Yorkshire he landed (a), where the People naturally devoted to the House of Lancaster, (shewed in the Malice of their Looks, what evil Luck they wish'd him) tho' they wanted Courage with their Arms to oppose him.

His March to York.

Which so dismal Aspect made him more wary in his March to York, fearing it might preface the general Rising of the Country. But when he came thither, and found the Citizens so well pleased with the present State, and so in their Opinion confirm'd for King Henry, he began to despair the Recovery of the Crown. And in that Resolution, perceiving them obstinate beyond any Hope of Remove, fashion'd his Behaviour by a new Art, pretending he came to recover his Dukedom and Estate. Whereupon, tho' he could not move them to Obedience by the Authority of his unquestion'd Right to the Crown, yet by relation of his present Calamity, he perswaded them to Compassion. So that whom they refused to serve as King, which had been an Act of Loyalty, they condescended to aid as Duke of York, which was absolute Rebellion. It being High Treason in a Subject, tho' never so apparently injur'd, to seek his Remedy by Arms. And by the Sence of his own Misfortunes, he made his Oratory so powerful, that all began to exclaim against the Injustice of the last Parliament, in conferring the Dutchy of York, which by Right of Primogeniture belonged to Edward, upon his Second Brother George, Duke of Clarence, Which Act could not be imagin'd, freely granted by the Parliament, but extorted by the overgreat Sway of Warwick: And had Edward by Usurpation of the Crown, defery'd so heavy an Attainder, he might yet quit himself from the Crime, having been excited thereunto, not by his own ambitious Desire of Reign, but by the Instigation of Warwick, who no longer would suffer the Government of his King, than the King knew how to obey his insolent Direction; and who had thus planted and supplanted Princes, not out of Love to Justice, but only thereby to transplant the Sovereignty into his own Family.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11.

The Citizens of York assist King Edward to recover his Honour and Estate, but not the Crown.

Thus the Commonalty argued for Edward, and made him yet partake in the Fortune of a Prince, by not permitting him to bear the Burthen of his own Faults; and that he might recover the Dutchy belonging to his Family, many Persons of Power and Name resorted to him, he solemnly swearing never to attempt hereafter the Re-obtaining of the Kingdom. The same Oath swore Henry of Bullingbrook, when pretending to the Dutchy of Lancaster, he landed in the North, and arm'd against King Richard, which he broke as Edward after did upon the like Advantage. So that with Humility we ought to wonder at the Judgments of the Almighty, who permitted Perjury now to unbuild the Greatness of Lancaster, which at first was built by Perjury.

K. Edward swears not to attempt to recover the Crown.

Edward swore on the Holy Sacrament he would not attempt the Crown.

Leaving therefore a Garrison in York (a safe Retreat upon the worst Occasion) he march'd towards London; about which Place he had ever found his Fortune most kind and prosperous. And confidently led on his Forces (which could not deserve the Name of an Army) although the Marquess Mountacute with a far superior Power lay then at Pomfret to hinder his Journey. Nigh which when King Edward came expecting Battle; Mountacute who had both Ability and Opportunity to have destroy'd him, let him quietly pass, not permitting any Act of Hostility to be show'd, or Advantage taken.

K. Edward marches to London by Marquess Mountacute's Permission.

This gross Over-sight in so absolute a Commander receiv'd several Interpretations, according to the Complexion of the Men who discourst it. The more Religious who favoured K. Edward's Title thought Almighty God, intending to set the Crown upon the Right Head, had intimated the Counsels of his Enemies: The more Vulgar judg'd it Cowardize in the Marquess which durst not fight against that Majesty for which he had so often fought, and Mountacute's Act variously interpreted.

(a) On the Twelfth of March.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. against a Prince who had never been in Battel but Victorious: But the more indifferent esteem'd it a piece of over-cunning (which in the Event is ever Folly) to let his Forces pass, whereby after he might inclose him between his and his Brother's Army, and so without Hazard destroy him, or else some Intelligence which secretly he held with K. Edward to whose Love and Benefits he owed so much. Whence this Mistake proceeded, I will not dispute, but certainly it serv'd well to the King's Purpose and Safety; and receiv'd from the Earl of Warwick and his Faction no other Name than that of Falshood and Treason.

King Edward's Army mightily increased, and he claims the Crown. King Edward was no sooner past this Danger, but many of the Nobility with mighty Forces repair'd to him at Nottingham, either desirous of another Revolution of State, not having found their Expectation answer'd in the last; or directed by their better Angel to adhere to that Side which ever was more just, and suddenly more likely to be more Fortunate. But before they would solemnly declare themselves, they intreated and soon prevail'd with him to cast off the poor Intention to a Dutchy, and lay his Challenge to, what was his Inheritance, the Kingdom. For it would lessen, even to Contempt, the great Reputation of his Birth and former Victories, to let the People perceive that a short Eclipse of Fortune had made him fall so low, as to depose himself from the Royalty. Neither could they justify their taking Arms to settle a Subject in his Inheritance. Since the Law is open to end such Controversies, and if he would subject himself to the Law, the last Parliament, had for ever disabled him from any such Claim.

K. Edward hastens to fight the Earl of Warwick. Weaker Arguments would have been of Power enough to have perswaded his great Spirit; but by these he was confirm'd in his own Thoughts; and so being proclaim'd King, with that Title, and a full Army he march'd directly to Coventry (b) fierce in his Desire to give Warwick Battel, who lay there encamp'd. But no Provocation could bring him from his Trenches, knowing his Army divided, and those Forces he had there under his Command, unequal to maintain Fight with the King. For the Marquis Mountacute was not yet return'd from the North, and the Duke of Clarence, tho' often and earnestly solicited excused himself, and kept his Power apart. So reserv'd a way in them, made Warwick begin to hold both in Suspicion; but most of all Clarence, whose Forces were so near and in so good Order, that there could be no Excuse but in the Unpreparedness of his Mind.

K. Edward and the Duke of Clarence reconcil'd. The King therefore perceiving nothing could force Warwick upon uneven Terms to fight, march'd against Clarence, and as soon as he drew near, both Armies prepared for the Encounter: But as a Plot in a well-contriv'd Comedy is so cunningly wrought, that it discovers not it self till the last Scene, and then Expectation acknowledges her self deluded by Invention. So this Reconciliation between the Brothers agreed on long before, on the sudden now broke forth when all outward Appearances threaten'd Hostility. For the Duke of Gloucester and other Lords seeming to abhor the inhuman Nature of the prepared Battel, past often formally between the Brothers, and urg'd them by all Respects both Religious and Politick to prevent a Quarrel so ruinous and so scandalous to both; wherein the Triumph could not be but almost the Destruction of the Conqueror. After much Mediation and much seeming Reluctancy, that was in the end concluded, which had long before been resolv'd on: And the Duke of Clarence submitting himself to King Edward, brought with him all those Forces which upon Warwick's Reputation, much more than upon his own, he had rais'd. But that in this Agreement he might not appear to forget the Office of a Son-in-law and a Friend, he jointly with the King sent to intreat the Earl to enter League with them; for Confirmation of that Title which himself had first defended, and to avoid the Effusion of so much Blood as this Quarrel must necessarily draw. For Conditions he himself should set down his own, knowing he would be so rational in his Demands, as to require nothing above the Decorum of a Subject to ask, or a Prince to grant.

But Warwick had a Spirit too stubborn to bow to any Conditions, which himself had not been the first Proposer of; and as an injury threw back all Offers of Curtesie, and resolv'd to be reveng'd or die. And now too late he began to curse the Error of his Indulgency, which had added Power to these Brothers only for his own Destruction. From Edward he could expect no Safety, for he deserv'd it not; having cancell'd all former Obligations by his last Revolt, by which he forced him to so hazardous a Flight, and from George he could not look for a true Faith, considering that for the only Appearance of better Hopes he had heretofore broke it even with a Brother. And from both what thought of perfect Friendship, unless (and that his Nature could never suffer) he would fall beneath his former Height, in which should he continue, Suspicion would never let him remain secure from Danger. That Subject scarce ever having been reputed Innocent, in whose Power it was to be Nocent.

Whereupon K. Edward seeing himself by all the Charms of former Friendship and Promise of Future, unable to lay the Spirit that rag'd in Warwick, left him obstinate in the Prosecution of his own Designs: And accompany'd with his late reconcil'd Brother, and follow'd by a gallant Army march'd to London; where the Citizens out of Conscience of their late Oath taken so solemnly to K. Henry, and by the Instigation of the Duke of Somerset, Arch-bishop of York, and others of Warwick's Friends made some show of Resistance (c): But soon the Care of their own Safety absolv'd them from that Scruple, instructing them that Oaths by Fear extorted lay no Obligation upon the Soul (d). And with much Alacrity they yielded up to him their City, together with the Person of King Henry, who was reserv'd still to be made the Sport of Fortune, and again imprison'd in the Tower. For certainly History shows us not an Example of any Prince, who in so many Vicissitudes, never met with one

(c) The Arch bishop of York on the 9th of April brought King Henry out of the Tower, and carried him thro' the City to shew him to the Citizens, hoping that his Presence would confirm their Loyalty; but the Terror of King Edward's Approach with a mighty Army, drew them from their Obedience, and the Prelate was forced to come to a Treaty, and deliver up the Tower and the King, which he did the next Day.

(d) Philip de Comines writes with much more Reason than this Author has; for that he says, That the Citizens were engag'd in his Interest, by the Debts Edward ow'd them, and the Impunity of their Wives; for as to their Consciences certainly their First Oaths to King Henry justified their Second.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. fully to his Advantage: So that justly we might have condemn'd him for Unhappy, had he not been endued with such a Piety as raised him above his Fortune, and united him to God.

At (e) his Entrance into the City, as a general Applause entertain'd King Edward, all those Inhabitants who had secretly wished happy Success to his Affairs, now openly expressing their Triumph; so the Queen and those many of the King's nearest Followers, who for the Space of Six Months had secured themselves in Sanctuary, ran forth to congratulate their own, as well as his Happiness in his Restitution. And even in this general Alacrity concurred the Votes of many Merchants, Natives and Foreigners, who before had hated him and supplied King Henry with Money to his Destruction. For the King out of the Mildness of his natural Disposition, and a Desire that at this universal Triumph there should not be a sad look so much as among his Enemies, gave their Offences a general Pardon. Only letting them understand that he knew both the Value of his own Mercy, and of the Greatness of their Forfeitures, their aiding the contrary Faction having lost them their Estates and Liberties, and in Rigor their Lives. Neither was this an unhappy Policy in him, to oblige many by the forgiving that, the Extremity of which had he taken (his Business being then so unsettled) might have endanger'd a Mutiny in the City, upon the first Approach of the Enemy.

Having therefore by his happy Fortune comforted his Friends, and by his Clemency won upon the Affection of the Rest; and so settled the Town to his Obedience, that he suspected no Danger at his Back: He led forth his Army to oppose the Earl of Warwick, who having reunited his scatter'd Forces by easie Marches was come to St. Albans (f). The Reason of bringing his Power so near London was a Confidence he had, that his Reputation among the Inhabitants would draw many to his Part, or at least so divide them, that they should be no Advantage to the King: But the King jealous of their Levity, as one who had known them (how affectionate soever they pretended themselves to be to his Fortune) siding still with the Prevailer, interposed his Army between the (g) City and the Enemy, whereby he cut off even the Possibility of Intelligence: And that the Presence of King Henry might not be the Occasion of any Tumult in London, nor his Escape add Authority to Warwick's Quarrel, or hereafter endanger a further War; he took him to the Battel: Whereby the Poor distressed King, what Side soever prevail'd, was morally certain of Destruction.

Upon a Plain near Barnet mid-way between London and St. Albans the King pitch'd his Field. The Van-guard was commanded by the Duke of Gloucester, the Rear by the Lord Hastings, the main Battel by himself (h). The Common Soldiers needed no Incouragement of Words, (i) the great Examples of their Leaders was the best Oratory. And none of them but understood their Lives, Estates, and Liberties were at Stake: Their Prince, if over-thrown, every Day not unlike to produce new Troubles, and new Dangers; if Victorious, a full Conclusion of the War, with Wealth and Triumph.

On the other Side the Earl of Warwick with as bold a Resolution prepared his Forces. The Right Wing which consisted of Horse, he committed to the Earl of Oxford, in whose Company fought the Marquess Mountacute; the Left to the Duke of Exeter; and the main Battel which was composed of Bills and Bows (the best Sinews of our English Strength) to the Duke of Somerset: He himself giving Direction in every Quarter. And when he had survey'd his whole Host, and liked both their Order and their Courage, he sent away his Horse, resolving to fight on Foot, and that Day to try the utmost of his Fortune; prefixing to his Imaginations no Mean between Victory and Death. Then he lovingly imbraced all those great Commanders, in every of whom appear'd a Resolution equal to the Cause; and having by many Protestations declared their sincere Faith and Forwardness to the present Service, every Man betook himself to his several Charge. Nothing extraordinary to be observ'd in ordering the Field on either Side, but that neither George, Duke of Clarence, on K. Edward's Side, nor the Marquess Mountacute on the Earl's commanded any Way in chief that Day: So impossible it was to extirpate that Suspicion, which by their former Actions had taken Root in their Brother's Minds.

It was Easter-Day (k) in the Morning (a Day too sacred to be profaned with so much Blood) when both Armies prepared themselves to fight. That for the King took Courage from the Justice of their Quarrel, and the Fortune of their Prince. That of the Earl from the long Experience and noble Valour of their Leader, and from the Piety of him for whose Redemption that Day they had brought their Lives to the Hazard. Both fought for their Kings, both Kings having been crown'd, and by several Parliaments acknowledged. And indeed the Question was so subtil, that even among Divines it had held long, and at that Day remained not absolutely decided. No marvel then if the common Soldier had on both Sides the same Assurance of Truth, since if they have any, their Faith for the most is led by the Direction of their General. Both Armies therefore had equal Justice, which made them with equal Fierceness begin and continue the Fight.

Six Hours the Victory was doubtful, Advantages and Disadvantages indifferent on both Sides, till at length Error brought Disorder to Warwick's Army, and that a final Overthrow. For the Earl of Oxford (l) giving his Men a Star with Streams for his Badge, begot in the Army a Mistake that they were part of the Enemy whose Badge was the Sun: (which Mistake might easily happen by the thick Mist that Morning), wherefore being in the Right Wing, and pressing forward they were thought King Edward's Men flying, which made their own main Battel fall fiercely on them in the Back: Whereupon Oxford suspecting Treason in War-

A. D. 1471. *W*arwick (whose haughty and reserved Ways were ever liable to Suspicion) fled away with eight hundred Men, and King Edward with certain fresh Troops of Rutters for some such Purpose reserv'd, perceiving Disorder in the Enemy violently assaulted them, and soon forced them to shrink back. Warwick opposed against their Fear both with Language and Example; but when nothing could prevail, he rush'd into the thickest of the Enemies, hoping either his whole Army would bravely follow, or otherwise by Death to prevent the Misery of seeing himself overthrown. Mountacute perceiving how far into Danger his Brother was engaged, ran violently after to his Rescue, and both presently oppress'd with Number fell, and with them the Spirit of the Army, which thereupon immediately fled. In their Deaths they both clear'd those Calumnies with which they were blemish'd. Warwick of having still a swift Horse in readiness by Flight to escape from any apparent Danger in Battel; Mountacute of holding Intelligence with King Edward, or betraying at Pomfret the Quarrel of his great Brother. For that Story is to be rejected as a Fable forged by Malice, which Reports that the Marques having put on King Edward's Livery was slain by one of Warwick's Men, and that the Earl labouring to escape, at a Wood's Side where was no Passage, was killed and stripped to the naked Skin by two of King Edward's Soldiers. Yet both of them in their Deaths partaking with the common Condition of Men; the poor being ever esteem'd as vicious, the overthrown as Cowards. By which Judgment we impiously subject the Almighty Disposer of Human Affairs to our depraved Affections, as if Felicity or Infelicity were the Touchstone by which we might discern the true Value of the inward Man.

King Edward as soon as he saw the Discomfiture of the Enemy and certainly understood the Death of the two Brothers; that himself might be the first Reporter of his own good Fortune, with King Henry in his Company posted up to London. He came into St. Paul's Church at Evening Prayer, and there offer'd up his own Banner, and the Standard of the Earl of Warwick, the Trophies of his Morning Service, where waited on him an universal Acclamation, the flattering Shadow which never forsakes Victory. The dead Bodies of Warwick and Mountacute he caused to be expos'd three Days barefaced in St. Paul's Church, that no Pretences of their being alive might stir up any Rebellion afterward.

To the Duke of Clarence and the Duke of Gloucester was left the Care to Quarter the Soldiers, whose Enquiry soon found that on both Sides that Day were slain four thousand six hundred and odd. On the King's Side of Eminency only (m) the Lords Bourchier and Barnes, the former Son and Heir to the Earl of Essex, this last to the Lord Say: On the other Side were kill'd the Earl of Warwick and the Marques Mountacute attended with three and twenty Knights. The Duke of Exeter, who by his many Wounds was reported dead, recover'd Life, and got into Sanctuary at Westminster, but was never more seen in Action; his Body after some length of Time being cast upon the Shore of Kent, as if he had perish'd by Shipwrack: The Manner of his after-Life and Death left uncertain in Story. The Duke of Somerset and Earl of Oxford fled towards Scotland, but fearing that through the length of the Way they might fall into their Enemies Hands, they turn'd into Wales to Jasper, Earl of Pembroke.

To this violent End came the Earl of Warwick, the greatest and busiest Subject our latter Age hath brought forth. And indeed how was it possible such a stormy Life could expect a calmer Death? In his Spirit, Birth, Marriage, and Revenue he was Mighty, which raised his Thoughts above Proportion. For all these Benefits of Nature and Fortune serv'd him only as Instruments to execute his Rage; into which every small Displeasure taken or mistaken from his Prince, threw him head-long. His Bounty extended it self most in Hospitality, which was dangerous to the Guest, for his Meat was infected with the Poison of Faction. The open Aim of all his Actions was at the Publick Good, which made his Power still recover Strength, though so often weaken'd by evil Fortune; but his secret Intention was to advance his own Greatness, which he resolv'd to purchase tho' with Sale of the publick Safety. He was unquestionless Valiant, for a Coward durst not have thought on those Dangers, into which he entred upon the slightest Quarrels. His Soul was never quiet, distast'd always with the present Affairs; and his Pride like a foolish Builder, so delighted to pull down and set up, that at length part of the Frame himself had rais'd, fell upon him and crush'd him to Death. He was a passionate Extoller of Chastity in a Prince, which proceeded rather from Spleen than Zeal, because in that he tacitly made the King Contemptible for his voluptuous Life. Being bred up from a Child in Arms (the worst School to learn Religion in) he had certainly no tender Sense of Justice, and his varying so in approving contrary Titles, shew'd either a strange Levity in Judgment, or else that Ambition not Conscience ruled his Actions. The Pretences of his Revolt from King Edward, were neither to the World Politick nor to himself Honest. For what greater Hopes could he conceive by restoring a Family himself had ruin'd? Since Injuries make so deep an Impression, that no after-courtesie can take it away? Or how could any Violence offer'd to his Daughter's Honour by the King (for that was then by him pretended) License him to War? Since no Injustice in a Sovereign can Authorize the Subject to Rebellion. But who will give a true Account of his latter Attempts, must look back upon his first Familiarity with Lewis XI. For never had France such a Merchant to vent Disorder in Foreign Kingdoms, and buy up the Faith of all the greatest Officers to neighbouring Princes. But when by the most powerful Engines of Policy and War, he had screwed up his Intentions to the Highest, by making himself King in Authority though not in Title, the Crown being entailed upon the Two Princes, who had married his Daughters: Almighty God in one Overthrow ruin'd him, and permitted his Sons-in-Law, with their Wives not long after to end by strange Deaths, none of them answering his Hope, but the Younger Daughter and that preposterously to his Design. For she indeed by marrying Richard, Duke of Gloucester,

Of his Brother the Marquis Mountacute little can be clearly spoken: So reserv'd were his Imaginations and so obscure his Ways; especially to us who look on him so far off, and with so imperfect a Light. Neither of himself can he afford much History, having never been but Second in any Business of Moment; and like some poor Gamester seldom or never play'd his own Cards. He had certainly as much Valour and Dissimulation, as render'd him both a perfect Soldier and Courtier. He never miscarried in any Battel, till the last, in which he perish'd; so that indifferently we may ascribe to his good Conduct and Fortune, the Prosperity of his Success: His Affections being divided between a King and a Brother, made him suffer that Misfortune that ever attends Neutrality: Though indeed he may be rather said to have been for both, than either. His Nature was nothing so stubborn as his Brother's, which perhaps was bended to Plausibility, by the Dependances of his Fortune. The Deportment of Men seldom swelling to a distastful Pride, unless from the very Cradle flatter'd with Respect, without the Competition of an Equal. He abhorred Peace, whose strict Rules circumscrib'd him within the narrow Limits of his own Revenue, and lov'd War which called not his Expences to account, and equal'd, if not elevated him above those great Men, whom he must have envied in a quiet State. In a Word, the Dispositions of these two Brothers are best discovered to us by the King himself, of whom Warwick was still either esteem'd or hated, Mountacute lov'd or pittied.

The Affection which K. Edward bore Mountacute during Life, appear'd by the good Language he always us'd of him, even when in Arms against him, which perhaps occasion'd some Jealousie of his Faith in Warwick; and after Death in permitting his and, for his sake, his Brother's Body the Honour of a convenient Burial. For after they had both lain two or three Days barefaced in St. Paul's Church, exposed a Spectacle obnoxious to such Passions, as the Beholders were inclined to either by Nature or Faction; they were carried down to the Priory of Bisham in Berkshire, where among their Ancestors by the Mother's Side the Earls of Salisbury, the two unquiet Brothers rest in one Tomb.

Queen Margaret now when it was too late landed at Waimouth in Dorsetshire having in (n) her Retinue some few French Forces, the wary King Lewis loth to venture much upon an after-game of Fortune. And here when she expected the Acclamations of Triumph, she first received the News of Warwick slain and his Army defeated. Which to her Mind, prepared then to have received some Taste of Happiness, was so sad a Distraction, that she knew not which Way to direct her Resolutions, but her Courage failing her she swooned. At length Despair forced her to the common poor Refuge of Sanctuary. And in Bewly in Hampshire, a Monastery of Cistercian Monks she registred herself, her Son, and Followers for Persons privileged. To her in this Agony of Soul came Edmond, Duke of Somerset (who had escaped from the Overthrow at Barnet) with his Brother the Lord John Beaufort, John Courtney, Earl of Devonshire (Brother to Thomas, who being taken at Towton-Field was beheaded at York) Jasper, Earl of Pembroke (o) Younger Son of Owen Tudor by Queen Katherine Dowager, John Longstrother, Lord Prior of St. John's, (p) and John, Lord Wenlock, who had received his first Advancement to Honour by his great Services to King Edward, and now by the Folly of his Ingratitude, had linked himself to a ruinous Faction.

These noble Personages greater far in the Reputation of what they had, or might have been, than in their present lower, labour'd what they could by their Advice and Presence to raise up the Queen, sunk with the Weight of her Misfortunes. They related to her the Hopes she yet might retain in the Amity with France, and Authority she had in England: Multitudes yet surviving, whom if not Affection to the Title, the Smalness of their own Fortunes, and Safety of their Persons, would necessitate to take Arms. All Overthrows rather sowing, than taking away the Seeds of War. Neither if she look'd indifferently upon the last Battel, had she reason to be Disconsolate. For if she reflected on the Number of the Slain, it was not Considerable; or upon the Death of the General the Earl of Warwick, she might receive that Loss as a Benefit; he having been indeed a cruel Enemy, but never but an insolent Friend; whose Fortune had it continued Prosperous as it began, it might have been a Question whether the Duke of York's or his Usurpation would have been the more insupportable. They urged farther the Authority Somerset, Devonshire, the Lord Prior, and Wenlock had in England, and the Multitudes Pembroke might arm in Wales. But above all, what a Confluence of the boldest Youth there would be to the Prince, would he but take the Field, and appear in his own Quarrel. Nothing having advanced the Title of York, but March's Presence in all Battels, or foil'd the Reputation of Lancaster, but King Henry's unactive Piety, and fighting still by Deputies. The Soldiers thinking it in vain for them to hazard their Lives, where the Prince whom it concerns, timorously refuseth to venture his own.

But all these Arguments set off by the most persuasive Oratory, could not recover the sad Queen to a perfect Life in her Spirit. For either so many Disasters, and falling so thick together, made her despair of Success; or else the Soul before a great Mischief hath a certain divining Knowledge of future Accidents. And now she began to think that small Time her Husband had been re-invested in the Kingdom, was but a Lightning before the Death of all Sovereignty in his Family. Yet when she looked upon the Prince, hope flatter'd her Desires, that he might hereafter revive the Greatness of his Blood; but then the Memory of forepast Misfortunes, made her a melancholy Prophetests of future Ruin. Howsoever the Objects of her Thoughts were dismal, she dissembled them, and was as busie in all Politick Contrivances, and as forward in setting forth the Army as the most resolute Commander. (q) But when she perceived the Lords earnest to have the Prince present in the Battel, she violently opposed it, in respect of his Youth, want of Experience, and the so mighty Venture: For if he perish'd in this Storm, even Hope it self would in him be shipwrack'd. She therefore urged earnestly to have him convey'd back into France, where in Safety he might attend the Success of the present Enterprize, which if unprosperous, he might there remain, till by the Increase of Years and Power, he might be enabled to fight his own Quarrel. But the contrary Opinion overrul'd in her all the Passions, both of a Woman and a Mother; and having already lost so much at this Play of Fortune, she was perswaded like a desperate Gamester, to hazard at one Cast the Remainder of all her Stock.

Q. Margaret and her Son the Prince gather Forces.

Having therefore yielded to this Resolution, she leaves the Sanctuary and puts her self in Arms: The very Name of Prince Edward, like a Diamond, attracted Multitudes to the War. Her Companies immediately she advanced to Bath, where the Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Devonshire were high in Reputation, and by whose Authority daily new Forces came in to the Prince's Service. Yet were they not grown to so full a Number, as might encourage the Queen to think upon a Battel. Whereupon she keeps her self in the Town, until the coming of Jasper (r) Earl of Pembroke, upon the Addition of which Welsh Forces, she resolved to take the Field, and encounter King Edward.

K Edward speedily re-assembles his Army, and encamps at Marlborough.

Who as soon as he had perfect Intelligence of her Resolutions, gathered his Army together, which he (ever too confident of Peace, so amorously courted by him) had after the Victory at Barnet, licensed to disperse it self. And with so unexpected Suddenness he made his Preparations, that before the Return of Pembroke, he incamp'd at Marlborough, within fifteen Miles of Bath (s), and by the Interposition of his Army, hindered all Succours which could come to the Enemy from Wales. Which so near Approach distracted the Resolutions of the Queen, and made her suspect her Safety, if she remain'd longer there. Wherefore she retired to Bristol (t), from whence she sent to the Lord Beauchamp of Powyke, who had the keeping both of the City and Castle of Gloucester, to desire Passage over the Severn there, but he refused her, and forced her to march up to Temksbury, there to endeavour to cross the River.

Q. Margaret flies to Tewksbury, and is forced to engage King Edward.

In her Way thither, as she past by Gloucester, which in Discretion she durst not Assault, tho' by the former Discourteise provoked; he taking Advantage of the Place and some Disorder in the Queen's Rearward, fell suddenly upon it and carry'd away, after some Slaughter of the uncircumspect Soldier, much of her Artillery. This Loss troubled her a little, but when she found her self pursu'd by King Edward so close, that before she could reach Temksbury (u), he with his Horse were in Sight; Despair seiz'd her, so that she began only to look which way to flee. And indeed to that Extremity was her Business reduced, that there was left no other hope of Safety: The King having so much odds in Courage and Number. But the Duke of Somerset prevail'd against her Fears, and the sober Opinion of most of the best Commanders; upon which, neglecting to escape at first into Wales, where Pembroke had raised mighty Forces for her Service, she was soon by the King necessitated, either to yield or endure the Battel. Whereupon she resolv'd to fight it out that Day, which was the last, and that which decided the great Quarrel between the two Houses.

The Duke of Somerset pitch'd his Field in a Park adjoining to the Town, and entrench'd his Camp round so high and so strong, that the Enemy could on no Side force it; and when he perceiv'd an inevitable Necessity of present Fight, he Marshal'd his Host for the Service. The Foreward he and his Brother commanded, the Earl of Devonshire the Rear. In the main Battel was the Prince, under the Direction of the Lord Prior, and the Lord Wenlock. The Queen seeing the Hour draw near, and that there was need the Soldiers should have Advantage of Valour to equal the Enemy, who had it in Multitude, took the Prince with her and rode about the Army. In her Looks appear'd nothing but Life and Resolution, in her Language almost an Assurance of Victory; so cunningly she conceal'd the Wound her Despair had given her, that then only it bled inward. She told them, That it rested in their Courage that Day to restore their imprison'd King to Liberty and his Crown; and themselves not to Safety only, but to Honour and Treasure; for the Wealth of the rebellious Cities should be their Spoil, the Kingdom their Inheritance to be divided only among them, and all those Titles the Enemies so proudly wore, to be conferred upon their Deserts. If the Inequality of Number frighted them, she shew'd it was not such, but that they might be confident their great Hearts animated by the Justice of the Cause, would easily take away the Disparity. Then she wish'd them to look upon the Prince (whose Personage the fond Mother thought would make them like desperate Lovers entomn Danger) and fight for him their fellow Soldier, with whom they were to share in Fortune, and who once in Possession of the Throne, would never forget them, by whose Courage he was seated there.

The Soldier generally appear'd resolv'd against the sharpest Danger, receiving her Words with much Alacrity: And as soon as the Signal was given bravely repulsed the Duke of Gloucester, who having the leading of King Edward's Vanguard, had assaulted the Queen's Camp. Upon which Repulse, the Duke of Somerset seeing Gloucester retire with some Appearance of Flight (an Appearance indeed it was only to betray the Enemy) ran after so far in the Pursuit, that there was no Safety in the Retreat. Then did Gloucester on the sudden turn back upon him, and having by this Deceit

The Lord Wenlock who had the Conduct of the main Battel, and whom it concern'd to have reliev'd the Duke, only looking on as if he were a Spectator, and no Actor in the present Tragedy. Somerſet enraged with his Diſcomfiture, and having Wenlock's Faith in ſome Jealouſie; upon his eſcape back upbraided him with the moſt ignominious Terms of Cowardize and Treason, and transported by the Heat of Paſſion, with an Ax he had in his Hand ſtruck out his Brains. This Outrage begat nothing but Diſorder in the Queen's Camp; and ſo great grew the Confuſion, that no Man knew whom to obey, or how or where to make Reſiſtance againſt the aſſaulting Enemy. So unhappy is Government both in War and Peace, when all Authority is not conferred on one: A multitude of Commanders dividing the Obedience of the Inferior, and ever diſtracting Reſolutions among themſelves. Whereas Nature inſtructs us to a Subordination, and as in our own, ſo in a publick Body, it is monſtrous either to have no Head, or elſe to have more than one.

K. Edward conquers the Queen's Army.

He violates the Privileges of Sanctuary, and breaks his Promise.

Q. Margaret and Prince Edward taken.

K. Edward again breaks a ſolemn Promise.

The King took Advantage of this Uprore, and by it gain'd a moſt entire Victory; for entering without any Oppoſition the Queen's Trenches, he committed a moſt cruel Slaughter on all who reſiſted. Three Thouſand of the Common Soldiers (for they always pay for the Raſhneſs or Folly of their Commanders) were ſlain that Day, and among them the Earl of Devonſhire, the Lord John Beaufort, and ſome other Gentlemen of Name (*). The thick Woods of the Park preſerv'd ſome, and the Sanctuary others, but them only for a while; for King Edward who was never an overſcrupulous obſerver of religious Rites, with his Sword drawn would have entred the Church and forced them thence. But a good Prieſt careful to maintain the Immunity of the Place, with the Eucharift in his Hand, oppoſed the Violence and would not let him enter a Place ſacred to our moſt merciful God, until he had granted to all there his Mercy by a free Pardon. But this Pardon betray'd them, for on the Munday after they were taken out of the Church, and all beheaded in the Market-Place at Tewksbury (y). Among whom thoſe of principal Note were the Duke of Somerſet, and the Lord Prior of St. John's, and many other Knights of great Reputation and Fortune. By which Violation of the Sanctuary he made good the Opinion which the World before had conceived of him; that Religion never could prevail ſo far upon his Conſcience as to be any bar either to his Pleaſures or Revenge.

The Queen half dead in her Chariot was taken in the Battel (z), and not long after, the Prince was brought Priſoner to the King by Sir Richard Crofts, who taking Notice of the Proclamation, whereby the Reward of a Hundred Pound by the Year during Life was promiſed to whoſoever ſhould yield up the Prince's Body, dead or alive, to the King, (with Proteſtation not to offer any Violence to his Perſon if alive) brought him unhappily to his Death: Which when the good Knight afterward found, he repented what he had done, and openly profeſſed his Service abuſed, and his Faith deluded.

For King Edward preſently upon the Delivery of the Prince, cauſed him to be brought into his Preſence, and entertain'd him with ſome Demonſtration of Courteſie: Moved perhaps thereunto by the Innocency of his Youth, Compaſſion of his Miſfortune, or the Comlineſs of his Perſon, the Compoſition of his Body, being guilty of no Fault but a too feminine Beauty. At firſt it was ſuppoſed the King might have ſome charitable Intention, and reſolve happily to have ſettled him in the Dutchy of Lancaſter, his Father's Inheritance, a Patrimony too narrow for a King, and ſomething too large for a Subject; and for that End is ſaid to have enter'd Diſcourſe with him, to make Tryal whether his Spirit would ſtoop to acknowledge a Superiour. He therefore queſtion'd him what mad Perſwaſion had made him enter into ſo raſh an Enterprize, as to take up Arms againſt him, where the very Attempt was Rebellion, being againſt his Sovereign, and Folly being in Oppoſition to a Prince ſo far in Power above him? He expected an humble Answer, as if he were to beg his Life, or ſoft and gentle, according to the Complexion either of his Fortune or his Face. But he with a Reſolution (as bold as his Grandfather Henry the Fifth, would have replied with) answer'd, 'That to recover his Father miſerably oppreſſed, and the Crown violently uſurped, he had taken Arms. Neither could he be reputed to make any unjuſt Claim, who deſir'd no more than what had been poſſeſſed by Henry the Sixth, the Fifth and Fourth, his Father, Grandfather, and great Grandfather, Kings of England; and acknowledged by the Approbation not of the Kingdom only but the World, and even by the Progenitors of K. Edward.

The Prince's Answer to King Edward.

By the Spirit of which Language, when the King perceived how much his Life might threaten Danger, with a Look full of Indignation he turned from him, thruſting him diſdainfully away with his Gauntlet (a). Which ſo mighty Rage obſerv'd, and his ſo diſtemper'd parting out of the Room: The Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, the Marqueſs Dorſet, and the Lord Hastings, ſeiz'd ſuddenly upon the Prince, and with their Poniards molt barbarouſly murder'd him. Of whom we can make little Mention, his Youth having perform'd nothing worth Story, though it promiſed much. For under the Government of a Mother (the worſt Education for a Son) he had been bred up, until this laſt Scene of Life; which he acted alone, and bravely, ſo that Poſterity laments his Miſfortune yet, and applauds the Juſtice of the Almighty in Punishment of his Murders. For all of them came to violent Ends: Glouceſter being Executioner of the Reſt, and of him the Earl of Richmond, the next ſurviving Kinſman of the butcher'd Prince. The Severity of which Example, holds a Glaſs before the Eyes of the Wicked, and ſhows them how rotten is all that Greatneſs, which is not raiſed upon, and maintain'd by Vertue; and as the Conſcience is ever after ſuch a crying Sin, inwardly tortured upon the Rack of Fear; ſo ſeldom doth the Body eſcape outwardly an exemplary Death by Violence.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. King Edward returns to London, and carries Queen Margaret in Triumph. kers with the House of Lancaster, and the Surprise of the Queen her self: the King returned toward London (b): This being the only compleat Victory he ever gain'd, from which no Man of Eminency escaped; and no Man, who might pretend to a Competition, was now preserved except King Henry, and he issueless, and in Prison.

And to make this Triumph resemble something of the Roman, the King carried with him his great Captive the most afflicted Queen Margaret. A Woman most unfortunate to her self, and most ruinous to this Kingdom. For after her Marriage into England, soon finding her Husband's Weakness, safe however in being directed and strengthened by sober Counsel, she never left off inventing new Machinations till she wrought him into her sole Command, with the Destruction of his nearest Friends. So that to make the Prospect of her Greatness larger, she broke down and levell'd his strong Bulwarks. The Duke of Gloucester, which might perhaps a little check her ambitious Eye, being taken quite away, left her open to every Tempest. Having therefore by fomenting Dissension at home, lost (except only Calis) all our wide Territories abroad: By the Murther of the good Duke, her Husband's Uncle, she gave Liberty to the House of York, to make their just Claim to the Crown; and in the end to put her out of that Government, she preposterously managed. In her Prosperity, she was rather ambitious than wanton; though from the last Opinion did not absolutely acquit her. Which Asperision certainly was cast upon her, by Reason of her too intimate Familiarity with some of the younger and finer Lords: For the more discreet and aged, either dislik'd her Projects, or were dislik'd by her, as Persons too cautious to consult with a giddy Woman. Her mighty Confidence in the Duke of Suffolk, who wrought her Marriage with England, hath left the largest Part of that false Suspicion upon her Name.

For they who are just to her Memory, cannot but say, beside that she was religious, she was even too busie to think of Love Matters. But perhaps the Misfortune of her Carriage gave some small Occasion of the Report. Her prosperous Fortune presents her to us in the worst Colours a factious, busie, and imperious Queen. Her Adverse in the best, a most industrious Woman to recover what her Folly had lost, an excellent Wife, and a most indulgent Mother. And had she never appear'd in Action but when Misfortune had compell'd her to it, she had certainly been numbred among the best Examples of her Sex: But now the Merits of her latter Part of her Life, by redeeming the Errors of the former, serve only to level her with the Indifferent.

The Time she continued a Prisoner in England, she shewed us no Face but that of Desolation; the Strength of her Spirit, either broken in the Murther of her Son, or else she accounted it a needless Employment now to raise her self above her Sorrows. After some time, her Father, with the Sale (c) of much of that poor Estate, of which he remained yet in Possession, ransomed her for 50000 Crowns; whereby she was redeemed to another Air, tho' not to a freer Fortune. In Addition to her other Mileries, she was punish'd with a long Life, which she spun out sadly and ingloriously, living humbly upon the narrow Exhibition her Father did steal from himself to afford her. Her Life was much the Talk of the present and succeeding Times, because it concurr'd to the Destruction of the House of Lancaster, a Family beyond any then in the Christian World, both in Extent and Dominion, Greatness of Alliance, and Glory of Action. Her Death was so obscure (for who counts the Steps of the Unfortunate?) that it is not left certainly in Story when she died.

But King Edward, by her Misfortunes, reckoned his own Felicities; and now justly conceived himself secure in that Throne, he so passionately had endeavoured to sit at ease in. But because the Scene of his Fortune had had more Changes than any King in England yet, except his Competitor, he continued still with a most watchful Eye to look about him. And not knowing to how dangerous a Growth Enemies might arrive, which for the present appeared weak, he thought fit to take Order with Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, who remained in Wales, with a Power unable to offend the King, but able enough considering the Nature of the Place, to defend himself. Wherefore, that without a publick Trouble he might destroy so private a Person, he sent Roger Vaughan strong both in Kindred and Followers, with Commission by some Stratagem to entrap him. But the Earl had a Discovery of his Plot, and to deceive the Deceiver, seemed to give Opportunity for Execution of the Design; by which means he got Vaughan into his Possession, and presently caused him to be beheaded. But knowing this Act concurring with the whole Progress of his Life in Oppolition to the King, would bring him to Ruin, either by open Power or secret Practice, he resolv'd to sail over into Brittain, and under the Protection of that State to secure himself from the present Storm. With him he carried his Nephew Henry, Earl of Richmond, Heir of the Tudors Family by the Paternal, by the Mother's Side of the House of Somerset, for the Civil War had now destroyed all those great Dukes, who had with Loss of their Lives shewed their Devotion to King Henry, and left the Inheritance of their Honour, with a far more favourable Aspect to this young Earl.

By the Duke of Brittain, they were received not only with Promise of Safety, but with an Allowance of a Pension. Him perhaps the Consideration of the Instability of humane Affairs, moved to this noble Pity. But Peter Landois (the sole Director of the Duke, and a wicked Man) perswaded his Master to give them Entertainment out of a covetous Design one Day, to make a good Merchandize for himself by Sale of them into England.

Yet could not the King bring his Happiness to that Quiet he desired; some few small Drops fell upon him after the great Tempest: For (d) a base Son of William Nevill, Earl of Kent, (e) commonly known by the Name of the Bastard Falconbridge, having been employed

A. D. 1471. Vice-Admiral by the Earl of Warwick, during the late Combuſtions of the Kingdom, to hinder all Succours which might come from the Low-Countries to King Edward's Aid, ſoon as he underſtood the Earl's Death, ſet up for himſelf, and fell to Trade in open PyracY. His Conditions were ignoble as his Birth, and only can be ſaid a fit Inſtrument to move the baſer Multitude to Sedition. Between Dover and Calis he robb'd moſt, and had now got under his Command a Navy great enough to work Miſchief. Eſpecially having the chief Men of Calis (who had ſided lately with the Earl) of his Confederacy, and by that Means Safety upon all Occaſions in their Harbour. Gathering therefore into his Retinue many of thoſe who had eſcaped from the two former Overthrows, and preſuming upon the Affection of the Kentiſh and Eſſex Men, he ſailed up the River of Thames.

The Intention of his Arms he gave out to be for the common Liberty, and the Redemption of the King and Queen imprifon'd by an Uſurper. By which Pretence, ever powerful to incline the Vulgar to Sedition, he invited to the Quarrel ſo great a Multitude, that the Number was reckoned 17000 fighting Men; moſt of them the Dregs and Lees of former Rebellions: Such who having been heretofore on King Henry's Side, and wanting Courage to make good the Undertaking, had by Flight eſcap'd; or elſe Men whom Guilt of ſome enormous Diſorder had prepared for any Attempt; becauſe neither of them could hope to remain long ſecure from Punishment, when once the ſevere Eye of a peaceable Government, ſhould look narrowly into their Offences.

With this Army he march'd to Kingſtone hoping there to have croſſed the River, but being debarr'd, he led his Army into St. George's Fields, (f) and from thence with his Ordinance made ſome ſmall Battery on the City. And to ſtrike the more Terror, in the mean time he cauſed 3000 of his Men to be transported by Boat at St. Katherine's, to make an Aſſault on the other Side at Aldgate and Biſhopsgate. Who being ſet a Shore with a Courage as deſperate as their Quarrel, offered to force an Entrance, but by the Citizens were bravely repulſed. The Lord (g) Mayor and Aldermen, directed by the great Experience of the Earls of Eſſex and Rivers, and the Marqueſs Dorſet, neglecting no Part of the beſt Commanders. And ſo valiantly they purſued the Rebels (who ſoon began to ſhrink) that Falconbridge with much Difficulty recovered his Ships. For he over-confident of Succeſs, had commanded them to fall as low as the Downs, little fearing he ſhould ſo ſoon be forced to ſeek Safety at Sea, and having vainly deluded himſelf and his Soldiers with Expectation of great Forces from Wales under the Conduct of Jaſper, Earl of Pembroke. With much Danger of being deſtroyed at Black-beath, where, for a while he entrench'd, he got at length to Sandwich, and fortified the Place. Few of the Rebels, who had any weak Hope of Pardon, following their General upon a forc'd Retreat.

The Commons entring thus upon every ſlight Invitation into Rebellion, when the Preſervation or Reſtitution of King Henry was but mention'd, made the King begin to conſider how dangerous his Life was to the State; and that his Death would diſarm even the Hope of his Faction, for ever reflecting more upon the Wars. It was therefore reſolv'd in King Edward's Cabinet Council, that to take away all Title from future Inſurrections, King Henry ſhould be ſacrificed. For howſoever, ſome either to clear the Memory of the King, or by after Cruelties gueſſing at precedent, will have this Murther to be the ſole Act of the Duke of Glouceſter: I cannot believe a Man ſo cunning in declining Envy, and winning Honour to his Name, would have undertaken ſuch a Buſineſs of his own Council, (h) and executed it with his own Hands. Neither did this concern Glouceſter ſo particularly, as to engage him alone in the Cruelty; nor was the King ſo ſcrupulous, having commanded more unneceſſary Slaughters, and from his Youth been never any Stranger to ſuch Executions. In killing the Prince he had Clarence, Dorſet and Haſtings for his Conductors; and in the very Murther of his Nephews (which was the ſecuring his Uſurpation) he truſted Tyrrel: So confident had his innate Inhumanity made him, that he doubted not but others might be faithful in Villany. But the Death of King Henry was acted in the dark; ſo that it cannot be affirmed who was the Executioner; only it is probable it was a Reſolution of State. The Care of the King's Safety and the publick Quiet, in ſome ſort making it, however cruel, yet (i) neceſſary.

But that the World might not ſuſpect King Henry lived ſtill, and thereupon be ſtirred up to new Deſigns; he was no ſooner dead, but with ſome Show of Funeral Rites, his Body was brought into St. Paul's Church, where upon Aſcenſion-Day, with his Face uncovered, he was expoſed to the Curioſity of every Eye. For the King was reſolved rather to endure the Scandal of his Murther than to hazard the Queſtion of his Life, which continually gave Life to new Seditions. From St. Paul's next Day, the Corps obſcurely without any Ceremony (in thoſe Days with much Piety obſerv'd toward the Dead) was conveyed to the Black-Friers, and from thence by Boat to Cherſy, in Surry. Whence, after it had reſted ſome while, it was removed to Windſor, and there at length found Quiet. The King having even after Death partaken with the Troubles and Diſgraces of his Life.

The Reaſon of burying him thus in the Dark, I cannot gueſs to be any Diſreſpect to ſo great a Prince; but only to ſtop the Diſcourſes of the Commons, who always pity them dead, to whoſe Deaths their Votes concurr'd. Unleſs it be true what is commonly written, that the People began to cenſure hardly the King for his Death, becauſe at what time his Body lay in St. Paul's, and after in Black-Friers, a large Quantity of Blood iſſued from his Noſe. A moſt miraculous Way of ſpeaking the Barbariſme of his Murther, and giving Tyrants to underſtand that the Dead dare in their Language tell the Truth, and call even their Actions to Account. For this manner of bleeding was never obſerved to happen, but when againſt Law, Nature had been oppreſſed with Violence, and ſeemed to challenge Juſtice.

With what Aſpect he entertain'd his Fate, I cannot write: But well we may believe, he could not but ſmile upon Death, who by a continual Exerciſe in Vertue, from his very Infan-

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. cy had triumph'd over Sin, which only makes Death Formidable to a Christian. Of his outward Actions, all good Men of that Time took a reverend Notice; especially of his due Observation of all the Laws of the Church, his exemplary Piety, Humility beneath the State commonly used by Princes, and a Modesty even to Admiration. But they were the Vertues, which crowned the first part of his Life, which was past over in a full Prosperity, and appertain not to my Story. His Misfortune and Death only fall to my Task. And in his Misfortune he expressed so singular a Fortitude, that he was never observ'd to be dejected upon the Report of any sad Accident. But entertain'd all Afflictions as sent from the Almighty, and absolutely resign'd his Will to that of Heaven. How innocently he spent the last Ten Years of his Life, which was in as much Adversity as ever Prince suffer'd, his ghostly Father gave a happy Testimony: Affirming that in all that long Trial of the inward Man, he never in Confession could accuse himself of any actual Sin. His Employment was Prayer, and his Recreation only pious Discourses which perswaded Man to set a true Value upon heavenly Things, and throw a just Contempt upon the World. And to such Reputation the Sanctity of his Life arriv'd among the common People, that after his Death they honour'd him with the Devotion due to a Saint. And King Henry the Seventh (who owed the highest Opinion to his Holiness, because he had fore-possessed he should enjoy that Crown for which the two Houses then so much contested) labour'd his Canonization with the Pope, but that succeed- ed not; for however the World was assur'd of his Piety, there was much Question of his Government: So that he might be term'd a just Man, but an unjust King. Since his Title to the Crown was unjust; for though it came by Descent to him, yet was it but a continued Usurpation: His Reign was guilty, I will not say through his Demerit, but thro' his evil Fortune, of much Mischief, and the Effusion of a Sea of Christian Blood: And however in the Contemplative Part he was Religious toward God, in the Active he was Defective to the World: So that to have made him worthy that Honour Henry the Seventh would have provided for him, he must either (being resolv'd in Conscience his Title was just) have fully perform'd the Office of a King; or knowing it questionable have submitted it to be disputed freely, and upon the Resolution made Resignation of what he unlawfully possess'd. But Justice which commands any Diminution of Greatness, is seldom obey'd by Princes, and Death only makes them surrender up what was violently by their Progenitors usurped, and unjustly by themselves continued, for till Death, Ambition betrays the Conscience, and Fear of being less makes it not dare to see the Truth, which perswades to Restitution.

Falcon-bridge in Sandwich submits to the King.

King Henry thus taken away, the Forces under Falconbridge's Command, which before had the specious Title of a just War, could now pretend to nothing but an unjust Sedition. And so low they fell both in Courage and Reputation, that all they intended was but to make show of War, whereby the easier to work their Peace: No Man of Name or Power, who before secretly had favoured them, but openly protested against the Enterprize. In Sandwich Nine Hundred of them remained, till they certainly understood the King's Approach with a mighty Power; then they sent forth Sir George Brooke, to acquaint his Majesty with their Desire to return to his Obedience, if they might by his Pardon be secured of their Lives and Liberties. They protested it was no Fear or present Necessity induced them to this Submission, having Confederates enough Abroad to relieve them upon Extremity, and for the present Victuals for Six Months, and Ammunition to oppose any Assault. If this Offer might be accepted, they would give up with themselves, the Town and Castle, together with all the Shipping in the Harbour; if not, Necessity would force them to their own Defence. And if they must die, they would sell their Lives at so dear a rate, that the King might repent his Purchase; considering he had kill'd so many, who would have been as bold to have fought his Quarrel, and lost so good Shipping, and so commodious a Haven-Town; for they were resolv'd to see both consum'd with themselves, that the Victory might be no Triumph to the Conqueror, and the Conquer'd might have that Comfort in their Ruin.

The Proposition was accepted by the King, and the Duke of Gloucester (whose Wisdom and Valour had wrought him high in the Opinion of the King) was sent with a general Pardon to the Rebels, and Authority in the King's Name to receive the Town, the Castle, and all the Shipping in the Harbour.

But the King who never let any Pardon be an Impediment to his Purpose, having them in his Power, caused the Laws severely to proceed against them. And for the Example of the rest, Spicing and Quintin (two of the chief in this Rebellion) were executed at Canterbury, and their Heads set upon those Gates, which at their last being at London, they so furiously assaulted. And that the King might not only draw Blood, but Treasure from this Business, a Commission of Oyer and Terminer was directed to the Lord Denham, and Sir John Fog, to inquire against all Offenders in the last Rebellion, and to inflict on them either corporal or pecuniary Punishment. But the Commissioners who understood both the Necessity and Intention of the State, made rather choice of the latter, knowing Death would but incur the Censure of Cruelty, and no way advance the King's Benefit. Whereas great Fines weaken as much the Discontented, and make the Prince as secure from Danger, even with the Reputation of Clemency.

And that Falconbridge the first mover of this Sedition might have no more Privilege than his Complices; coming into Southampton he was apprehended and put to Death. The inserting of his Name in the former Pardon, though often pleaded by him, serving only to make him suffer the same Execution with the rest.

The Punishment of these succeeding so well, the King proceeded against others. And first against the Arch-bishop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, who with his spiritual Authority had set a Gloss of Religion upon all the latter Attempts. And by his working inclin'd the Commons of the North to so constant a Resolution for King Henry. With him the King took Order, because he found his Ambition irregular, and sent him to be kept Prisoner in the Castle of Guisnes. Where deservedly he endured a long Restraint, and never attain'd Liberty till Death enlarg'd him. No Man afforded the poor Comfort or Pity to his Affliction, because in his Prosperity he had been Insolent and Factions.

A. D. 1471. Reg. 11. The Manner of the Attachment was, according to the Custom of the King, unfaithful. For having admitted the Archbishop, after Barnet-Field, not only into Favour, but a special Familiarity; as he was hunting with him near Windsor, he promised to come to More-Park, (a Place in Hartfordshire, which was not long before purchased, and built up most commodiously by the Archbishop) and there to hunt with him; with this Caution, that there might be nothing but a liberal Mirth, and friendly Entertainment. With much Complacency, the Archbishop retired to his House, joyful to see the King so free in his Affection, without Memory of former Discontents. And that the Entertainment might not be altogether beneath the Majesty of his Person, against the King's coming, beside all costly Provision, which the Shortness of the Time could make; he had gathered together of his own and his Friends, Plate and other rich household Stuff, to the Value of 20000 l. Next Day expecting the Presence of the King, on the sudden, Sir William Par, Knight, and Master Thomas Vaughan entered the House, and by Vertue of a Commission to that Purpose, confiscated all those Goods to the King's Use; and having arrested his Person and sent that to Prison, seized upon all his Estate both Temporal and Ecclesiastical: The former forfeited for ever, the latter during the Archbishop's Life.

The Earl of Oxford fortifies St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, and held it out against the King. The Crime objected against him was Treason, for secretly aiding the Earl of Oxford, who at that Time had fortified and held St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, ever since Barnet-Field. For the poor Earl seeing the whole Island lost from the House of Lancaster (in whose Defence he had been so constant) and all the great Favourers of the Quarrel destroyed; having no Place of Safety to shelter himself abroad, took this Corner of the Kingdom, and endeavour'd to make it good. But this was but the Enterprize of a desperate Man; for all his Hope this way could be only to prolong a wretched Life without Servitude. As for Liberty he was his own Goaler, and his Fortrefs his Prison. The whole Number of his Soldiers were but 70, scarce enough for his Retinue. Yet with these he managed his Business so happily, that though besieged, he revictualled the Place, and made his Defence good some Months. But when Richard Fortescue, Esq; of the Body to the King, (k) and then Sheriff of the County, came down, and by open Offer of the King's free Pardon to all the Earl's Men, and secret Practising, had wrought them to his Purpose; the Earl was forced to yield, and with him the Lord Beumont, Two of the Earl's Brothers, and Thomas Clifford; all Persons of great Name and Quality. The King receiv'd them to Mercy, as far as their Lives were concern'd: But for their Estates (for now he began to husband his Victories to the Benefit of his Treasury) he confiscated them wholly; not allowing the disconsolate Countess any Part of her Joynture. In-fomuch, that during the Life-time of King Edward (for all that while was the Earl kept Prisoner near Calis, in the Castle of Hames) she was forced to live upon the Courtesie of her Friends, a kind of better Sort of Alms.

A. D. 1472. Reg. 12. All now were reduced to Order, except the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke; and them the King laboured to fetch in: For now either his Nature was altered to a strange Mistrust, which in his Youth had been so taxed of an uncircumspect Confidence; or else he began to be governed by a Council of a more wary Judgment, and whose Sight could discern Danger afar off. And certainly, who compares the first and last Times of the King's Government, shall perceive a strange Difference in the Policy; unless in those Affairs wherein he obeyed his own Direction, and in them remain'd a Tincture of his natural Error. The Change of Government may be ascribed to the Duke of Gloucester, a Man whom the Conscience of his own Infidelity, made jealous of the Faith of others; who thought no Enemy alive and with Liberty, but full of Danger, how weak soever his Power or Pretence might be; and who at this Time held the Stern of the Council, while the King at Pleasure wanton'd in his Cabin. By his Advice Commissioners were sent over to the Duke of Brittain, in whose Dominions the Earls remained, to expostulate the Injury of giving Entertainment to any Evil-affected to the State of England. Pembroke having been upon all Occasions an open Rebel, and Richmond only wanting Age to take Arms, and who shortly appeared to threaten no less Dangers. They desired him 'as he respected any Confederacy with England, and the Common Policy of Princes, not to disoblige the King by harbouring his Enemies, and succouring such who could bring nothing but Ruin to their Abettors: Neither to prefer Faith with Two miserable Exiles, before Love to a Prince, who had both the Power and Intention to join with him in any War, that might tend to the Safety or Honour of his Dutchy. They concluded with an earnest Request, 'That he would deliver up into their Hands the Two Fugitives, that such Order might be taken as was safest for the present State. Or if the too scrupulous Observance of an Oath perplex'd him, that at least such Care might be had, that they might neither attempt Confederacy abroad, or a Power to enable them to return home.

The Duke made Answer, 'That in Point of Honour he could not condescend to the King's first Demand; having upon their Arrival there given them his Word. But for the second Part, he would beyond the King's own Desire consult for the Safeguard of his Majesty, and restrain them from any Power to attempt new Enterprizes. And perhaps, as it would preserve his Reputation clearer to the World, so would it more advance the King's Purpose to let them remain in Brittain, rather than to have them returned into England; considering, at Home they had a great Kindred, and by the Slaughter of the rest, were grown chief of the Faction of Lancaster: Whereas, if they continued with him, they should be in a free but a safe Custody, in a Country where they were so far from Power, that they wanted Acquaintance: And that himself would narrowly look that no discontented Persons should resort to them, or that they should make their Addresses to any other Prince. Whereupon he entreated his Majesty to consider him as a Confederate most religious in Maintenance of that Amity, heretofore so happily begun, and hitherto so faithfully maintained.

With this Answer the Ambassadors return'd, and the Duke made good his Promise to the

A. D. 1472. King. For presently he removed all their English Servants, and set Brittain's to attend them, who did rather observe than serve them: Men who cunningly mark'd, not only who made their Dependencies upon them of the English, or with what People they held Intelligence, but even their Looks, and sent the Copy of them into England, oftentimes with a false Interpretation. Then (that Two together might not animate each other, and enter into dangerous Counsels) they were kept divided, and all Communication either by Language or Letter, absolutely forbidden. And (that both being in the same Restraint, might not conspire to the same Escape) there was a Guard set upon them, who narrowly, tho' respectfully watch'd them. So that we may guess this great Care the King took for their Restraint, to have wrought a strange Effect. Richmond esteeming himself more considerable as he was more suspected; and by the Fears of the King making Valuation of his own Pretences. Great Thoughts crept into his Mind by the Circumspection of such great Princes; and the Vulgar both abroad and at home began to believe (for they always think there are strange Depths even in the Shallows of Princes Actions) there was much Mystery in Richmond's Title, and Danger in his Liberty. Whereas had he lived unsuspected by the King, he had perhaps died unobserv'd by the World.

By this Negotiation with Brittain, having secured himself of these Two Earls, who might endanger the Quiet of the Kingdom at Home, he began to look abroad, whither yet he had never Liberty to cast his Eye: His Pleasures, or Dangers hitherto so taking up his Time, that he had only served his Appetite, or Safety; but now he had quieted all Civil Troubles, and even rooted up the very Fear of War hereafter; he therefore thought it necessary to look first upon France, a Nation which had made Benefit of our Ruin; and while we busied our Thoughts and Courage in Destruction of each other, recovered so much Life, that they were grown dangerous. Of their farther Growth the King was fearful, and resolv'd, if he could not make them less, at least to keep them at a Stay. Whereupon, having Intelligence of a Marriage in Agitation between Duke Charles (Brother to Lewis XI and then Heir apparent to the Crown) and the Daughter and sole Heir of Charles, Duke of Burgundy, he endeavoured by all Arts to break off the Treaty. For he considered how formidable the French would grow to our Kingdom, should the so large Territories of the Seventeen Provinces with the other Dominions of the Duke be added to them. How they would then be enabled to revenge those many Injuries the Fortune of our Victories had done them, when we should be left to our own Arms, the Burgundian (by whose Aid we had enter'd and conquer'd France) now prepared to war upon us. How France superior always to the English in Multitude, and Extent of Territories, and defective only in commodious Havens, would by this be enlarged with a mighty Sea Coast, and with as good Men for Navigation as the World then had; by which they would have absolute Command at Sea, and keep us within the narrow Limits of our Island: If they would permit us that. These Considerations made the King solicit both the Duke of Brittain and the Count St. Paul (the Two earnest Mediators for Duke Charles) to desist from farther Negotiation in the Marriage. Brittain he moved to reflect upon his own Danger, if Charles should survive King Lewis, as by Course of Years it was probable, and have so great an Empire under his Command, telling him, That greater Princes, like greater Rivers swallow up the less, and after a while retain no Memory of them. And if he presumed upon the Friendship between him and Duke Charles, and the many Courtesies done him, it was a treacherous Hope that never yet kept Faith. That Brittain never enjoyed all the Privileges appertaining to the Dutchy, but when France was disabled to break them.

With the Count St. Paul he dealt another Way, by representing to him, The near Friendship that ought to be between them Two, in Respect of the so near Alliance, being Uncle to his Queen; by which he entreated him not to urge a Business so prejudicial to the Crown of England, which in a near Degree concern'd his own Blood. Withal he advised him, to take Care of himself, and not to exasperate too far King Lewis, to whom the Treaty of this Marriage was most displeasing; in Regard to the Safety of his own Estate. To foment Discord between Brothers, being injurious to Religion, and unsafe to Policy: For Nature reunites them, and throws both their Malices on him, who occasioned the first Breach; and so he for the most part is yielded up a Sacrifice to the Reconciliation. He concluded, with the Madness of his Actions, who would provoke the just Anger of so subtil, and so revengeful a Prince, for the frail Amity of so weak and inconstant a Man as his Brother Duke Charles, who so often had been entrap'd.

From both these Princes he received such Answer as shewed they resolv'd to prosecute their Design, but not to have him suspect it; giving fair Protestations of their Desire to be overruled by the King's Direction. But neither of them understood the Business to be of that dangerous Nature, as it was conceived in England. For tho' King Lewis had no Son at that Time, yet was there every Day Expectation he might have; the Queen likely to conceive, and Lewis in much Health and Strength of Body. And indeed, soon after a young Dauphin was born, who succeeded in the Kingdom. Moreover they considered the Malice between the Brothers grown to that Height, that all Attempts of Reconciliation was needless; and that there was no such certain Way to maintain a general Dissension in France, as by enabling Duke Charles with a Power to make good the former Contestation. Nothing likely to incline him to seek Friendship with his Brother, but being disabled to continue an Enemy.

The King suspecting the Reality of their Intentions, and being resolv'd upon any Terms to prevent the Marriage, had in his Determination to have forgot all former Discontents justly conceived against King Lewis in abetting the contrary Faction of Lancaster, and to have enter'd into a particular League with him against the Duke of Burgundy: But before he would make the Overture, he tried by his Ambassadors to know the certain Resolution of the Duke himself, who had in the Marriage of his Daughter always held his Thoughts apart from the World. And in Truth the End of his Intentions was to keep all neighbouring Princes in Expectation, but to conclude with none. For at the same time when Duke Charles had so many underhand Promises, with the self-same Hope did he entertain Maximilian, Son to the Emperor Frederick the Third, Nicholas, Duke of Calabria, and Philibert, Duke of Savoy. His Ambition being to create many Dependancies upon himself, and never to marry her to no Man, unless he should be forced to it by some evil Fate in War,

Reg. 12. Much importun'd by the English Ambassador to give his Resolution, and not knowing to what Danger the King's Suspicion might grow, or to what new Leagues it might incline him; he answer'd him faithfully that he intended no such near Alliance with Duke Charles. And that all those Appearances of Treaty were only to retain him in Discord with his Brother, who otherwise might chance to be reconciled, and hazard to destroy that Faction, which the Necessity of his Affairs did inforce him to advance. He desir'd therefore the King not to listen to every false Suggestion, but to believe he would do nothing in so material a Point, without much Advice, and Care had for Satisfaction of so great a Confederate, and so near an Allie.

This so absolute Resolution of the Duke took away the former Jealousie, which soon after would howsoever of it self have vanish'd. For Duke Charles not without a strong Suspicion of Practice in King Lewis, died of Poison, and so fixed a Period to those many civil Wars which had distracted the State of France, and to all those busie Ambitions, which had so much disquieted his own Content.

A. D. 1473. At Home the King was continually stung by a Swarm of Creditors, who during his late Troubles had supplied him with Treasure, and for whom Gratitude did oblige him to provide Repayment. He found his Exchequer empty, and a Necessity to desire the Commonalty to contribute with their Purfes that many of his best Friends might not be ruin'd. He therefore summon'd a Parliament to be held at Westminster, wherein though the Reformation of Abuses, and enacting Laws wholesome for the present Time was pretended, a liberal Subsidy was the Aim. But in the Beginning all those Acts which had been heretofore made during the first part of King Edward's Government, and abrogated by King Henry the last Parliament when for a Time he was restored, were reviv'd and enacted to continue in full Force for ever: And whatever other Statutes were made by King Henry, repealed. By Vertue of which Acts all the Nobility who had adhered to the House of York, and had been for that Attainted, were restored in Blood and to their Patrimonies; and all of the contrary Faction found Guilty of high Treason, and their Estates confiscated to the King. Then for Relief of the King's great Necessities (for all those so mighty Fortunes serv'd only to reward the Multitude of his Adherents) a full Subsidy was granted; In Recompence of which he gave them a general Pardon. And indeed by that, liberally repaid them; for by the late Civil Wars, the Lapse into Treason was so universal, that scarce any Estate could be safe if License were given to Informers, the Cormorants of a Commonwealth, who swallow much, but seldom or never grow Fat; and least of all Advance that they most pretend, the King's Benefit.

Some few Days before the Parliament began, Lewis de Bruges a Netherlander, Lord of Gruuthuse and Prince of Steinhuse came over into England, who was receiv'd by the King with all the Demonstrations of Amity: And on the Thirteenth of October in the Parliament-Chamber created Earl of Winchester, receiving with the Title the Ancient Arms of Roger Quincy, heretofore Earl of the Place, with Addition of the Coat of England in a Canton. The Reason of this so extraordinary Favour conferred upon a Stranger, was the much Application of Respect he made to King Edward, when by the prevailing Fortunes of the Earl of Warwick, he was forced to flee for Refuge under the Protection of the Duke of Burgundy. For he being a Nobleman of that Country, compos'd himself totally to comfort, the King distracted with his present Affliction.

Soon after him, the Parliament being newly ended, came Ambassadors from the Low-Countries; who, after the first open Audience, (wherein for the most part pass'd only the Complement of Princes) being admitted to the King and some few Lords most intimate to the King's Resolutions, spoke to this Purpose.

May it please your Majesty,

WE are sent by our great Master the Duke of Burgundy upon an Embassy, that may prove strange at the first Apprehension, and even in it self Contradictory. To Congratulate your Majesty the Glory of that Peace you enjoy, and to invite you from it, to a new War. But Glory is like Time, everlastingly in Motion, and when it stops it ends.

Your Majesty hath by the happy Conduct of your Power and Fortune, restored the Kingdom to it self: That was an Act of Necessity. For you could not be your self, if your great Enemies had not been reduced to nothing. Now as great a Justice doth invite you to the Recovery of a larger Kingdom. Which we know your high Spirit cannot refuse to undertake, least the World have just Reason to suspect you took Arms to live, not to reign. For if your Title to the Crown of England be just, as Man did always allow in Judgment, and Almighty God hath approv'd in the Success; the same Title is good to the Crown of France: Both having been united into One ever since the Usurpation of Philip de Valois.

The People's Affection to Princes of their own Nation enacted an injurious Law; that authoriz'd Injustice, and confirm'd the Sovereignty in the Heirs-Male. The Female were excluded, as if the Distinction of Kind could make a Difference in Right, and the being born a Woman were to be born illegitimate; for the Law Salique in a Manner bastardizeth the whole Sex.

Your great Ancestor Edward the Third, whose Name and Magnanimity you inherit, with his Sword abrogated this Law: And called the Law-makers to a severe Account at Crecie and Poitiers, where more Veins of France were open'd, and more Blood issued, than any Time records, considering the small Numbers of the English. In the latter of the two Battels John, Son to Philip of Valois, labouring to make good the Pretensions of his Father, was taken Prisoner, and so continued less then a free Subject, by endeavouring unjustly to be a Sovereign.

The little Handful of Men with which the English then oppos'd the vast Armies of the French, not only showing the high Advantage the Nation hath in Courage; but the miraculous Justice of the Almighty, who delights to make the Destruction of usurpers, his own Work, and not to permit Man by his Power to rival Heaven in the Punishment.

Your Majesty needs not History to perswade you to the Quarrel, or Example to assure you of the Success. The Justice of the Claim will easily prevail with you to draw again your Sword, which hath been hitherto almost ever unsheathed in Vindication of your Right; Vol. I. N n n 2 and

A. D. 1473. Reg. 13. and that with so much Prosperity, that they who admire your Valour and Direction, applaud your Fortune.

But if the Nature of Man, delighted in the Felicities of Peace, should advise your Majesty to satisfy your Mind with the Triumph of those Victories you have already purchased; Yet neither a just Revenge, nor discreet Policy will admit it. For how can England remain safe from future Injuries, and acquit her self in Honour against those who have heretofore affronted her; if France, where all the late Combinations were first conceived, remain unpunish'd?

The huge Body of the Civil War lies now a dead Trunk, wounded to Death by your Arm, but yet Lewis of France, the Head of that Monster, tho' contrary to the ordinary Course of Nature, retains still a Life, and quickens Mischief hourly against this Kingdom; least otherwise his own be not secure. And should your Majesty out of Desire to avoid the further Effusion of Christian Blood, permit him to continue in the unjust Possession of a Kingdom, he would interpret his Safety and your Mercy to be either a blind Ignorance, or a degenerate Fear: And from your Lenity draw the Boldness to prepare new Troubles against your Quiet.

And if it be not an over-much Care in a Confederate and an Allie, to make so narrow a Scrutiny into your Majesty's Affairs, our Master believes that this War will not be unnecessary for the present State of England. In regard this Way those many evil Humours, gather'd in the Body of the Kingdom by the late Disorders, will be easily purged away, or at least diverted. Seeing Experience teacheth us how impossible it is, for a Nation nursed in Civil War, suddenly to embrace a Peace, and endure a severe Government. And should the Discontented not vent themselves thus Abroad, how dangerous it might make the Dispute at Home, is easie to be conjectured.

But all this shows only the Justice and Necessity of your War: Preparations great enough to oppose a King of France, yet we have not touch'd upon. And that indeed is it, our Master gave us in our Instructions most to acquaint your Majesty withal: As by which it will be most apparent, how without any Reflection upon his own Occasions, he invites you to this Undertaking. For his Highness understands how far this Overture lies open to a false Interpretation, considering his Enmity with King Lewis; did not the Circumstance of the Business show how your Majesty is rather desir'd to a Triumph than a Battel.

Never had France so many Enemies so powerfully united, and never so few Friends, if she may be said to have any. For except only the poor Duke of Lorraine, who happily may be a Burthen, never an Aid to any Prince; we can hardly reckon a Confederate. For so treacherous have been all King Lewis's Arts, so dissembling his Nature, that the World hath concluded it much safer to be at Enmity with him, than upon the fairest Terms. His Friendship having ruin'd some, his Arms never any Man.

In Confederacy with our Master, and in absolute Resolution to invade France, are the Duke of Brittain and the Count Saint Paul. Brittain able of his own Subjects to bring a powerful Army into the Field, Saint Paul by his Kindred and Intelligence to cause a general Revolt of all the Nobility from the King.

And indeed, such hath been the Character of that politick Prince (for that Epithete his poor Shifts have got him) that a continual Contempt hath been thrown by him upon the great Lords, and a most near Familiarity enter'd into with the basest People. His Barber being more acquainted with the Affairs of State, than the whole Body of his Council. This preposterous Course of Favour, hath made the greatest States of the Kingdom scorn their present King, and reflect upon your Majesty, whose Comportment in War and Peace hath been such as justly makes your Triumph in the general Affections of your many Friends, and utter Destruction of your Enemies.

If it may therefore please your Majesty to admit of that Greatness your high Descent hath Title to, and your Predecessors have had Possession of: The Arms of these great Princes are prepared to serve you. Our Master first honoured your Majesty as a potent Neighbour, great in your self as in Dominion. Then by Marriage he grew into the nearest Degree of Correspondence; the Title of Brothers, (a Ceremony used between Princes) being of due in Alliance between you Two: Lastly, He had the Happiness which Potentates seldom have (tho' with some Trouble to your Majesty) to enjoy entire Familiarity: By which those other Respects, common among Persons of like Quality, and which are often but weak Ties of Amity, are converted into a perfect Friendship. So that the Desire his Highness hath to advance your Majesty's Glory and Command, proceeds only from Love to the Posterity of your Person, and just Claim. With how powerful Forces he will concur to this great Action, hath been of Purpose omitted: Because the World hath had sufficient Testimony, how able his Highness hath been to oppose, if not oppress, King Lewis without borrowing Aid from a Confederate. He therefore intreats to know your Majesty's Resolution, whether you will pass over and personally make your own Claim to the Crown. Your Majesty's only Presence being of Power to raise a fuller Army in the very Heart of France, than yet ever King of England led to conquer France.

This Overture took generally with the great Lords, who in their Infancies by their Nurses having been told no Stories but of our Triumphs in France (and those Tales imprint deeply in the Memory) and now for many Years ever acquainted with the Wars at Home, embraced Danger as the only Means to Honour. Moreover an Appetite of Glory, mingled with a Noble Emulation of the Powers of their Fathers, made every Man of Name thrust forward to this Action. Neither were the more Covetous backward, considering they were to War with a richer, and a more effeminate Nation; and not unlikely to return laden with Spoil, if not to remain there in a fertile and a pleasanter Country. The Soldier, who was in a manner all the Gentry of the Land (for the Civil Wars had engaged them all to the study of Arms) relish'd this Business more than the great Lords. For they, having been bred up in the free License of War, abhorred to be circumscribed within the narrow Bounds of the Laws, which never have absolute Power but in Peace. So that the whole Body of the Kingdom passionately affected the Quarrel, and by their universal Acclamations in Praise of it, per-

Reg. 13. Whereupon sending for the Ambassadors, he showed his Resolution to the War, which he would undertake in Person, and that very Spring (for it was now presently after Christmas) transport his Forces into France. He desired therefore to understand, in what readiness the Duke of Burgundy had his Army, and where he would appoint the Place for the English to join, and which way should first be taken. To which the Ambassadors made answer, That the Duke had his Forces so well prepared, that if the King would nominate a certain Time when he would be at Calis; the Duke would be sure three Months before to waste the whole Country belonging to the French, and to have his Men so expert, that they should be able to instruct the English, unacquainted with the Place. And as for Transportation of his Soldiers they desired his Majesty not to trouble himself, in regard his Highness would provide Boats for that Purpose. Then that the King might perceive how faithfully the Duke dealt with him, they showed the Articles agreed upon between the Dukes of Burgundy, Brittain, and the Count St. Paul, to join in a War offensive against King Lewis; as likewise a Catalogue of the Names of all the great Lords of France, who held secret Intelligence with them, and who would revolt from the French King, as soon as the Duke's Army took the Field.

The Confederacy against France shew'd K. Edward.

Duke of Brittain rejoiced in the Confederacy of K. Edward keeps up his Resolution to invade France.

King Edward's Ambition to conquer France, and the English antipathy against the French.

The Reason why the English are always ready to War with the French.

With this so satisfactory Answer, the Ambassadors returned to the Duke, who in this attained the Ambition of many Years working. For all the Fear which troubled his busy Mind was, lest King Edward won by the Practices of King Lewis, might be induced to side with France, or else to remain a Neuter. And indeed the last he suspected most, knowing the Nature of our King so prone to Voluptuousness, to which the Noise and Trouble of the Wars never gives free License. He therefore by continual Embassies, kept him constant to his Resolution, and with larger Promises of Supply, and clearer Appearances of Success, prick'd forward his Ambition to the Enterprize.

But all these Arts were Needleless, for the King was forward to the Quarrel; either out of a brave Emulation of Henry the Fifth his Predecessor of the other Line; or out of a Confidence as easily to throw King Lewis out of the Throne of France, as he had King Henry out of the Sovereignty of England; or perhaps not to appear backward in an Attempt of Glory, when the Expectation of the Kingdom called upon him to arm. For unless some Malice rancor'd in the Genius of our Nation against the French, the Saxon Government having received a final Overthrow by them, in the Conquest of Duke William (though to that great Business conspired all the adjacent Countries) it would be our wonder why the English were never sparing of their Lives or Treasure, when any War might be advanced against the French; and of this so extraordinary Forwardness in his People, the King took a great Advantage.

To compact the Body of this Enterprize, Money the Nerves and Sinues of War were wanting. The ordinary Course for Supply was by Parliament, and that at this Time was held Difficult if not impossible: In regard the King

but a little before had dissolved the Assembly, having received for Discharge of his Debts a large Contribution; and to urge them to a Second Aid, would probably end in Disfast, if not in Denial. Neither could it appear less than extream Exaction, to force the Farmers, who make up the greatest Number in any Payment, to yield to a Subsidy, considering the Precedent Troubles of the Kingdom had utterly impoverish'd them by hindering Tillage and all good Husbandry. And for the Nobility, who pay a large Share in all general Collections; they for the most part prepared themselves for the Expedition. And it could not but rebate the Edge of their Courages to be at a vast Charge not only in the particular setting forth of their own Persons and their Retinue; but in the general Preparations. There was therefore a New Way found out, by former Ages never known without oppressing the Commons, to supply the King, the Name it bore was a Benevolence, (though many disproved the Signification of the Word, by their Unwillingness to the Gift) and it was cunningly and discreetly required only of the better sort of People, who were known to have a plentiful Revenue, of whom he got a particular Catalogue. And especially of such whom Ease and Wealth were likely to detain at Home. Knowing that the heaviest Burthen might be laid on them without a publick Murmur, as Men hated by the Soldier, and upon whose Prosperity ever attends a common Envy.

In advancing this Contribution no Policy was omitted, either by private Menaces, or publick Entreaties. Some came in led by fear (not knowing to what Indignation a Denial might provoke the State) Others were cunningly perfwaded to a vain hope of enjoying the King's particular Favour by their Forwardness: Few granted it for Love to the Enterprize; most only because their Neighbours did it, and they wanted Courage to disobey Example. In History a Widow is much spoke of, who having freely, and somewhat above the Proportion of her Estate, contributed Twenty Pound, receiv'd from the King a Kiss. Which his so extraordinary Favour (extraordinary to a Widow declin'd in Years) so overjoy'd her, that she doubled the Sum, and presented it to the Collectors. By which slight Passage, a Judgment is easie to be made of the King's Nature; either of it self full of Humanity, or without Difficulty bending to the lowest Courtelie, when it any Way concern'd the Advancement of his Profit.

By this Art Monies were raised, and now nothing was wanting to the Expedition. The universal Language of the Kingdom being of the Wars, and all Exercises Military. No Person of Blood or Quality, but prepared for the Journey, except only those whom Infancy or extream Age exempted, or the necessary Administration of the Commonwealth. And all they who went, emulated each other in the Glory of their Armour, the Richness of their Pavilions, the Bravery of their Horses Furniture and Servants Apparel. Every Man being held so far to recede from Honour, as in his Preparations he expressed an Unwillingness to the Business.

The Army consisted of 1500 Men at Arms, 15000 Archers, 8000 common Soldiers, beside 3000 Pioneers (1) appointed to guard the Ord-

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. All Things disposed in so full a Readiness, the King sent over to the Duke of Burgundy, to acquaint him with the State of the Army, and to know in what Forwardness Businesses were on that Side. Who returned Answers full of confident Promises, and Exhortation to the King to make all possible Haste over, the Summer coming on apace; which if past further without Action, would indanger the Loss of the whole Expedition for that Year. He assured him moreover of certain (m) Towns under the Government of the Count St. Paul, which should be surrendred into the King's Hands, for Retreat to the English upon any Occasion of the Badness of Weather or Fortune. And indeed how weak soever the Duke knew the Condition of his Army, yet fearful he was to express it, least the King should take Advantage to give over the Undertaking. The King's Nature being known diseased so much with the Love of Peace, that the Duke was justly Suspicious how sound soever it appeared for the Present, it might upon the least Distemper fall into a Relapse.

Some Towns to be surrendred to K. Edward.

A Letter of Defiance sent by an Herald to K. Lewis.

Phil. Comines's Censures of the Letter confuted, and a Judgment of his History.

Upon these Assurances from the Duke, the King gave Order that all his Forces should repair to London: Whence after some few Months spent in Preparations, he march'd towards Dover. But before he took Shipping, that the Progress of the War might be the more Successful, the Beginning was made according to the Old Heroick Strain of Bravery. For the King sent Garret an Herald over with a Letter of Defiance to Lewis of France; in which he was requir'd to surrender up to the King of England, the Realm of France, as due to him by the Laws of Inheritance, and violently wrested away from Henry the Sixth, by Charles the Seventh, and as unjustly possessed by Lewis: By which voluntary Resignation of the Crown, it was shew'd how without Effusion of Blood, the King of England should be enabled to restore the Clergy and Nobility to their ancient Greatness and Priviledges, and the Commons to their Liberty: Of which they had all been so cruelly depriv'd by the injurious Usurpation and tyrannical Government of Charles and Lewis. It showed likewise how far the Kingdom of France in general, would by this receive Benefit, considering it would be cas'd of all those many and unsupportable Exactions, which by those covetous Princes, had been laid upon it. It concluded with a threatening of all the Mischiefs which accompany War, and an absolute Despair of all future Mercy, or Care to be had of Lewis's Provision; If upon so fair an Admonishment, and Summons given he refused to yield the Kingdom.

This Letter saith Comines (an Author of that Time, happy in writing many cunning Particulars of the Princes he serv'd, but rude in the Art of History, and ever blemishing the Glory of our Nation) was penn'd so elegantly both for Language and Matter, that he believ'd it was beyond the Abilities of an English Wit; a bold and ridiculous Censure. For how could he who was born no Native of France, and never had been instructed in any Learning, judge of Language? Or how of the witty Contrivance of the Letter, since in his own History, which is receiv'd by the World with so universal an Applause, there is an apparent Defect in Order and Method? And without Vanity our Nation may assume to it self the Praise, (considering the narrow Limits of the Island,) to have produced as many Scholars admirable in all Degrees of Knowledge, as any Country on this side the Alpes. Neither was that Age (though according to the Necessity of the Time, more expert in Arms than Arts) without Excellent Wits famed for Literature. But this Digression the Reader must pardon; a Sense of our Nation's Honour thrust my Pen out of the Way, if this be from the Purpose.

Whatsoever the Letter was in the Composition, it was such in the Substance, that it discomposed King Lewis, and troubled all his Imaginations. He read it softly and fearfully; which was beneath that part of Understanding he was most Master of, even Policy it self. For it could not but beget strange Interpretations in the Court, when the Message of an Enemy deliver'd publickly by Letter should be kept concealed. The Demand must probably be easily conjectured, and this silent Way of answering could not but procure Suspicion, that his Resolution might descend to yield more than became a Prince. But in the Manage of this, as in all other Businesses, King Lewis delighted to give Order alone, and show his Authority Independent of any Counsel, without perplexing himself at all to satisfy Opinion.

Having read the Letter he withdrew himself into a Wardrobe, and commanded the Herald to be brought to his Presence. To whom he in answer to the Letter said, That he knew the King his Master had not resolv'd upon this Enterprize, out of his own Disposition; but overcome by the Solicitation of his People, and the Perswasion of the Duke of Burgundy, and the Count St. Paul. His People infatuated with a vain Presumption of Victory, because heretofore the Success of their Wars in France had been fortunate, never considering the Disparity of the State of Things, or the Uncertainty of Events, especially where Fury and Fortune, two blind Powers, bear the whole Sway. The Duke of Burgundy, (loving War for it self, and having rashly engag'd himself into many Quarrels) out of Desire to draw the King of England into his Dangers, or at least at another's Cost, to beat the Bargain of Peace to a lower Rate. The Reason why he had so labour'd King Edward to take Arms, and revive an absolute Title to the Kingdom of France, being only for his own Preservation which was threatened by all his injured Neighbours, or else as it is reported of People diseased of the Plague, in Envy to the Health of other Nations desirous to infect even his nearest Allies with the Contagion of his Quarrel. As for the Count St. Paul, who had ever subsisted by Dissimulation, and causing Division between Princes, whereby his Assistance either for the Prosecution of the War, or Conclusion of Peace might be required as Necessary: All his Hopes in this Quarrel were only to fish in troubled Waters, and by an universal Combustion to raise himself into Authority, in regard Peace levelled him with inferior Lords, and made his Service of no Use.

King Lewis proceeded to tell him in how miserable a Condition the Burgundian Army was, having been broken at the Siege of Nuz (a desperate and mad Undertaking) and being now return'd Home, the Soldier destroy'd either by the Sword or Famine; and that small

He added how the Season of the Year, Summer being almost past, must of Necessity deter the King from crossing the Sea, and many other Arguments against the present Undertaking; as if the Herald being perswaded to Quiet by Oratory, France might have been reprimed from War for that Year. And to make him the more his Friend, he gave him with his own Hand three hundred Crowns, with Promise of a Thousand more, if the Peace, so much desired by him, took effect.

The Herald promises to promote a Peace with K. Edward.

The Herald, overcome much by his Perswasions, but much more by his Money, reply'd, 'That no Pains on his Part should be omitted, 'that might tend to the Service of his Majesty's Intentions; and that he, as far as his Observation upon the King's Nature could reach, 'imagined no great Difficulty to bring his Master to a fair Agreement; but that, as yet, 'the Motion would be most unseasonable, considering, that after so vast a Charge in levying 'of an Army, and so universal an Applause to 'the Design, his Majesty could not retire, until, at least, he had led his Forces into France, 'and made some Appearance of intending what 'so constantly he had pretended. He desired him therefore to let his Army pass over to Calis, and thither to send his Herald to desire a safe Conduct for his Ambassadors, with Order to make Addresses to the Lords Stanley and Howard, and himself; and that the Way should be prepared so plain for King Lewis his Purpose, that there should be no Impediment at the worst to a fair Respect, if not to a full Satisfaction of his Desires.

The English Herald sent away.

All this Discourse past in Private: In Publick there was Caution, by the King's strict Command given, That no French Man should have any Communication with him; and as soon as possible he was dismissed with many fair Words, and thirty Ells of Crimson Velvet for Reward. The King after his Departure, expressing in his Look and Carriage, much Cheerfulness and Courage, either comforted by the faint Hopes our Herald gave him, or else cunningly dissembling his Fears.

K. Lewis's impolitic Management in Treating so with the Herald.

The Order of this Discourse between them, is deliver'd to us as a high Reach of Policy in King Lewis. But to an indifferent Understanding it appears nothing but the ordinary Wit of Cowardize; and certainly how covetous soever the Necessity of his Occasions made him to buy Peace, yet his manner of Traffick at this Time was beneath the Spirit of a Prince. For although his Largess to the Herald wrought the wish'd Effect, yet he might have been deceiv'd by him, and by his so earnest Desire to avert the present War, have endanger'd to bring it much more fierce upon him. Neither could it be imagined common Discretion to impart his Fears to an Enemy, who might perhaps betray them to the Scorn of the English Army, or to negotiate Peace with a Herald (though a Person of much Worth and Understanding) yet commonly a Stranger to the Knowledge of the more inward Resolutions of State, but the Management of this Business thus, took a good Effect, and that concurring in a Prince, whose other Actions were politickly order'd, made it have so happy a Censure.

Upon return of the Herald, the King embark'd for Calis, and after him follow'd his Army, which was transported in certain flat-bottom'd Boats of Holland and Zeland, by them usually called Scuts (n), lent as before covenanted by the Duke of Burgundy. And notwithstanding the Commodiousness of the Vessels and Multitude, being Five Hundred in all, three Weeks were they in their Passage, among all the Forces there not being one Page. Which as it instructs us in the vast Numbers of the Soldiers, so doth it in the Strength and Power, in regard they were all able Men, who undertook this Enterprize, and who came not to learn but to make Proof of their Knowledge in Arms.

As soon as he heard they were certainly ashore, the Duke in all Haste came to congratulate the King's safe landing, and happy Arrival of the Army; for there was just Ground for fear that the French Navy might have endeavour'd to trouble their Passage: But the Duke coming with a very small Train, much afflicted the Expectation of the English, who thought to have seen him march to meet them with 2500 Men at Arms well appointed (o), beside a large Power of Horse and Foot; as by his Ambassadors and his own Articles had so amply and frequently been promised: But to take away this Suspicion from them for fear it might any way drive back their Thoughts toward England; he told them, That his so private coming to the King was only to express his Joy for the King's Safety and theirs, and that his Army was further in the Country so well prepared for the present Design, that they should have no Reason to think him any way to have boasted. He therefore invited them to march up into the Land, where they might be better accommodated, and conducted the King to Bullen; a Town which having been heretofore morgaged by the French, to Philip, Duke of Burgundy, with a large Part of Picardy; was notwithstanding the often tender of the Money by Lewis, still detained violently by Duke Charles. There he gave the English a free Entertainment, and still kept their Expectation high. From thence he went with them to Peron, another Town of Picardy kept upon the same Terms. Into which he admitted but few of the better Sort of the English, and over those too he carried a watchful Eye: The Army forced to lodge in the Field, which was the less Inconvenient in regard of the Season of the Year, and the Commodiousness of Pavilions and Tents, with which they were so plentifully furnish'd. The Duke perhaps loath to trust the Army in Possession of so important a Place lest their Expectation being disappointed they might attempt to give him some Trouble. To Peron the Count St. Paul sent to congratulate the King's Arrival in France, to promise all Service to his Enterprize, and his Towns to his Use and Command. Whereupon the King remov'd to St. Quintin, over which St. Paul commanded, there to accommodate his Army, till the Duke's Forces were in Readiness to take the Field. But as some over-hasty Troops having got the Start of the Army came confidently toward the Gates, expecting to be receiv'd, if not with Triumph, at least with all the Demonstrations of Joy; the Artillery from the Town shot against them, and some of the Garrison issued forth to skirmish, in which Two or Three of the English perish'd. This

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. Appearance of Hostility from a Confederate, confirmed the former Jealousie of the Army, and raised a strange Murmur both against St. Paul, and the Duke, which was increased by the Difficulties of a tempestuous Night, with which the English after were troubled: For an extraordinary Rain fell, and made the so open Lodging very unpleasing, with Danger of Diseases to the Army.

Duke of Burgundy not able to satisfy the Suspicion of the English. The Duke of Burgundy opposed against this Discontent with his Authority, but in vain: For not able to give Satisfaction for his own Weakness and Breach of Promise, he was more disabled to clear Suspicion from another. Whereupon he took his leave of the King, intreating his and the Armies Patience for a while, till he brought his Forces to join with them, and a full Account from the Count St. Paul, of his Garri-son's Demeanure at St. Quintin.

The English Complaints of the Duke of Britain's Treachery. But this his Departure compared with the former Carriage of Things, begot yet a stronger Doubt of their Intentions in the English, who being Strangers in that Place, and not having any particular Aim in Conduct of the Business, but only a general Resolution to regain France, interpreted these Delays and false Play to direct Treason. And began openly to inveigh against their own Folly in confiding on the Promises of such, who endeavour'd not the Glory of the English Name, or the King's Title, but only their own Safety: For Preservation of which, under a specious Pretext of recovering a Kingdom, they had seduced them into a strange Country, in hope hereafter to sell them to the French. And altho' this Discourse were only in the Mouth of the common Soldier; yet did the Thoughts of the Commanders participate with the Vulgar, tho' not so freely opened. For hitherto there had been no Assurance given of any real Intention either in Burgundy or St. Paul.

Their Discontents defended. The much Indignation expressed by the English upon this Occasion was thought a strange kind of rude Ignorance, and a Note even of Barbarism. Which Censure favours too much of Malice, considering it could not be judged blind Presumption that induced our Nation to this Undertaking; the State, for it, having the fairest Appearance of Human Reason, and the Religion of the strongest Oaths. And if the unexpected Treachery of St. Paul ingendred Choler; why should this Passion be so Contemptible, since an Injury from a Friend is ever quicker and sharper to the Sense; and all Nations remov'd from their own Seats upon dangerous Adventures, are prone to Suspicion. And for Ignorance in Art of War, I see not how by Malice it self it can be obtruded upon the English, since their only Misery was too much Experience in Arms, which ever begets Knowledge. Neither could they be but Skilful even in the Military Exercise of the French, few of the Soldier-ry who were now of any Age, but their Youth had been bred up and instructed under the Command of that great Captain Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury and others: Not full twenty Years expired, since we turn'd our Swords upon our selves, and gave France Liberty to recover Breath.

K Lewis sends an Herald to propound a Peace with the English. But this Dilatory Way in the Duke, and Treachery in the Count, prepared the Army to a good Thought of Peace; and brought the two Confederates, into more Hatred than an open Enemy: So that when an Herald came from K. Lewis, he was receiv'd into the English Camp with much Humanity; and friendly invited by the Soldier, to refresh himself with Wine and Meat, till the King, who was then at Dinner,

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. was at Leisure to give him Audience. For Lewis, following the Instructions of our Herald, as soon as he understood King Edward was landed, and had heard likewise of some Disgusts, appearing between him and the Duke; resolv'd to send to him, and attempt to persuade him to a Peace: But so poor was he in the outward Ceremonies of Majesty, that no Herald attended on his Camp; whereupon he was enforced to suborn a Fellow, a Servant of one Monsieur de Hale, of whose Wit and Confidence he had taken some Notice, to act the Part. Who having received full Instructions from his Master addressed himself to the Lord's Stanley and Howard, and the English Herald, by whose Aid being brought to the King, he handsomly delivered his Message. The Effect of which was, To show the great Desire the King his Master had to live in perfect Amity with all neighbouring Princes, but above all with his Majesty of England, as the King, who in the Extent of Empire, and his own Prowess was most Considerable; That he had much Reason to believe the present War had not received the first Life in England, especially not in the Disposition of the King; which (as he was inform'd) abhor'd the unnecessary drawing of Christian Blood; That they who had first hatch'd this Quarrel, did it only with their Neighbour's Danger to procure their own Safety, and when they had made an advantageous Peace, to conspire with him, who before had been the common Enemy, for beating back their best Friend the English; That he doubted not but that his Majesty would suddenly find good Ground for Suspicion, when he should perceive the Duke of Burgundy, not able to bring into the Field one entire Regiment; all his Forces having been utterly broken upon desperate Services, to which an innate Love to War had madly engag'd him. Then he proceeded to excuse his Master's succouring the Faction of Lancaster: To which he protested he never gave Assistance for it self, but only for the Earl of Warwick's Sake, whom he supported only to affront Burgundy, whose irreconcilable Enemy Warwick had ever professed himself. And if he had inclined more to favour King Henry, he might well excuse it, in respect of his near Kindred to him and his Wife Q. Margaret, and something too in Reason of State, to oppose Burgundy who pretended to be a Friend (how false soever he prov'd) to the House of York. That if his Majesty would be pleased to search up to the very Head of this Business, he shall find more Streams of Assistance to have flowed from Burgundy than from France to K. Henry; Duke Philip and this Duke (till his Marriage with the Princess Margaret) having most passionately laboured the Supportation of that Family, to which they were so near in Kindred. The Conclusion was to desire his Majesty to grant a safe Conduct for 100 Horse, in whose Company should come Embassadors enabled with larger Instructions, and who should make Proposal of such Conditions, as could not be rejected by the King or Kingdom of England, since they should be for the Honour and Profit of both; unless it would better stand with his Majesty's Liking to assign a Place of Treaty in some Village between both Armies, to which they might jointly send Commissioners.

This Message deliver'd in a soft Tone, expressing much Humility, and ever ascribing to the King's Greatness of Spirit and the Nation's Glory; together with a Promise to make Overture of Conditions both Honourable and Profitable, begot a favourable Audience. And many

Duke of Burgundy assisted the Lancastrians.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. K. Edward and his Nobles agree to a Treaty of Peace. many of the great Lords, who had plentiful Revenues at Home, were as forward as the King to listen to Peace, and forsake unnecessary Dangers Abroad. Neither did the greatest Statists dislike a Treaty, considering that all our Wars in France had rather purchased Fame than Treasure to our Kingdom, and when our Soldiers returned Home, their Scars were greater than their Spoils. And howsoever we had by Starts and Fits got Possession of the largest Territories in France, yet still we retired back again; as if the Divine Providence had decreed to have our Empire bounded within our Seas. Moreover they who affected the Happiness of a Kingdom and loved their own Country, desir'd rather France under a Foreign Governour, least if in Possession of our King, England being the less, both in Extent and Fertility, might be reduced to the Condition of a Province, and live in Obedience to a Deputy, enriching the greater Kingdom with her Tribute. Other Considerations likewise of the present State of the Wars, prevail'd to give leave for a Treaty; Whereupon with Reward of 100 Angels in a Gilt Cup, the Herald was dismissed, a Safe-Conduct granted, and the Place for the Commissioners appointed in a Village near Amiens, the Armies to abide at Four Miles Distance on each Side: For the King were nominated, the Lord Howard, Sir Anthony St. Leger, and Dr. Morton; for the French, the Bastard of Bourbon, Admiral of France, the Lord St. Peire, and the Bishop of Eureux.

These Men at the first Meeting brought almost the Treaty to a Conclusion, for on both Sides they brought Minds disposed to Peace. And altho' the English Commissioners at first demanded the Crown of France as due to the King by Right, from which in Honour he could not recede; and afterward with much Appearance of Difficulty condescended to be content with Normandy and Guien, yet they themselves knew well Princes never used to part with Countries upon Treaty, before the Battel hath imposed a Necessity to yield. And indeed the English expected not that Lewis would be frighted out of so important Limbs of the Body of France, only upon the braving of an Enemy. Soon this first Flourish of Business came to more easie Terms. Edward desir'd to be gone without Loss of Honour, Lewis to have him gone with as much Reputation as he desir'd. Edward had occasion for Money, and Lewis was willing to make him a Bridge of Gold from Calis to Dover, whereon to carry back his Army. And shortly to both their Contents an absolute Agreement was made, whereby 75000 Crowns were to be paid to K. Edward before his Departure out of France, and 50000 annually.

Concerning the Annuity of 50000 Crowns, there is much Controversie among French and English Writers about the Name. They call it a Pension, we a Tribute. And certainly the latter (to speak without Partiality to our selves) hath in it much more Propriety of Language. For a Prince who over-awed by a powerful Army mediates by submissive Messages to divert the Battel, and afterward buys his Safety not only with a present Sum, but an annual Payment cannot have a freer Name than Tributary. And as for Pensions they are granted upon Petition to the Poor and Weaker, not upon Fear to the Mightier. But to compare the greater Actions of Princes to the Customs of Subjects: The 75000 Crowns (p) was the Fine K. Lewis paid for France, and the 50000 annually the Rent: Only the Farm was too mighty to be set, and the Tenant too strong and stubborn ever to quit Possession to his Land-lord.

Then for Establishment of Future Peace (that Posterity might Partake in the Benefit of this Agreement) it was concluded that the Princess Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to K. Edward, should marry with Charles the Dauphin, Son to Lewis; and for her present Maintenance (q) 5000 Crowns from France should be paid in the Tower of London; and after the Expiration of Nine Years, she and the Dauphin to be invested in the Dutchy of Guyen. And that on the English Side there might be no Fraud; upon Payment of the first Sum the Lord Howard and Sir John Cheynie, Master of the Horse, were to remain Hostages until the Army were returned into England. But that the King might not seem to forget his Confederates, the Duke of Burgundy and Britaine were comprehended if they would accept the Peace. The Count St. Paul was abandon'd in this Treaty, as a menial servant and Subject to the Crown, being Constable of France; and who by his Dissimulation and Treason, had most offended the Nature of our King. And usually thus to reconcile great Princes, lesser are offer'd up for Sacrifice.

This Peace was generally received by the Army with Applause, as by People who began to consider no Victory before the Battel certain, and in the Battel much Hazard. Only the Duke of Gloucester, who stood aloof off on the other Side, for Honour frown'd at this Accord, and expressed much Sorrow, as compassionating the Glory of his Nation blemish'd in it. He repeated his Jealousie of the World's Opinion, which necessarily must laugh at so chargeable a Preparation to attempt nothing; and scorn either the Wisdom or Courage of the English, when they shall perceive them in so full Numbers, and so well arm'd to pass the Sea, after a Defiance sent, and challenge to a Crown, to return back without drawing a Sword: Moreover to forsake the Amity of so constant Friends, and in extrem Necessity to betray them who were beguiled by a common Dissembler; whose Shifts and Tricks of State, like the Sights of Hand in Jugglers, are discovered, and wondred at by those Fools only, whom he Cozens. And what carried with it an Appearance of most Danger, to necessitate the Duke of Burgundy to a Peace with K. Lewis, whereby both may hereafter join in a common League against us: Who by this one Act have forfeited all Leagues with our ancient Confederates, and frighted any other Princes from joyning with us.

With Gloucester agreed many of the Army, who were either Dependant upon him, or who had as unquiet Thoughts as he; some likewise, who having set up the Rest of all their Fortunes upon this Gain, found themselves undone in their Hopes, because the Princes had drawn Stakes. But most of a discontented Humour, that maliciously always interprets the Actions of Princes to the worst Sense. But the Duke of Gloucester had a further and more dangerous Aim; as who by the Dishonour of his Brother, thought his Credit receiv'd increase, and by how much the King sunk in Opinion, he should rise. And in regard good and quiet Men were delighted in the Accord he would be numbred with the Wicked, and unquiet, to add a luster to his Faction by drawing the Nation's Honour to his Part.

A. D. 1474. But why this Peace should endure so hard a Censure, both at Home and Abroad is strange, and above all why K. Lewis should ascribe any Honour to himself, or think the Advantage on his Side. For what Eclipse soever the English Glory suffered, certainly the French by a most servile Way purchased Safety. They descending beneath the Honour of Men by Money to wage a Battel; we being only Faulty in not having perform'd more than Men. For if we consider our selves subject to the Chance of War, why was not an honourable Peace to be preferred? Especially since if we had fail'd in the Success, how wretchedly had our Forces been broken in their Hopes, and how impossible on the sudden to re-inforce the Army? And if the French had declin'd the Battel into what Necessities had we falln, the Summer almost past, and both Burgundy and St. Paul refusing to let us have Towns to Winter our Men? And if we look upon the Peace it self, nothing is in it disadvantageous to our Honour or Profit. Considering it brought not only a great present Sum and annual Revenue, but brought it from the then greatest Prince in Christendom enforced by Fear. And for Convenience, the Marriage of the King's Daughter to the Dauphin, could not be but esteem'd of main Consequence, Why then won that Apothegm so much Reputation, that reported our King to have gain'd Nine Battels in which he personally fought, and never to have lost any but this? Since in this he overcame a Prince of far greater Power than he ever fought with before, with no Disadvantage, but that the Victory was purchased without Blood, which should be esteem'd an Addition to the Glory of it. And if you cast your Eye back upon the Course held in the most famed Empire, and especially in the Roman, which was the noblest, you shall find they never refused their Friendship to any Prince who humbly (as Lewis of France did to King Edward) requested it; and accounted it more Glory to have Kings their Tributaries, than their Kingdoms Farm'd out for a more profitable Revenue. But of this enough, and but enough, since it tends so much to the Vindication of the English Honour; which the French vaunted so much to have suffered in this Treaty. In which they think us by their Wits miserably over-reach'd, and perhaps indeed we were, if the Articles be only judged by their Fears, and not by the Difficulties of our Army at that Time, and the just Jealousie of the King that his Confederates intended not his but their own Advantage.

The News of this Peace no sooner came to the Court of the Duke of Burgundy, but in all haste he posted to the English Camp, attended only by 16 Horse. The Distraction of his Look and Gesture expressed the Wildness of his Thoughts; so that the whole Army discover'd his Discontent before he utter'd it. His first Address to the King was, in Question of the Truth of the common Report that spoke a Peace concluded between him and K. Lewis? Which when he was resolv'd was true, he presently broke into a most passionate fierce Language, upbraiding the King with inglorious Sloath; and the indefatigable Courage of former Kings of England; upon whose Attempts waited ever the noblest Victory. He made a scornful Repetition of the Mirth his Enemies would make at his Return; as if he had come over with so huge an Army, Merchant like to traffick for a little Money; and the Contempt he must needs become to his own People, when they should perceive the great Conquests their Contributions have brought Home. And when it was intimated to him, that he and the Duke of Britaine were included in the Peace; he disdainfully rejected it, protesting that for the Love he bore the English Name, not Care of his own Safety, he had perswaded K. Edward to this Enterprize. And to show how little Dependency his Fortune held on any other, and how without Mediation of an Allie, he was able to make his own Peace; he vowed to conclude none with France, until the English Army had been Three Months at Home. After he had thrown forth these disorder'd Speeches, in much Discontent he left the King: Who wonder'd to hear himself so disdainfully intreated; having seldom been accusom'd to any Language, but what was polish'd to delight by Flattery. But they who misliked the Peace, commended the Spirit of the Duke, being overjoy'd to hear their unquiet Thoughts, which Fear restrain'd from Utterance, so freely spoken; yet they had little Cause to Triumph when Edward had reply'd with equal Boldness, That 'twas his own Falsehood, and not his Cowardize that had disposed his Mind to a Peace; for had he met Actions suitable to his Brags, he had never comply'd; but he could not fight in their Cause, who had not Heart enough to defend themselves, and therefore chose to side with a fair Enemy, rather than a treacherous and false Friend (r).

But the Count St. Paul, ascertain'd of this Peace, was seiz'd upon by a far other Passion. For by dissembling with these three Princes, in hopes to win Love and Reputation with the more Fortunate; he had offended them all, so far, that he knew not to which confidently to fly for Refuge. France was irreconcilable, because he had been ever practising against the Quiet and Safety of that State; and who both by the Ties of Alliance (as having marry'd the Sister of K. Lewis's Wife) and Loyalty, as who held much Land in France, and executed the Place of Constable; being oblig'd to seek the Preservation of his Country; had for many Years nourish'd Treason, and sometimes brought the Crown it self to the Hazard. Then from England or Burgundy, there was no Probability of Friendship, both having been deluded by his Promises, and in the last Business at St. Quintin provok'd to the highest Indignation. For altho' the English only sustain'd the Loss in point of Safety, in the present Expedition; yet in point of Honour, the Duke had his Share in Suffering: He having before the King's Passage out of England, covenanted for the Faith of the Count St. Paul. But certainly the Misery of a petty Prince is lamentable, and his Estate most unsafe, when there is any Jealousie growing between his more potent Neighbours. For Neutrality is incompatible with his Fortune, in regard his Country shall then lie open to the Spoil of every Army, if he deny to declare himself, and if he declare himself; he must run the Hazard of anothers Fortune. And oftentimes the very Situation of his Principality enforceth him to take part, not with the Stronger or Juster; but with the nearer neighbouring, as in Danger of whose Rage his Estate is most subject. But in Addition to the Misery of his Fortune, St. Paul had the Unquietness of Mind, raised up into a high Ambition, by the cunning of Wit. For he had so many, and so far Fetches in his Imaginations, and of them some had prosper'd so

This Peace no dishonour to the English, as was reported.

A. D. 1474. much to his Advantage; that it made him Presumptuous of his Abilities to dissemble, and therefore continue in it, till at last the Discovery took away all Belief from his after-Pretensions, and happily too from his real Intentions. But among the greatest of his Misfortunes, is to be reckon'd, the Time he lived in: For had he not met with so Politick a Prince as Lewis of France, who had likewise the Start of him in good Luck, he questionless might have attained some one of those many Designs, he so wittily and probably contriv'd. But in the Conduct of their Affairs, Princes shall find a discreet Honesty not only toward God, but even to the depraved World, the safest Rule of human Actions. For the absolute Dissolution of a State was never known to happen by Observance of Faith or Religion; and seldom in the Time of a good Prince, I mean if his Goodness were active, not over-ruled by evil Counsel to Misgovernment.

St. Paul in this Distraction of Thoughts endeavour'd to recover a Game quite lost, and made his Addreses to the King of England, whom he believed to be of the easiest Nature, and from whom he expected less Severity, because the King had suffer'd less than the others by his Dissimulation. He therefore first excused the Distalt given the English at St. Quintin, casting the whole Fault upon the unhappy Rashness of his Soldiers billeted in the Town, and the Jealousie of the Townsmen: Then he advis'd him to be wary of giving too much Faith to K. Lewis, who was resolv'd after the Departure of the English Army to observe no Covenant; wherefore his safest Course would be to demand Eu and St. Valerie to billet his Soldiers in this Winter, which he was secure Lewis's Fears durst not deny, and by which Grant he would not be necessitated to so sudden a Return. Lastly, (observing the Avarice of the King's Disposition in the last Treaty) he tender'd him the Loan of 50000 Crowns, and promise of all faithful Service in the Future.

But the Memory of former unfaithful Passages, and desire to enjoy the Pleasures of Peace, made the King so far Deaf to these new Propositions; that it ended even in scornful Language of the Offerer, which drove St. Paul into utter Despair. For the King was not to be remov'd from his new-begun Amity with Lewis, which every Day by the Interchange of Favours, and by labouring to excel each other in Confidence, gather'd increase. For presently upon Conclusion of the Articles between the Commissioners, a Truce being made, until the Peace were ratified by the Oaths of both the Princes; the English Soldiers had free Admission into all the French Towns. And one Day so great Number of the Army went to make merry in Amiens, as might have endanger'd the Surprisal if there had not been faithful Intentions in K. Edward. But he to shew the Integrity of his Mind, and to take away all Occasion of Jealousie of any underhand Design, sent to K. Lewis to intreat him to give Order for Restraint, if by entering in so large Multitudes the Soldiers endanger'd Suspicion; which Lewis (never overcome in Complement) refused with many Protestations of his Confidence; only desiring our King, if he disliked the Absence of so considerable a Part of his Army from the Camp, to send some Yeomen of his Crown to guard the Gates, in regard he was resolv'd no French Man should stop the Passage of the English. But our King strain'd his Courtesie much too high, when to out-vy King Lewis's Favours, he offer'd to give him a Catalogue of all the French Noblemen, who had conspired with St. Paul in this War, and had given Faith to Revolt to the English. For as in the Rule of common Justice, this Discovery could give no better an Attribute to the King than that of State-Informer; so could it not but infinitely prejudice the Affairs of England; considering it would shut up for ever the Passage to all Intelligence, if this Peace should chance to break hereafter. And indeed by so voluntary undertaking that Office, which an honest Mind thinks it self unhappy to be forced to, presents his Nature to us most ignoble; since this Treason was only Intentional, and as the State of Buinesses now stood in France, reconciled to the English, it no way concern'd the Safety of his new Confederate.

On the other Side K. Lewis show'd himself most affectionate to the English, when, contrary to the Circumspection of his Nature, he rejected all the Suspensions of his Council, who wish'd him to be watchful that K. Edward by pretending this Peace, did not betray him to a ruinous Security: When likewise he sent such exceeding Plenty of all Provision to the English Camp, and liberally feasted those so innumerable Multitudes, who daily resorted to Amiens. But perhaps some State-Criticks will interpret the Former in him, not a good Opinion of our Faith; but a Conceit of a dull ignorant Honesty in our Nation not quick to take Advantages; and the later only an obsequious Way to continue us in our former Resolution for Peace. What ever Passion prevail'd with him in other Courtesies, I am confident he express'd more Nobleness than in any other Action of his life; When he refused to destroy the English Army, having oftentimes so fair Opportunity, by reason of the many Disorders the Truce begot.

While these Passages of Endearment lasted between the Two Kings, a Place convenient for an Interview was found out at Picquigny, a Town three Leagues from Amiens, standing upon the River Somme, and Commissioners were sent to provide there should be no Danger of Treason in the Place, for the King were the Lord Howard, and Sir Anthony St. Leger; for the French, the Lord of Bouchage and Comines. In the Choice of which Place Comines lays a gross oversight to our Commissioners. For he affirms by reason of a Marsh on both Sides the Causey, on which the King was to come to the Bridge where the Meeting was; his Person might have been in Danger, if the French had not meant good Faith. And if this were true, it certainly deserv'd a Signal Reprehension; in regard the sad Experience of those Times taught, there could not be too much Circumspection at such an Interview: But the Success guilty of no Infelicity; clear'd the Commissioners either from the Fault, or from much of the Blame.

At the Meeting there was as much interchange of Courtesie, as could be between two Princes. The French King was first at the Grate (for these two Lions could not without Danger of Combat meet but at so safe a Distance) and our King was a Gallant in the Management of his Body, (s), by bending himself lower at Salutation: In which he express'd Youthfulness and Courtship. In their Language was much of Sweetness and endearing, and in their Behaviour an Appearance of Congratulatory Joy.

(s) Philip de Comines says this Interview was on the 29th of August, 1475. but that could not be, for K. Edward landed at Calis in June 1474. and return'd in September following. The Peace according to the same Author being made three Months after his Arrival in Picardy.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. Each labouring to obtain the Victory in the Expressions of a cordial Affection; and indeed the main Business took up least part of the Time. Twelve Persons of principal Name (t), attended on each Prince according to the Nature of the Ceremony, out-vying each other in the Curiosity and Riches of their Apparel. On the English Side the Duke of Gloucester was absent (u), in regard his Presence should not approve; what his Opinion and Sense of Honour had heretofore disallow'd. And that there might be no Fraud nor Treason; on the English Side were four of the French, and on the French four of the English; who watchfully observ'd every Word and Gesture: So much Jealousie waits upon even the most friendly Meetings, and so suspected is the Faith of Princes. 800 Men at Arms attended on the French King, on the King of England his whole Army. Which set in Battel-array to the best Advantage for the Eye, afforded a Prospect of much Delight and Bravery to them, who at a more unfriendly Encounter would have trembled at the Sight.

The Chancellor of England's Oration at the Interview.

The (x) Chancellor of England made an Oration congratulatory for the happy Agreement, whereby so much Blood was preserv'd in the Veins of both People, and so many Blessings of Peace like to enrich both Kingdoms (y). His Congratulation was intermingled with Prophecy of future Happiness, which would grow stronger by length of Time; touching in that upon the Marriage of the Dauphin with the Lady Elizabeth of England. But the good Bishop of Lincoln (z) (for in him was then the Office of Chancellor) in this shew'd himself a better Orator, than Prophet. Himself living afterward to disprove his own Divination.

K. Lewis invites K. Edward to Paris.

After the Oration ended, and the two Kings sworn to the fore-mention'd Peace, K. Lewis something wantonly (as who knew how to tune his Language best to K. Edward's Ear) invited him to take a Journey as far as Paris; where if any of the Beauties should make him trespass upon his Chastity; the Cardinal of Bourbon (a gentle Ghostly Father) should easily afford him Absolution. The King in the Pleasure of his Look approv'd the Facetiousness of the Discourse, and found no great Difficulty in himself to admit the Offer (a).

K. Lewis excepts against the Duke of Brittain's being included in the Peace.

But K. Lewis (who never used Mirth but as a Preparative for something serious) having wrought himself into the King's good Liking; and as he thought facilitated him to grant any Request, urged that the Duke of Brittain might not remain in the Protection of the English; but that he might be left to his own Defence, against the Just Anger of the French, whom he had so often provoked by open Confederacies and secret Practices. To which the King answer'd resolutely, That he never would forsake the Care of a Confederate, who had maintain'd his Faith so constantly. And afterwards being importun'd by some great Lords employ'd in that Negotiation by Lewis; he not only shew'd an apparent Dislike to the Motion; but openly profess'd, that rather than the Duke should be endanger'd in his Safety, he would forget all other Amities, and pass the Seas himself to his Relief. Which shew'd a noble Disposition in the King, and an advised Judgment; for the Duke had been ever friendly to him in the worst of Fortune, and in his better a most faithful Neighbour, and in this Enterprize on France had used no Dissimulation, nor in the least Carriage of Businesses betray'd that Faith at first he promised. In the Protection therefore of him against the French, the King shew'd the Gratitude of his Memory; as likewise a politick Caution that the Crown of France might not grow too potent by warring with a weaker Prince, whose Ruin could not but give to it a dangerous Addition.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

But this Discourse touching the Duke was in private between the Kings; for Lewis to show the Authority he had over his greatest Lords, had commanded them to retire when he entred into this Speech. And in treating this Business, which so nearly concern'd the Policy of his Intentions, he shew'd a great Art; not urging the King so far, as that the Denial might come off with a Dislike. But smoothly he gave it over, when he perceiv'd him not easily to be remov'd; although with some inward Difficulty to find his Affection so constant to the Duke, of whom he had resolv'd to make a Spoil, and to lay the first Stone of his mighty Building in his Destruction.

K. Lewis's smooth Acceptance of a Denial.

He presently therefore diverted his Discourse again to Ceremony, and after some short intercourse of Courtship they both at the same Minute parted from the Grate, and took Horse; publicly giving very liberal Commendations of each other. And how ever Interviews are generally esteem'd unsafe for Princes, in regard the Advantage falling of Necessity on the one Part, throws a Contempt upon the other; yet this was both in Probability before and after in the Success most Fortunate. For both Princes tho' of different Complexions had equal Preeminences, and by several Ways came to stand upon even Ground.

The happy conclusion of this Meeting of the two Kings.

K. Edward had the Advantage in Youth, Personage and Behaviour, which win suddenly upon Estimation: Lewis in the cunning of Wit, and Authority of his Carriage, which although slower, sink deeper in Opinion. Edward had a daring Courage ever seconded by a propitious Fortune: Lewis a circumspect Judgment which order'd Businesses so sure, that he left scarce any Thing to Fortune. Edward by his Sword had brought himself to the present Greatness of his State: Lewis by his Policy had settled himself in his Father's Conquests. And indeed so apparent was the Equality of these Princes, that they both despair'd to gain any Thing by Opposition, which made Lewis at any Rate desirous to buy K. Edward's Return; and Edward willing no more to traffick with Lewis, from whom nothing was to be got in the Way of Bargain: Whatsoever the one did by Valour, the other likely to undo by Cunning.

Lewis and Edward compar'd.

This Peace by all Conjecture was likely to suffer in Opinion at Home, where by comparing the Fortune of the present with that of former King Edward's Policy to dispose his Army for a Peace.

(x) Bishop of Ely.

(a) At which the French King says Comines was not very well pleased, not liking to let the King of England be tempted to come thither.

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. Expeditions, Expectation promised it self nothing less than the entire Recovery of France. To prevent which, the King had happily, perhaps judiciously (as who foresaw that the Success might end in Agreement) brought over with him many (b) from London, for their Wealth of most Reputation in the City. These Men whom Plenty endeared to the Love of Life, as soon as he had resolv'd to decline the present War, he caus'd to be assaulted every Hour with new Fears, representing to their affrighted Minds the Horror of a Battel, the many Difficulties of a Siege, and the Certainty of an untimely Death, if not by the Cannon or the Sword, yet by the Inconveniences of Lodging and the Weather, which the Winter coming on was likely to be most tempestuous: And if beyond Hope Death were escaped, how cruel might be an Imprisonment, and how deep the Ransom! Then he gave Order that the Enemy should be reported of far more Danger than indeed he was, and every Night false Alarms to be given. And for Distrust already held of Burgundy and St. Paul, he let it be augmented in the Army, causing Rumors to be spread abroad, That there was Treason in them from the Beginning of this Enterprize, and that now they were prepared to unite their Forces with the French to the utter Destruction of the English.

By which Frights he so moulded them to his Desires, that they writ back to their Friends, the Impossibility of any Success in the present Business, and the great Judgment and Fortune of the King, if he could conclude a Peace, with Advantage of Honour. The Example of this Policy King Edward bequeath'd to Henry VII. who left none of his Predecessor's Arts unpractis'd that might advance either his Profit or Reputation. And so far this Desire of Peace and Delight in it spread it self, that when upon the Day of the Interview by Accident a white Pigeon lighted upon the King's Pavilion, and there pruned it self after a Shower of Rain, the Sun shining comfortably, the Soldiers cried out it was the Holy Ghost, who descended in that Form, to shew how grateful the present Accord was to Heaven. Which Interpretation pleased exceedingly the present Humour of the King; any Superstition being nourished in the Subject, which tended to advance the Reputation of their Prince, especially when his Actions are doubtful to be understood.

The Night that ensued the Interview, many of the English Nobility resorted to Amiens; the French Affability, and something too of Curiosity inviting them. The Lord Howard, who was always foremost in his Application to King Lewis, at Supper whisper'd him in the Ear, that he conceiv'd his Master might be perswaded without much Scruple to make a Journey to Paris; where by a friendly Entertainment, the new begun Amity might be perfected.

But the wary King had no Desire to bid so dangerous a Guest to Paris, for fear the Delicacies of the Place might invite him, either to a chargeable continuance there, or to such a Love of the French Air, that it might perswade him to return hereafter thither, though unbidden. He therefore chid his own overforward straining a Complement, and was forced to the Invention of an Excuse, to take away Discourtesie, from Denial of what before ceremoniously he had offered: He answer'd the Lord

Howard thereupon suddenly, and to the outward Judgment seriously, That he was extream sorry the Necessity of his unsettled State, would not afford him Licence of so much Happiness, being presently to make an Expedition against the Duke of Burgundy, who was busie in his Preparations against him, so that with Safety yet, he could not attend the Pleasures of Peace. Which Answer gave but a half Satisfaction; but the Lord Howard was devoted to his Affairs, and that made the Relish of it better with the King.

But that the King might neither reap all the Benefit, nor yet bear all the Blame of this Peace, there were not a few Lords great in Opinion of the State, who shared proportionably in the Booty. Even the scrupulous Duke of Gloucester returned not Home without a large Present both of Plate and Horses. For when he saw the whole Stream of the Army flow into King Lewis, either out of Curiosity, or in Policy loth to particularize an Enmity upon himself from so potent a Prince, he went to him at Amiens, where he found a Respect answerable not only to the Greatness of his Blood, but to the Extent of his Judgment and Authority.

But with him King Lewis dealt with more Circumspection, knowing it impossible to win Ground upon him by any Slight or Strength of Wit. The good Affection of all the other Lords he bought up, according to the ordinary Course in Markets; as they were worth more in the King's Estimation, so were they at a higher Price with him. The principal Men of Name who were in Pension as we find them in History, were the (b) Lord Hastings, Lord Chamberlain to the King, the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheiney, Master of the Horse, Sir Anthony S. Leger, and Sir Thomas Montgomery. Among these, beside the present Gifts, he annually distributed 16000 Crowns, and exacted from every Man an Acquittance for the Receipt. Which no Man refused, but only the Lord Hastings, denying absolutely that ever his Hand should be seen among the King's Accounts at Paris; but welcom'd still the Pension, which without that Formality was continued.

At how high a Rate King Lewis prized his Amity with England by this profuse Liberality, (a Quality so contrary to his parcimonious Disposition) is easily to be judged. But how lawful it was in the Receivers, I will not too severely censure: For, although in this King's Reign, as likewise in the Time of Henry VII. many of the great Counsellors were in Pension to Lewis, and afterward to his Son Charles VIII. yet it is hard to judge how it could agree with the Decorum of their Dignity; it being much beneath the Honour of a noble Mind to owe any Part of their Revenue to a Prince, whose Safety and Advantage must never be in the first Place of their Care. In Peace it may happily not carry any Appearance of Disloyalty, because by their good Offices they may deserve that Way of Gratitude; but in Times of Jealousie, and especially of Enmity, it can no Way be allowed. For though the Pensioner give no underhand Intelligence prejudicial to his Country, yet by a certain necessity of Gratitude, it stops the Freedom of Advice, and so renders him at least undeserving to the one. Rewards are given for forepast Merits, Pensions to retain in future: He therefore who receives a Pension, obligeth himself tacitely to the Service of Two Masters; and oftentimes the Se-

A. D. 1474. Reg. 14. cond in his Thoughts is that Prince to whom he owes a natural Duty: An extraordinary Way of Benefit begetting an extraordinary Diligence. And hence proceeds that Maladie in the Body of a State, which inclines it so totally to one Side, that all Injuries how gross soever are connived at from one Neighbour, while from another the least Shadow of Offence begets mortal War. But if these Pensions be received with Approbation of the King, certainly as they are lawful, so likewise are they less dangerous; for then the State is armed against the Advice of such, whom they know to lean on one Side. The Crookedness of Counsel being easily discern'd, when not bolster'd up with Simulation of Integrity.

K Lewis's Gold, what it feeds it had upon the Courtiers. And questionless, the Distribution of these Crowns, like a dangerous Poison dispersed into some principal Veins of the Body, infected the whole Court. And tho' perhaps the secret Resolutions of the King and State were not betrayed to him, yet was his Intelligence larger than convenient for so cunning a Neighbour, who out of slight and trivial Occurrences, such as were but Chamber-talk, could guess at the most reserv'd Counsels. Neither would those so apparent Affronts offered by him afterward, have been so patiently dissembled; (especially the King knowing him a timorous Prince, and who trembled at the very Thought of a Return of the English into France) had not they whose Advice was most listened to, passionately excused him in every Charge the more zealous Statists laid to him.

King Edward's Return home and Reception. But these Mischiefs the Years succeeding were guilty of; for the present, the King full of Joy and Treasure returned toward Calis; and indeed with more than ordinary Haste and Caution, for fear the Duke of Burgundy should attempt any Thing upon his Retreat. But with Safety he both came thither, and sailed to Dover (d), whence in much Pomp he directed his Journey to London. Upon Black-Heath the Lord Mayor and Aldermen in Scarlet, and Five hundred Commoners in Murrey received him; and thence with all Shew of Triumph conducted him through the City to Westminster (e). And perhaps he gave Order the Solemnity of his Return should be more glorious, to set off the Shortness of his Stay in France, and the small or no Honour purchased there. The Vulgar for the most Part valuing the Glory of Victories according to the Information of the Ballad, and the Glittering of the Pageants.

K Lewis made a Peace with the Duke of Burgundy. The French King, who ever affected the Substance, smiled at these huge Shadows, and never quarrell'd with King Edward, what pompous Titles soever he assumed in receiving the forementioned Sums of Money; willing that he should husband his Actions of least Worth to the greatest Advantage of Credit with his People: While he on the contrary, in all Businesses never heeded what Judgment Opinion gave; and so his Ends were effected, cared not by what sordid or humble Means: Whereupon, presently after the Departure of the English, notwithstanding the many Injuries received from the Duke of Burgundy, he came to Treaty, and suddenly to Agreement with him: In many Points unexpectedly yielding, only that he might revenge himself upon the Count S. Paul; for him he accounted the Conjurer, who by his dissembling Charms, had raised those so many and so tumultuous Spirits against the Crown of France; and till he were destroyed, King Lewis conceived it impossible to remain safe from civil or foreign War. A. D. 1474. Reg. 14.

The Agreement between K. Lewis and the Duke of Burgundy, to put St. Paul to Death. It was therefore agreed between these Two Princes, that what Places had been wrested away in the former Troubles, should be immediately restor'd; and which of the Two could first surprize the Count St. Paul, should within Eight Days put him to Death, or deliver him up to the Discretion of the other. By which Agreement the wretched Lord found how inevitable was his Ruin; and considering the Vanity of any Hope that might persuade him to defend himself against so potent Enemies, he entred into Discourse with his own Fears, to which he might make his Addresses with more Probability of Safety. And knowing the immoveable Resolutions of King Lewis, and how impossible it was to deceive a Prince so cunning in the Art; he resolv'd to make Tryal of the Duke; who disdainfully received the first Offers of his Service; but in the End, overcome by Importunity, he granted him safe Conduct: Relying on which, he posted to him, but soon found his Ruin by the want of that Faith, which himself had never observ'd.

Count St. Paul betrayed and put to Death. For the Duke notwithstanding the safe Conduct, gave Command that he should be imprison'd, and not long after deliver'd him up to the French King, who caus'd Process to be made against him; certain Letters written to King Edward, and by him delivered to King Lewis, being the chief Articles of Accusation, by which he was condemn'd, and for which not long after he lost his Head. He embraced Death with much Resolution, only somewhat astonish'd to meet it upon a Scaffold; the manner, not the Thing it self, amazing him. But the Officiousness of the King in the Delivery of those Papers to the Condemnation of his Wife's Uncle, and a Confederate, was certainly treacherous and ignoble; and makes his Memory found harsh in the Ear of any worthy Mind.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15. King Edward's Passion to the French King, but Zeal against a separate Peace with the Duke of Burgundy. And indeed, he was on the sudden become so passionate a Doater on a reconciled Enemy (f), and so passionate an Enemy of his late Friends, that when he understood the Treaty of Peace at Vervins between the French King and the Duke, he sent over Sir Thomas Montgomery, with Instructions if possible to break it off; who urged, 'That the Duke should not be admitted to treat of himself, but only as mention'd in the King his Master's Peace: That if the Duke refused to treat in that manner, and the King any way suspected his own Strength, his Master would the next Summer cross the Seas, and join his Forces with him; conditionally, that half the Wages of his Army might be defrayed by the French, for whose Service the War must be undertaken; and that he might be allowed Fifty Thousand Crowns annually in respect his Loss would amount to the Value, by reason the English Wools at Calis could during that Time have no Vent into the Netherlands. To such an over officious Friendship did his new Malice to Burgundy, and the Council of King Lewis's great Pensioners incline him, that he voluntarily offered without Respect of Glory or Hope of Profit, to fight like a Journeyman for a Prince, whose Growth in Power could not be but most unsafe even to him, and dangerous to his Kingdom.

(d) Where he arrived in September.

(e) On the 28th of September.

(f) He ordered his Daughter, the Princess Elizabeth to be filed Dauphiness.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15. This Embassy King Lewis received with Appearance of much Content, congratulating the King to so obsequious a Respect; but he no way desired to see him any more in France, especially not to pay for his Presence, whose Absence he had lately bought so dearly. He therefore return'd many Thanks for the offered Favour, but withal shewed, how much too late it came, in regard the Truce was already concluded between him and the Duke, from which being now sworn to it, he could recede neither in Honour nor Religion. But that the World might understand how scrupulous he had been in Preservation of the King of England's Reputation; the present Truce varied not in one Point from that sworn at Picquignie, except only that the Duke was admitted to article for himself apart, which indeed was the main Thing the King endeavoured to have prevented; since by articling apart, the Duke shewed his Independance, and that the English by their Arms had no way advanc'd his Business.

K Lewis's But that this Answer might incur no Misinterpretation, he liberally presented the Ambassador, and sent over with him the Two Hostages, the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheiney. For King Lewis continued still in much Caution to offend the King, least perhaps he and the Duke of Burgundy, though now asunder, might like a Limb broken and set again, knit the faster. He was therefore diligent to increase every Day new Discontents between them, and to preserve the English in their Amity firm upon any Terms, knowing the Duke by no Policy ever to be reduc'd to a perfect Friendship. And so far had his Cunning and Pensions prevail'd, that nothing was more in the Vote of the English, than to preserve King Lewis safe in his Estate at home, and noble in Reputation with us. But among all the Ties which kept the King surest to him, the Hope of marrying the Dauphin with his Daughter, and this way at least to settle the Crown of France in his Posterity, most prevail'd. Of the Reality of which Article, the French permitted not the smallest Occasion to be given for Suspicion.

King Edward's This Intention of King Edward of entering into War with the Duke of Burgundy, being cross'd, (the unquiet Nature of some Princes, ever affecting to beget Trouble to themselves) that the King might feel no perfect Rest, he receives the former Jealousie concerning the Earl of Richmond. But why the reducing him into his Power, should so much perplex the State, is beyond reach, unless it were a Divination of future Accidents, which instructed the King's Fears to expect Danger from him, who neither in point of Justice nor Strength was for the present considerable. For if we look upon his Faction at home, the Civil Wars had brought them so low, that no Person of Authority had any Relation to him, except the Lord Stanley (g), who being Father-in-Law to him, might perhaps with his Fortunes well, but bore a most faithful Mind to the King, in whose special Favour he continued to the last; and if we consider him, as if his nearness in Blood to King Lewis might render him formidable from abroad, certainly there was no just Ground for Suspicion, the French being so lately entred into a particular Amity with England, and never having afforded either Comfort or Countenance to the young Earl's Exile. Then for any Claim to the Crown, the King could not fear him, his Title being of so impure and base a Metal, it could no way endure the Touch. His Mother, by whom only he could pretend, Heir indeed of the House of Somerset, but not of Lancaster, in regard the Stream of this Descent was poison'd in the very Spring: For John of Gaunt having entertain'd an Affection to Katherine, Daughter of Sir Paine de Ruct, during her Attendance on the Lady Blanch his first Wife: In the Life-time of his Second the Lady Constance, his Affection grew into a nearer Familiarity, and so happy was he, that his Familiarity proved not barren; his Mistress (for to what a Servitude doth Lust betray a Sinner?) making him Father of Three Sons and a Daughter, to whom he gave the Name of Beaufort, from a Castle he had in France, where they were born. The Duke zealous to reward any that had so well deserv'd, married his Bedfellow to Sir Hugh Swinford, a Lincolnshire Knight, and either thro' Impotency or Conscience, afterward refrain'd her Company. Some Years past (she having buried her Knight, and he his Dutches) in Gratitude to her former Merits being now grown very old, he took her again to his Bed, with the lawful Ceremonies of the Church: And thus his ancient Concubine became his new Bride, having righted her Honour, to leave no Monument of their Sin to Posterity, he laboured the Legitimation of the Children; and so far in the Time of Richard II. prevailed; that both the Sentence of the Church and Parliament pronounc'd them lawful, and enabled them to inherit the Lands of their Father, in Case his Issue by his former Wives should fail. The Eldest Son of the Three, thus legitimated, was John created Earl of Somerset, Father of John, Duke of Somerset, whose sole Daughter and Heir Margaret, married Edmond of Haddam, Earl of Richmond, whose Son Henry was now the Mark at which all the Arrows of the King's Suspicion aim'd.

By this Pedigree, to the Eye at first appears some Dawning of a Title; but certainly it is a false Light, such as oftentimes deceives the credulous Traveller. For the Legitimation by the Church was to take away as much of Scandal as possible from the Children, and a Dispensation only for the Benefit of the Bastards, without Prejudice to the Right of any other. For these Bastards were not of the Common Nature, such as an after-Marriage may make legitimate, being not Natural but Spurious, begot in Adultery on the one Side, and consequently incapable of any Benefit by Dispensation. Add to this that not being of the whole Blood (according to the Common Law of England) the House of Somerset was farther off from inheriting any Title from King Henry VI. than the most remote of the Line of York. Lastly, in the very Legitimation it self, the Children were only made capable to inherit the Estate of their Father, the Crown being never mention'd: And for the Dutchy of Lancaster they could not pretend, that being the Inheritance of the Lady Blanch his first Wife, from whom they no way descend'd (h); neither were the Princes of the House of Somerset ever numbred among the Plantagenets, or ever obtain'd so much as to be declared Heirs apparent to the Crown, if Henry VI. and his

(g) He married the Countess of Richmond, Widow to Edmond Tudor, Father to Earl Henry.
(h) The Words of the Act are so succeed to enjoy all Dignities, Lands and Inheritances that might descend from the Duke their Father. If the Crown is not mention'd, which would have been difficult to have been obtain'd, and might have put a Stop to the passing the Act of Legitimation, it seems to be implied.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15. Son Prince Edward should extinguish without Illue; as Mortimer had got to be before in the Reign of Richard the Second, and Delapole after, during the Usurpation of Richard the Third. And if there were any Cause of Suspicion from the Branches of that Family; then was the Duke of Buckingham, much more to be feared (i): Who was by his Mother Heir of Edmond, Duke of Somerset, and himself a Prince, mighty in Descent otherways from the Crown, as being Heir likewise of Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, younger Son to Edward the Third. Moreover in the Faction of a great Kindred, and Dependancy of a Multitude of Tenants, far more to be suspected, than an exil'd Lord, who claiming by his Mother, could during her Life have no Colour of a Title.

Duke of Brittain solicited to deliver the Earl of Richmond to King Edward.

But the King found the Wound of this Jealousie ranckle in him, and nothing but Richmond's Apprehension could heal it. He therefore most earnestly solicited the Duke of Brittain, by his Embassadors, of which Dr. Stillington was one, to return him into England: Their Motives were, the much good Will the Duke owed their Master, who never would forsake his Protection, tho' several Ways and at several Times most importunately provok'd. That he had in answer to the French Requests to that purpose protested; That if the Duke were any ways endanger'd by them, he would personally cross the Seas, and make the Quarrel the same, as if his own Kingdom were invaded. Then for the Innocency of the King's Intentions towards the Earl; they affirm'd that so far from Malice the Desire to have him returned into England was, that it merely tended to his present Safety and after Honour. In regard his Majesty would not only restore him to the Possessions of his Ancestors, but endear him in a nearer Tie, even by the Marriage of one of his own Daughters to him, and by this blessed Way absolutely root up all the ancient Rancour between the Houses of York and Somerset. This was the Pretension, which tho' the King no way intended, yet the Almighty afterwards made good; to instruct after Times, that the Deep Mysteries of cunning Princes are meer Illusions compared with true Wisdom; and the Disposition of Kingdoms is the Work of Heaven.

Earl of Richmond
delivered to K. Edward's Embassa-dors.

By this Dissimulation and tender of a large Sum of Money (for the King had learnt how to traffick by Example of K. Lewis) the poor Earl of Richmond was deliver'd up to the Embassadors, and immediately by them convey'd to St. Mado's, the next Haven Town, where instant Preparations were made for his Transportation into England. Here Fortune, or what is less uncertain, the Wind took Compassion on his Affliction (for the very Imagination of the Ruin he was betray'd to, had thrown him into a violent Fever) and hindred the Embassadors from taking Ship. Where while they remain'd joyful in the Success of their Undertaking, Peter Landois Treasurer to the Duke, in Appearance of a ceremonious Visit, but indeed to contrive the Earl's Escape, most officiously came to them. For no sooner had the Duke given up this innocent Victim to be sacrificed, but John Chenettes and some of the Court, sensible of the Law of Nations and their Master's Reputation, to himself related the Injury and Dishonour of this Action. And so far aggravated the perpetual Infamy that would cloud his Fame by selling his Guest to whom he had promised Safety and Protection; that the Duke repented the Delivery of him, and advised Landois by some Art to regain him.

And indeed Landois undertook the Employment readily, willing perhaps to gain the Honour of doing one good Deed among the Multitude of his Mischiefs; and likewise to revenge himself upon the evil Memory of the Embassadors, who had forgot by their Money to make him an Instrument in effecting this Treason. This Villain (for he was fittest for the Business) so order'd the Matter, that while he entertain'd the Embassadors in a most serious Discourse, the Earl was carried into Sanctuary; and no Notice given them till he was beyond their Reach. Which when they understood, finding themselves defrauded of so great a Bargain, and even of the Money laid out in the Purchase: Indignation transported them into bitter Language against Landois. But he excused himself of the Practice, and laid the whole Fault of the Misfortune upon their Negligence; desiring that their Carelessness in losing a Prey, might not be cast as a Crime upon that Respect he had shewed them in his Visit. And when the Embassadors importun'd him by his Authority to force the Earl from the Place; he pretended Religion to the Sanctuary, which if he should out of Honour to the English but offer to violate; so great was the Veneration the People hold it in, that they would tumultuously rise to prevent so bold a Sacrilege. He advised them therefore to give over this Game lost, and past play; and prepare their Excuse as cunning as possible to satisfy their King. And for his Part, to show the Zeal he bore to the Affairs of England, he would take such Order (and he knew it would stand with the Approbation of his Master) that the Sanctuary should be severely guarded; whence if the Earl endeavour'd an Escape it should be into some Place of Safety, where he should be strictly imprison'd, till the King of England were pleased otherwise to dispose of him. With this plausible Discourse Landois left the Embassadors to sail over, whom the Wind, now too late, serv'd to carry back. But the King, notwithstanding the fairest Colours they could lay upon the Business, and Promise on the Duke's Part to keep the Earl safe from Escape, cast upon them a sower Look. Misfortune to a Minister of State procuring for the most part as much Disgrace, as if he had been Perfidious in the Practice.

Frustrated of his Hope to gain Richmond into his Power, but yet in part freed from all Danger threatned by him, the King to give a Lustre to that Peace he had settled, began to addict himself to a profuse Hospitality: A magnificent way of Greatness, in which the Monarchs of this Kingdom have in all Ages exceeded all the Princes of Europe. And upon all solemn Times, when Cessation from Labour licenseth the Vulgar to admire the glorious Out-side of a State, he show'd a particular Bravery to the Eye; by presenting as well martial Exercises in Jufts,

(i) To shew the Weakness of this Argument against the Earl of Richmond's Title. Let us see what the Duke of Buckingham says of his own himself at his Conference with the Bishop of Ely, printed in Holmshead, pag. 746. My Mother being Eldest Daughter to Duke Edmond, I thought my self indubitate Heir to the House of Lancaster; but accidentally travelling to Worcester at the same Time that these Thoughts were in my Head, I met the Countess of Richmond the very Daughter and sole Heir of John, Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather's Elder Brother; so that she and her Son the Earl of Richmond I knew were Bars to my Claim of the Sovereignty: And of the Lancaster Line he says, That his Grandfather Duke Edmund was with King Henry the Sixth in the Two and Three Degrees from John, Duke of Lancaster, lawfully begotten.

A. D. 1475. Reg. 15. Tiltings, Turnaments, Barriers and the like; as the softer Entertainments of Wit, full of an elegant Curiosity for that Time subject to too much Tumult and Noise to give Birth to the best Inventions. But of all Solemnities the Feast of St. George, Patron of the noblest Order of the World, was celebrated with most Splendor and Pomp. Of which our common Chronicles are so liberal in the Relation, that they spare my Pen the Labour.

King Edward's Indulgence of his Lusts.

Among these Delicacies of Peace, the King forgot not to please his Lust (the Bastard of an idle Security;) and indeed impossible almost it was, that his Appetite flatter'd daily with all the Curiosities of Luxury, should contain it self severely within the Bounds of Modesty. For as by his other Actions we may judge, how little trouble his Conscience put him to; and therefore not easie to be frighted from Sin by Religion; so on the Part of his Body, they who familiarly knew him affirm, that never Man was framed by Nature more apt to the Exercise of Love, and whom amorous Courtship did less Misbecome. But Almighty God took not his natural Proneness to Lust, for an Excuse; but severely punish'd him in his Sons: Who were both dispossest of the Kingdom and their Lives by their unnatural Uncle: There being so much Appearance of Right in the Usurper by their Father's Incontinency; that even an Act of Parliament was made to bastardize them. And this sad Judgment was provoked by the Disorder of his Lust; to which how can we wonder if so easily he inclin'd, since Majesty seldom admits of any Instructions to a severe Correction of the Appetite?

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

Duke of Burgundy's Ambition to conquer his neighbouring Princes.

Ambition to extend their Dominions, hath been ever recorded the noblest Vertue in Princes: Who to lessen a Neighbour-State too mighty in the Growth of Empire, or in hope to conquer some Territory, to which the Convenience, not the Justice makes good the Title; without Scruple hazard large Armies of their People: And confidently boast the Victory, tho' the War were ground upon Injustice. While K. Edward lived at Home glorious in his Quiet, this Doctrine was listened to by Charles, Duke of Burgundy, in following which he made so many injurious and unfortunate Attempts. For after his Peace concluded with France, he directed his whole Power to the Destruction of the Duke of Lorraine. A Prince who in Favour of K. Lewis, to whose Fortune he had devoted his Service, defied the Duke of Burgundy, when he lay at the Siege of Nuz. And tho' this Design against Lorraine might carry with it all Probability of Success; considering the Narrowness of the Dutchy: Yet as it ought in Judgment to have been weighed with the Supports of France and other Confederates in Germany, it might bear a Face of much more Difficulty. For it had not only been a perpetual Dishonour to K. Lewis, but even a Disadvantage to his Affairs to permit a free Spoil of so near an adjoining Country to the Duke of Burgundy; whom for the present a blind Revenge transported beyond Reason, and made him war with all Cruelty, not only against Renatus, the Duke of Lorraine, where the Victory might in some Measure recompence the Cost; but against the Switzers, because they had sided with Lorraine, and made some Irruption into the Territories of the Burgundian. The Switzers, a poor People, unknown to the World, confin'd to a miserable Life among their cold and barren Mountains; only proud in Opinion they had of their Liberty, which was rather maintain'd by the Fortune of the Country inaccessible almost to an invading Army, than by the Valour of the People. Against these he led his Forces, rejecting all those submiss and deprecatory Embassies sent by them, and that free Acknowledgment of their Poverty, when they protested all the Wealth of their Country sum'd up to the highest Value, would not be able to buy the Spurs and Bridle-bits in his Camp. Fortune in the beginning of this Enterprize flatter'd him to a Continuance of the War with prosperous Success, intending by that glorious Bait only to allure him to Destruction. For soon the Chance of War turn'd, and in three Battels in one Year the unfortunate Duke was overthrown: In the last of which fought before Nancy, he was slain. A Prince who by his Alliance and continual Intercourse of Business, had much Relation to the English: Whose Honour, and Recovery of whose large Territories in France, he certainly from his Heart desired. And when he invited K. Edward into France to that Purpose, and there fail'd him of his promised Succours, it proceeded doubtless not from any under-hand Practice or Remissness in the Undertaking; but only by the Misfortune of his Army, somewhat broken not long before at the Siege of Nuz. He was therefore a Friend to us, if an ambitious Man can be said to be a Friend to any; or rather so great an Enemy to Lewis of France that he loved us only in Opposition; and desir'd our Prosperity, because it could not grow without Ruin to the French. How just a Governour he was in Peace appertains little to our Knowledge, and the World had little Leisure to consider; he was so everlastingly in Arms: In which as he shew'd great Courage and Judgment, so likewise did he commit much Injustice. And he who will examine what License War gives to Injury, and how it imposeth almost Necessity of doing Wrong; may in some sort excuse him. But his being ever in Quarrels, (into which he enter'd and continu'd, as his Passion, not his Reason directed him) argues his Spirit daring but turbulent, and his Valour rash and inconsiderate, and takes away all Pardon from his so many Errors. The two great Elemishes upon his Memory, are his Cruelty at Granfon in Lorraine, where in cold Blood he caus'd all the Inhabitants to be kill'd, the Town being yielded to his Discretion: And his Perfidiousness to the Count St. Paul, whom notwithstanding a safe Conduct he deliver'd up to Execution into the Hands of K. Lewis. The good Men who ascribe Punishment to the Justice of Heaven, observe that after these two Crimes his Fortune left him, and with Dishonour Death overtook him, when he least expected it. Having at that time in his Imaginations so many and so vast Designs, that scarce the Age and Fortune of Man had length and Power enough to accomplish them all.

The Switzers described.

Duke of Burgundy slain at Nancy His Character.

Duke of Burgundy's Cruelty and Falshood, and the Punishment of it.

The Count of St. Paul's Death, and the Effects of it.

The Death of this Prince, who had begot so much Business in his Life, diversly affected all the neighbouring Countries. Generally according to the Custom in private Families, every State entertain'd it with such a Passion, as the Advantage or Disadvantage appear'd by it to themselves. Some few out of Love to his Person, Hope of Marriage with his Daughter, or Compassion of humane Accidents, griev'd at the Report: But most expressed their Sorrow, for the Liberty King Lewis had attain'd by it, because no Man living now had the Power and Will to oppose him, should he attempt any Injury, and offer Violence to his weaker Neighbours. But King Edward was so infatuated by

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. 1476. by his Arts, that he never startled at this great Accident, nor look'd how nearly it might concern his own Safety; so that notwithstanding he were daily certified of new Undertakings by Kings Lewis, he rested quiet, and gave free Reins to his injurious Ambition, who, as soon as he understood the Death of Duke Charles, and perceived how open his Countries lay to an Invader, he pretended the Dutchy of Burgundy for want of Heirs-male devolv'd back to the Crown of France, and by the Arms of the Duke of Lorraine without further Dispute took it in: In the mean time himself seizing upon all Picardie, which for many Years had remain'd in Possession of Dukes Philip and Charles. And that he might have yet more Occasion of Quarrel with an unsettled Lady unable to withstand his Opposition, he summon'd the Princess Mary, Dutches of Burgundy to come in Person into France to do Homage for the County of Flanders, and her other Estates held in chief of that Crown.

K. Lewis seized upon the Dutchy of Burgundy at the Duke's Death.

But she knowing how unsafe it was to yield her Person up to a Prince, who made his Advantage of every Opportunity, delay'd the Homage, and stood upon her Guard as strongly as in so disorder'd a Country was possible. For though she were a Lady of many opulent and mighty Provinces, able if not to offend, yet to defend themselves against the World; yet were the People stubborn and prone to Rebellion, and who by the Weakness of some of their Princes heretofore, had purchased to themselves too large Immunities. And indeed scarce any Town, but had or pretended to have such Prerogatives, as debased all Authority of Government, which upon every Change in State they reviv'd, and endeavour'd if possible to redeem themselves from Subjection. And this Hope, more than ever now possessed them, considering the Unexperience both of the Youth and Sex of her that ruled; so that by Appearance of their churlish Carriage to the Dutches, and small Preparations against King Lewis, who every Day surpriz'd some Place or other, they rather desired to be expos'd a Prey to some insolent and cruel Enemy, than indure the mild Government of their lawful Princess. She therefore sent Ambassadors to implore Aid of King Edward, and declare to him the Urgency of her present Necessities. Who shew'd, That their Princess the greatest Heiress in the World, born to a large and rich Territory, was at present in a Condition beneath the poorest Subject that enjoyed but Liberty; being detain'd Captive by the Hands of such as made Restraint far more unsupportable, viz. of her own insolent Rebels. That her Deliverance concern'd the King of England in general as a Prince, and in particular as a Neighbour and an Ally. That her tumultuous Subjects, who had dar'd to attempt and act this Treason, took Courage from the French King's declar'd Enmity. An injurious Proceeding in a Prince against a Neighbour, which justly provokes all Christendom to unite in her Defence, and punish so barbarous a Proceeding in him. That the ancient League observ'd with so much Religion between England and the Low Countries, particularly did require his Majesty's present Aid; and a Consideration of what might happen perhaps in his own Posterity in the same Nature, did invite him to do Favours, as his might challenge to receive them hereafter. That even in the politick Discretion of Government, it was conceiv'd, that nearly it concern'd the State of England to provide against so dangerous an Addition of Dominion to the French, considering King Lewis had already most injuriously wrested away not only

She desires K. Edward's Assistance against K. Lewis and her Ambassadors urg'd it by many Arguments.

Peronne, Mountdidier, Tournay, and all the rest of Picardie sold heretofore to Duke Philip, but seiz'd even upon Burgundy the Inheritance of their Princess. And what expresseth the Inhumanity of the Tyrant, and the hated Malice of his Intentions, summons her at this present to do Homage personally for Flanders and her other Territories; which Summons if she obeys, she certainly betrays her self to an everlasting Captivity, or to a Necessity to surrender a large Part of her Inheritance for Redemption; and if she refuseth, she endangers her whole Estate to the Surprise of a merciless Enemy, who never wanted the Pretence of Justice to justify Spoil and Rapine. They farther urg'd, how their Princess was not only in her Person restrain'd by her own Subjects, but had not so much as any Appearance of an Army in the Field to oppose the Invader. The Soldier being absolutely destroyed in the former unfortunate Battels fought by her Father in Lorraine; and the Faith of all the Commanders who remain'd, bought up by King Lewis, and turn'd wholly French, with Surrender of the Towns and Forts under their Government. And all Hope of any Levies at home vain and false, the Commons by Practice of the French King every where in Tumult, and the few who wish'd well to their Princess's Affairs, either not daring to declare themselves, or suffering Death or Imprisonment for their Faith. They concluded with Intreaty, That the King would engage his Arms in so just a Quarrel; which, as it could not but most honourable to his Name and no way unprofitable, so likewise would it cast a perpetual Obligation upon their Princess, and devote her Power hereafter to his Service.

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16.

This Embassy carried with it every Way so much Justice, that it begot a general Approbation. For the Opinion was, that England never had so fair an Opportunity to win Honour to the Nation, relieve an oppressed Princess, check an insolent and unfaithful Neighbour, and provide for its own Safety. So that in the Court no Person of Honour, not corrupted with the French Pension, but passionately desired the Undertaking; and thought it necessary in every Point to begin this defensive War. But the King, who was in so deep a Lethargy that no Danger could wake him, nor Touch of Honour make him sensible, heard this with a fair Respect, and dismissed the Ambassadors with some faint Comfort. And tho' he could not but perceive what a Cloud it would be upon his Reputation to permit so foul an Injury to the young Princess, and sit still; yet he resolv'd to listen to the safer Counsels of Peace, and believe (how improbable soever) the many Protestations of King Lewis.

The Embassy of the Dutches of Burgundy approv'd by the Nobles, but not by the King.

Who, as soon as he understood of these Addresses made to England, which at the very first he expected, dispatch'd his Ambassadors to undo whatsoever had been wrought by the former Solicitation. And whereas the Dutches of Burgundy perswaded King Edward to this War by the Arguments of Honour and a generous Pity. He dissuaded it, by menacing an absolute Breach of the Peace sworn at Picquigny, whereby the King should be frustrated of his Tribute, and the so mighty Marriage of his Daughter. He shew'd farther, how it was not only against the so near Amity begun and likely to continue between them and their Posterity, but even against the Custom of common Confederacies, to oppose a neighbouring Prince in League, when he only attempted the Recovery of his own Right. And if the Truth of his Actions were laid open to the World, it would appear, that the Re-assumption of those Towns into the Power of France, (what Interpretation soever they might suffer among the ignorant or malicious,)

K. Lewis sends an Embassy to K. Edward to answer the Arguments of the Dutches of Burgundy.

A. D. 1476. Reg. 16. was but an Act of Justice; since those many Places in Picardie were no way of Right belonging to Duke Charles, but permitted him only to avoid the Continuance of War, which was notorious to any Man who would but call to Memory, how they were mortgaged to Duke Philip. The absolute Alienation of them from the Crown having never been either in the Will or Power of any French King. Then for the Duchy of Burgundy, the original Grant and the common Practice in France would manifest, that it only was conferr'd upon the Heirs Male; which failing in the present Dutcheſs, implies a Return of it back to the Crown, whence it paſt at firſt by an inconsiderate Tranſaction. Laſtly, that his taking Arms was only to recover and juſtify his Right, and reduce the Princeſs Mary to perform her Homage, which never was denied by any Earl of Flanders. And if there be any Infidelity or Tumult among her Subjects, ſhe ought either to blame the evil Diſpoſition of her People to Rebellion, or the Miſfortune of her own Government.

The Engliſh deſirous to relieve the Dutcheſs of Burgundy, cauſe a ſecond Embaſſy from France. This was the Effect of King Lewis his Answer at firſt, which the King was joyful to have divulg'd, becauſe it gave his Slowneſs to Action, a ſpecious Shew of Juſtice and Diſcretion. But the Relief of the oppreſſed Lady grew ſo much into the Deſire of the Commonalty, and even the better Sort of People bend- ed ſo much to Compaſſion, that the French began to ſuſpect the King might be induced to undertake her Protection. Whereupon new Ambaſſadors came with new Inſtructions ſome- thing more plauſible than the former, in which they were to keep the King upon any Terms at home. Theſe offer'd to his Maſteſty a full Relation of King Lewis his Proceedings hitherto, with Promise, 'To refer it wholly to him, if any Violence had been by the Licence of War committed. That their Maſter's Aim was ſo far from Injury, that he would ſubmit to in- different Judgment all the Paſſages in this Quarrel, and bind himſelf to any Reſtitu- tion the King of England ſhould order. For all his Deſire by theſe Arms was only the Re- duction of his own, and Maintenance of the Prerogatives of the Crown of France. And ever among theſe Excuses he mingled ſome Diſcourſe concerning the Dauphin, his ſo forward Growth, and the great Expectation of him; ſomething too of the Lady Elizabeth, and the Joy all France conceiv'd of the future Mar- riage. Neither was the Ceremony of paying the Tribute ever omitted at the Day, nor the great Lords forgotten to be preſented with Penſions, and ſomething too of Addition to in- crease their Diligence.

K. Lewis his Poli- cy to keep K. Edward from af- ſiſting the Dutcheſs of Bur- gundy. By theſe Arts he won Time, a Merchandize he then traffick'd for, and the Purchase of which ſo nearly concern'd his preſent Deſign: For it was his, and certainly a politick Courſe, to ſend often, and ſtill ſeveral Ambaſſadors; who, if in their Overtures they were contra- dictory, laid the Fault on their Inſtructions, and deſired reſpite, till they had ſome farther Un- derſtanding of their Maſter's Intentions: And when any new Thing was propoſed, they em- braced it, intreating only Time to inform the State of France. But when by frequent trea- ting, the Buſineſs was come oftentimes to Ne- ceſſity of abſolute Reſolution, then ſuddenly was the Ambaſſador recall'd, and ſome new Perſon ſent to ſupply his Place, wholly igno- rant, or at leaſt pretending to be wholly igno- rant of all former Paſſages.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17. At the length when he ſaw there was an Im- poſſibility farther to diſſemble, by pretending Reſtitution of whatſoever had been wreſted away from the Dutcheſs, he diſcover'd the Treachery of his former Carriage, and made Propoſitions advantageous to the King's Profit. Offering, 'If he would paſs the Seas with a full Army and join in the Quarrel, to defray half the Expence of the War, and never forſake the Engliſh, untill he had ſettled them in Poſ- ſeſſion of Flanders and Brabant, ſo that the Spoil might be equally divided between the Two Kings. In this one Overture he expreſſed the Deceit of his former Purchase, to make which good he tender'd ſo great a Brokage.

But the King reſuſed this Propoſition, not out of Conſcience unwilling to enter upon Eſtates to which he had no Title; nor Great- neſs of Spirit, diſdaining to make Advantage the Miſfortune of a Lady oppreſſed by an over- potent Neighbour, and forſaken by an ungrate- ful and diſobedient People, but only out of Con- ſideration of the Difficulty: Since the Towns were of Strength to make Reſiſtance againſt the moſt powerful Army, that every Fort would require much Time and Charge in the Gaining; and if gain'd would prove as coſtly and difficult to keep. The People, tho' naturally prone to Innovation, and upon the ſlighteſt Grounds ready to rebel, yet by no Art to be ſo tamed as to indure the Yoak of a Stranger. And if the Conquelt was ſtill to be made good by Gar- riſons of Engliſh, (the Natives being both un- ruly and unfaithful) it would draw much Blood and Treafure from England, and return neither Honour nor Profit. Nevertheless the King offer'd immediately to declare himſelf in common League againſt the Dutcheſs, and to lead over an Army Royal into her Territories, promiſing to ſhare in all future Danger if he might be admitted to ſhare in what was already conquer'd. But that the French denied as loath- ever to quit Poſſeſſion, yet never ſo perempto- rily reſuſed any Propoſition; as to leave the Engliſh, perſwaded by Diſpair, to enter into new Counſels; even in their Denials leaving ſome Way open to Expectation.

During this Time ſpun out to the utmoſt length by theſe tedious Negotiations, the French effected their Ends and almoſt undid the afflict- ed Princeſs. Who left no way untried that might lead her into a perfect Friendſhip with the Engliſh, and engage their Arms to her De- fence. Among the reſt ſhe tried one which be- ing ſingular in the Event deſerves a particular Obſervation. Either by her Commiſſion or Per- miſſion, a Motion was made of a Marriage be- tween her and George, Duke of Clarence, who had lately buried his Lady. By which very O-verture ſhe doubted not but the King ambitious of ſo ample a Fortune for his Brother, would run into her Quarrel. But, as ſometimes Phy- ſick miſapplied, it wrought a contrary Effect, and with other Circumſtances procured his Ru- in. For he having by the Levity of his Actions weaken'd his Reputation with the World in ge- neral, and particularly drawn a hatred from the Queen's Kindred upon him, the King and the Duke of Glouceſter likewiſe, having him either in Contempt or Jealouſie, ſtood in a manner a- lone. So that the very firſt Whiſpers of this Marriage were heard with Emulation by ſome, with Scorn by others, and with Diſlike by all. Which gave Occaſion that his Deſtruction was ſuddenly plotted, and almoſt as ſuddenly exe- cuted. For the King, altho' he ow'd his Reſti- tution to the Crown when he was expell'd from England, to the Duke's Revolt from Warwick; yet he remembered more perfectly the Unnatu- ralneſs of his firſt Rebellion: And howſoever Du-

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17. he showed outwardly all the Arguments of a reconcil'd Brother, yet certainly the Memory of the Injury at first done remain'd deeply imprinted in his Mind. So that Clarence by his after-Service never regain'd that Place in the King's Heart, which his former Disloyalty had forfeited. This he perceiv'd and repin'd against, and the King understanding that he repented the Truth, hated him yet the more: And so far grew this Hatred, that no Discourse was more harsh to the King's Ear than that of Clarence's Marriage with the Heir of Burgundy; by which it was suspected he being furnished with Power might hereafter prepare for Revenge. For according to the Disposition of Man he saw all his Actions in a flattering Glass: Looking upon his Revolt from his Brother, as an Error of seduced Youth; and on his Return back, as on so great a Merit, that it lay scarce in the King's Power to recompence: The King enjoying by it all the Greatness he possessed.

Duke of Gloucester's Policy to hasten Clarence's Fall. Richard, Duke of Gloucester, upon whose Nature and Friendship he built most, deceived him most. For Gloucester, who studied nothing but his own Purposes, and cared not by what Violence all Obstacles of Nature and Friendship were remov'd, so the Way were plain'd to his Ambition; endeavour'd to add more Poison to their Discontent: Knowing that bad Intentions never receive Growth but from Mischief. He therefore perswaded him to be sensible of the King's Neglect, and boldly to express his Resentments: A silent Patience being in a Subject Loyalty, but in a King's Brother Cowardize. While on the other Side he whisper'd in the King's Ear the Danger of Clarence's Spirit apt to receive any Discontent, and wanting only Power to seek unlawful Remedies; and whatsoever Counsel came from him was receiv'd by the King with more Attention and Belief, in regard of his great Judgment and Professions of Love to his Brother. And indeed Gloucester much disdain'd the Advancement of Clarence this Way, not that he had any particular Ground for Malice, but only that he hated any Man, and especially a Brother, should have the Start of him in Fortune.

The Queen and her Kindred's Malice against Clarence. But the Queen and her Kindred shallower in their Spleen, spoke loud against him; while Gloucester deep in Mischief was not heard to murmur. For they suggested continually to the King with what Contempt they were treated by Clarence, how all their Honours were mention'd as Mockeries: As if the King wanted Power to confer his Favours according to the Discretion of his own Bounty. They urged the Memory of his Rebellion at his first Marriage with Warwick's Daughter, and the much more Danger of his Intentions in affecting so much Greatness in the Second. And so far by Aggravations of every slight Error they wrought, that the King was willing to have his Brother suffer; but only wanted some Offence capital enough to make his Death appear an Act of Necessity and Justice, not of Plot and Malice.

The Cause of the Duke of Clarence's Death. It is generally receiv'd among the Vulgar, and wants not the Approbation of some Chronicles, that the chief Ground of the King's Assent to his Death was the Misinterpretation of a Prophecy: Which foretold that one, the first Letter of whose Name was G. should usurp the Kingdom and dispossess K. Edward's Children.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17. Of which there is much of Probability; however by his other Actions I should not judge the King easie to believe in such Vanities. For Credulity in that Nature, falls for the most part upon weak Minds, as those of Women and Children; or upon the timorous, whose Apprehensions are soften'd to receive every slight Impression; or upon the Over-zealous, whom an Evil regulated Piety bends to Superstition. And with these three the King had no Participation in Humour. Yet this serv'd for the present, and carried with it a strong Accusation against the Duke; for this Prophecy was alledged to be spoken by some of his Servants, who by Necromancy had understood this from the Devil: Which with other Circumstances serv'd to hasten the King to this foul Mischief.

The Duke was in Ireland, the Country that gave him Birth, during the Time of these Contrivances, not suspecting any Design against himself. Upon his Return to the Court he understood that Thomas Burdet (k) of Arrow in the County of Warwick, Esquire, who ever was dependant upon him and ran his Fortune, had been in his Absence apprehended, indicted, arraign'd and executed (l) all in the Compass of two Days. The Crime upon which his Accusation was principally grounded, were inconsiderate Words by which upon a Report, that the white Buck in which he much delighted was killed as the King was hunting in his Park, he wish'd the Head and Horns and all in the King's Belly, whereas indeed he wish'd it only in his Belly, who counsel'd the King to kill it. With this Accusation were mingled many other of Poisoning, Sorceries, and Inchantments: Crimes which every judicious Man easily perceiv'd, were only put in the Scale like Grains, to make his rash Language full Weight, which otherwise would have been too light to deserve the Sentence of Death. These Proceedings Clarence resented, as they were intended, and expostulated with the King about the Injustice done to his Servant, and Injury to himself. And according to the Custom of Expostulations, his Words were bold and disorderly, and having receiv'd an apparent Injury, built too much on the Right of his Cause, and provok'd the King too far into Indignation; so that soon after he was committed close Prisoner to the Tower, where being by Act of Parliament attainted, he was secretly put to death. The Manner, as it is generally received, was by Thrusting his Head into a But of Malmesey, by which he was stifled (m).

In his Attainder, according to the Form, are Crimes enough to make his Death have Appearance of Justice, the Execution of which the King seem'd rather constrain'd to, than to have sought. For there are reckon'd, how the Duke of Clarence to bring the present Government into Hatred with the People, and thereby the present State into Trouble; had not only in his Speeches frequently laid Injustice to the King's Charge in attainting Thomas Burdet falsely, convict of many notorious Treasons, but suborn'd many of his Servants and divers others, corrupted with Money, to divulge the like seditious Discourses; That he had spread Abroad impious Rumours that the King dealt by Necromancy, and upon Offence against such of his Subjects, whom by Order of Law he could not

(m) His Body was exposed lying on his Bed, to amuse the People, as if he dy'd of Melancholy; but the Attainder and the King's Temper rendred that Artifice ineffectual.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17. destroy, he was accusom'd to take away by Poyson; That he had not rested there, but thereby to advance himself to the Kingdom, and for ever to disable the King and his Posterity from the Crown, had contrary to Truth, Nature and Religion, Viper-like destroying her who gave him Life, publish'd that the King was a Bastard and no way capable to Reign; That to make this his so monstrous Ambition more successful and already to begin his Usurpation, he had caused many of the King's Subjects to be sworn upon the most blessed Sacrament to be true to him and his Heirs, without any Exception of their Allegiance; after which so solemn Oaths, he discover'd to them his Resolution to right himself and his Followers, who had both suffered by the King's violent wresting away their Estates: And in particular to revenge himself upon the King, who (as he most impiously and falsely suggested) had by Art-Magick contrived to consume him, as a Candle consumeth in burning. And, what most expressed the Treason of his Designs, that he had got out an Exemplification under the great Seal of Henry VI. late King; wherein was shewed how by the Parliament it was enacted, that if the said Henry and Edward his Son should die without Issue-male, the Kingdom should descend upon the Duke of Clarence and his Heirs; whereby clearly appear'd his Intention, immediately to possess himself of the Crown, with Destruction of King Edward and his Children by Pretence of a general Election of the Commonwealth. This was the Sum of his Attainder, which we may well believe had not so easily past but by the King's publick declaring himself, the secret working of the Duke of Gloucester, and the passionate Urging of the Queen's Kindred. But this Attainder hath in it one Thing most Remarkable, that Clarence here falsely was accused, of laying Bastardy to the King, to endeavour Possession of the Crown: Which afterward was alledg'd indeed by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, to the absolute Disinherit of the King's Sons. Whereby God's severe Judgment manifests, how unsafe it is in a Prince, by false Accusations to condemn an innocent, or but to aggravate the Fault of one less Guilty, to the End that Cruelty may be reported an Act of Justice.

The Crimes alledged false.

Duke of Clarence's Death every where condemn'd.

The Death of this Prince being sudden and extraordinary, begot every where an extraordinary Censure; the unnatural severity, taking away all Excuse, even from their Discourse, who most favour'd the King. At Home it was generally condemn'd, both in regard of the Manner, it being prodigious to be drown'd without Water, upon dry Ground, and the Quality of the Person: He being the First Brother to a King in this Country, that ever was attainted. And what increased the Murmur, a Faction appear'd at Court triumphing in his Ruin, all the Accusations were strangely wrested, and no matter of Fact, scarce an Intention prov'd against the State. Whereupon this Punishment was thought to have been inflicted upon him for no new Attempt: His first taking Part with Warwick, being his only Crime. For which War, tho' somewhat against Nature, he had many Examples in France, Spain, and other Parts of Christendom: Whereas for the Death of a younger Brother, upon bare Suspicion, the King could borrow no Precedent nearer then the Turkish Government. But Clarence imagin'd the Privilege of his Birth a sufficient Defence against Danger, and omitted to fortifie himself with Faction; which laid him open to every Assault of Envy. And because he had heretofore been in Opposition against the King, the Liberty in censuring any Defect in Government was interpreted a Desire to be in Arms again. Every Word of Distast being held Criminal in him, from whom the King was alienated by his own Disposition, open Invectives of the Queen's Kindred, and secret Trains of the Duke of Gloucester; who now began to look high over all Respects of Nature and Religion. He was certainly ambitious beyond Proportion, which made him so attentive to any new Counsels, and of an easie Nature, which render'd him apt by Practice to be wrought to Mischief. He was a good Master, but an uncertain Friend; which delivers him to us to have been, according to the Nature of weak Men, sooner perswaded by an obsequious Flattery, than a free Advice. We cannot judge him of any evil Nature, only busie and Inconstant, thinking it a Circumstance of Greatness to be still in Action. He was too open-breasted for the Court, where Suspicion looks thro' a Man, and discovers his Resolutions tho' in the Dark, and lock'd up in Secrecy. But what was his Ruin, he was, whether the House of York or Lancaster prevail'd, still second to the Crown: So that his Eye by looking too stedfastly on the Beauty of it became unlawfully enamour'd with it; and that being observ'd by the King's jealousy, he suffer'd as if he actually had sinned. He left two Children by the Earl of Warwick's Daughter, Edward, who inherited his Grandfather's Honour, and was beheaded in the Reign of Henry the Seventh, and Margaret afterwards by Henry the Eighth created Countess of Salisbury, who was marry'd to Richard Pool of the Welsh Family of the Pools.

A. D. 1477. Reg. 17.

His Character.

While this Mischief was secretly in contriving against Clarence, in the Court appear'd no Face, but that of Jollity and Magnificence. For at that Time was Edward eldest Son to the King (during Christmas, to mingle the Solemnity with Liberty) inaugurated Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester; and his younger Brother Richard, created Duke of York; The Fate of their Honour and their Ruin, being still the same. At this Creation according to the Ceremony, many young Lords and Gentlemen of principal Name were made Knights of the Bath, among whom Brian Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, and Littleton, that learned Father of the Laws, are registred.

But the publick Glory of these extraordinary King Edward's Pomps, and the Wontonness of his private Pleasures could not be maintain'd with the ordinary Revenue. Therefore to make good the Expence of his own Errors, the King began to look narrowly into those of his Subjects; that by this Art, in a manner, he might sin upon free Cost. And as it hath been a certain Observation, that the most delicate and voluptuous Princes have ever been the heaviest Oppressors of the People; Riot being a far more lavish Spender of the common Treasure, than War or Magnificence; so those Parts of the King's Life, which were wanton'd away with variety of Delights, are noted to have been severest. But perhaps the Subject repents not the free Gift of the Kingdom's Substance, when he sees the Return of it in Triumph; but repines if the least Part of his Contribution be the Reward of Parasites, or Persons to whom Fortune, not Merit gives a Growth. And Historians likewise have more Leisure to examine the Crimes of Princes in the Silence of Peace, than in the Noise of War: Or else Princes want

King Edward's private Pleasures put him upon Severity to his Subjects.

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. Opportunity to inclose their Thoughts to the study of private Gain, when the Soldier in a Manner lays the Wealth of the Kingdom open, and makes a Common of every Man's particular Treasure. For now the King began to cause the Penal Laws to be put in Execution, and wanting higher Aims, to look downward into every fordid Way of enriching himself; so that a general Fear possessed the People, that his after-Government would be both sharp and heavy, considering the first Part of it was not without a foul Blemish in that Kind. For in the Seventh Year of his Reign, he proceeded against many of the wealthiest Citizens with so much Severity, that it was reputed Tyranny. The chief of them were Sir Thomas Cook, Sir John Plumer, Knights, Humphrey Henward and other Aldermen. And their Crime was, their having given Assistance to King Henry: Which, considering the Circumstance of Things could hardly bear any capital Accusation had it been clearly proved: But against these Men there was no Testimony but what was forc'd with Torture; and even that Testimony, not high enough to bring them to the Bar; yet the King commanded them to be arraign'd of High Treason at Guild-Hall; and withal expressed an earnest Desire, that upon any Terms they might be found guilty. Their Wealth being the principal Witness that gave Evidence against their Lives: But the Jury well directed by Sir John Marckham, Knight, chief Justice of the King's Bench, acquitted them of their Treason: Which, nevertheless released them not, their Estates however were found guilty, and the greatest Part escheated to the King. With the Offenders the Judge was condemn'd, and because he prefer'd his Integrity before a severe Command, made Forfeiture of his Dignity.

The Memory of these Carriages heretofore, in a Business that concern'd the Life of a Man reputed innocent, drew the World into much Fear that he would now decline to Rigour. Neither was the King totally excused, although this cruel Avarice was laid to the Queen, who, having a numerous Issue and Kindred, by Favour raised up to the highest Titles, was almost necessitated for Supportance of their Honours, to wrack the Kingdom. And happily the universal Malice that waited on her and hers, serv'd well for the King; they being as a Screen between him and the unwholesome Air of Envy, which otherwise might have endanger'd his Reputation with the People.

From this rugged Way of Governing, he was soon diverted by Necessity to look abroad, and perhaps by the Gentleness of his Nature, or Repentance of his former Severity. For the Face of the World adjoining began on the sudden to change, and while the Kings of England and France were dividing the Territories of the Dutchess of Burgundy, a Third step'd in, and got Possession of her and her rich Country, Maximilian, Archduke of Austria, Son to the Emperor Frederick III. entertain'd heretofore politickly by Duke Charles, was now seriously invited to this Marriage. For the Lady dispairing to receive Succours from the English, to the Affection of whom she was perhaps inclin'd by the Neighbourhood of the Country, and Perswasion of the Dutchess Dowager, whom deservedly she much honoured, condescended in the end to the Desire of her Subjects, who ever laboured to marry her to some Prince of Germany, in regard of the Nearness in Language, and Concordance in Dispositions. And although the hereditary Countries of this Prince lying far remote, were unlike to be any Support to her weakned State; yet considering him as Son to the Emperor, and in all Probability like to succeed (for in an elective Kingdom scarce ever is the Heir put by, if equally deserving) he might appear necessary to her present Affairs. For he was young, of a noble Spirit, strong and healthful in Constitution, bold in any Attempt of Honour, and what won upon the Affections of the Low-Country Men, extraordinary affable and courteous. I know both his Actions and the Histories of that Time deliver him to us of no deep Judgment, and so negligent, that he ever left Things imperfect, oftentimes in main Business betrayed by his Credulity. But this I impute to him as an Error of the Climate under which he was born, and a certain generous Honesty, which is above Suspicion. The Motion of this Marriage was embraced with much Joy, to the Accomplishment of which he instantly prepared. Neither could King Lewis with all his Engines batter the Resolution of the Emperor, who, tho' a most passionate Lover of Peace, (which oftentimes he bought with Loss) ran the Hazard of a War from France, rather than let his Son lose the Advantage of so great a Country. And suddenly sent him to the Dutchess, attended by many great Commanders, who among a People so oppressed with Arms, would be the best Witnesses of a Marriage. His Presence, altho' it did not absolutely turn the Stream of Fortune, yet gave a Stay to the French Conquests: And after he appear'd in the Quarrel, Victory doubtfully inclin'd, sometimes flattering Maximilian, at other Times King Lewis. Maximilian by his brave Valour, overtaking Lewis, who had the Start in Experience and Policy: So that frequent Truces were concluded between them, and unfaithfully observ'd; the first Opportunity of Advantage renewing the War.

Lewis handled these Businesses apart, never admitting King Edward, tho' he ever officiously labour'd to interests himself in them, into any Part of the War or Peace. For, as he knew the Strength of his Understanding such, that he in Treaty could lose nothing by the Arch-Duke; so he well consider'd, that the safest Way to preserve the English in Amity, was to keep them at home. Whereupon, he frequently entertain'd the King with Embassies full of Courtesie; such as might appear rather the Arguments of a sincere Friendship than the forc'd Expressions of Ceremony; and ever communicated with him his private Counsels, requiring his faithful Advice; when indeed he reserv'd his Resolutions of any high Nature wholly to himself, and always in the Conduct of Affairs, tho' he would listen to the Opinion of King Edward, he still obeyed his own. But this, with his other Arts continu'd his Reputation good with the English, and purchased that Quiet, he suspected might by our Arms be interrupted.

And what render'd his Security the more, Troubles began between us and Scotland; which we may well believe he underhand increased. The Occasion of them was, the evil Inclination and ungovern'd Spirit of James III. who disdain'd to listen to the temperate Counsels of sober Men, obeyed only his own Judgment, which his Passion threw headlong into rash Attempts. The Freedom of Advice by the Lords of that Country used toward their Princes, render'd the Speaker hateful; and frequently was rewarded with Imprisonment or Exile, if not with Death. A. D. 1479. Reg. 19. cast out of Favour by him, Alexander, Duke of Albany, the King of Scotland's Brother, banish'd into France, resent'd the Injury, and endeavour'd Revenge. So that as he pass thro' England towards his Exile, being admitted to the King, by all Arguments he incens'd him to a War, which could not but prove most successful, the Hatred of the Commons consider'd, against so violent an Oppressor. And he protested, That he knew the King fallen into so low Esteem even with those he cherish'd, and into such Hatred with all Mankind, that if assaulted by the English, he would be constrain'd by Submission of his Crown to intreat for Safety.

War with Scotland determin'd, and the Duke of Gloucester sent General. This Importunity of the Duke of Albany soon prevail'd with the King; who by many Injuries had been exasperated, and had only waited Opportunity to make War upon Scotland. For the Borders on the English Side had been often infested, and upon Complaint no Redress, nor Reparation of Damage made. Moreover, the King having heretofore condescended, upon a Motion from King James, That his Second Daughter the Lady Cicily, should marry James, Prince of Scotland, and upon the Agreement paid in a large Part of the Portion, had receiv'd no Satisfaction to his Expectation; the Articles of Marriage neither being performed, nor yet the Money lent upon the Bonds of the Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh, according to Covenants repaid. He was therefore the sooner won to undertake the Business, which he committed to the Order of the Duke of Gloucester, who now had no Competitor in Greatness both of Judgment and Power: No Prince of the House of Tork remaining, but such whom the Want of Years, or Love of Ease indispos'd to Action. For the King willing to decline Labour, wav'd the Expedition; and Gloucester ambitious to gain Opinion, especially with the Soldier, most forwardly undertook it. The King desired to live to the best Advantage of his Pleasure; Gloucester of his Honour. And indeed, Gloucester began now like a cunning Physician, to examine the State of the King's Body; which, tho' he found strong and healthful, and by the ordinary reckoning of Men likely to continue many Years, yet withal he observ'd evil Symptoms of Death in him, being overgrown with Fat, and both in his Diet and Lust subject to Disorder: Disorder a greater Enemy to Mankind, and which hath destroyed more than Age, the Sword, or Pestilence. This Gloucester perceiv'd, and hence drew Poison, which swell'd his Ambition higher.

A. D. 1480. Reg. 20. Duke of Gloucester marches against Scotland with an Army. He therefore with much Alacrity prepared for the War, and with the Title of Lieutenant General, soon after set forward toward Scotland. The Army consisted of 22500, all commanded by Men of great Authority and Experience. Of the Nobility in his Retinue went Henry, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas, Lord Stanley, Lord Steward of the King's House; the Lords Lovell, Graistock, Fitzhugh, Nevill, and Scroope of Bolton: Of Knights, Sir Edward Woodville, Brother to the Queen; Sir William Par, Sir John Elrington, Treasurer of the King's House; Sir James Harrington, Sir John Middleton, Sir John Dichfield and others. The particular Names of whom I mention, only to shew how great a Shadow Gloucester began to cast toward the Sunset, both of the King's Glory and Life. The Vanguard was led by the Earl of Northumberland, the Rereward by the Lord Stanley, the main Battel by the Duke himself; in whose Company was the Duke of Albany; Gloucester willing perhaps to have him still in Sight, least if apart, with Sale of the Army, he might purchase his own Peace.

Their first Attempt was upon Berwick (surrender'd heretofore by Queen Margaret to gain a Sanctuary for King Henry, when he was expell'd England) into which, partly by Terror of their Forces, partly by the Suddenness of their Approach, they enter'd without Opposition. The Town was soon at their Discretion; but the Castle, the strongest Fort then in the North, by the Earl Bothwell, was made good against all Battery. Gloucester foreseeing by the Strength both of the Place, and the Commanders Resolution, that this Siege would spend much Time, committed the Charge to the Lord Stanley, Sir John Elrington, and Sir William Par, with 4000 Soldiers; while he with the Body of the Army march'd higher into Scotland, perswaded, as indeed it happened, that they might force the King of Scotland either to an inglorious Flight, or else for Safety to lock himself up in some strong Hold. By which they might so imprison him, that his Release should not be without a full Discharge for all Injuries both against England and the Duke of Albany. And according to Expectation it happen'd, the King upon the first Rumour of an Enemy, inclosing himself in the Castle of Edinburgh. For in his Government having not studied the Safety of his People (which is the supream Law given to Kings) he found himself now forsaken by them, so far, that in Opposition to the English, against whom the Scots ever shew'd a fair Resolution, no Army now took the Field, the Country lying open to the Mercy of the Invader.

Gloucester therefore, burning many Towns by the Way to strike a Terror, in the Inhabitants; march'd directly to Edinburgh; into which he enter'd, receiving such Presents as the Citizens offer'd to him; for at the Intreaty of the Duke of Albany, he spared the Town from Spoil. His Entry was only a Spectacle of Glory, the people applauding the Mercy of an Enemy, who presented them with a Triumph, not a Battel; and welcom'd him as a Prince, who took Arms not for Prey or Malice, but for the Safety of a neighbouring Kingdom, disorder'd and laid waste more by the License of a Tyrant in Peace, than it could have been by the Hand of War. The Lords of Scotland considering the Danger of their State, and desirous to prevent Ruin, sent from Haddington to the Duke of Gloucester to intreat a Suspence of Arms, and to desire a firm Peace in future. They there offer'd, if the Occasion of beginning this War, were as it was pretended; to give the English full Satisfaction: So that he could have no Colour of continuing in Hostility, but only a Desire to execute his Indignation upon a Country, already sufficiently destroy'd. For concerning the Marriage, they were prepared when it should please the King of England to accomplish it; and for any other Injury offer'd to the English, they were ready to make Restitution. The Duke of Gloucester return'd in Answer, That his coming thither was to right the Honour of his Country, often violated by the Scots, and restore the Duke of Albany unjustly commanded to Exile, to his native Soil and the Dignity of his Birth. As for the Marriage of the Prince of Scotland with the Daughter of England, he knew not how his Brother's Resolution stood at the present: Whereupon he required Repayment of the Money lent to land their King upon the first Agreement; and withal a delivery of the Castle of Berwick up into his Hands; without which he protested to come to no

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. 1480. Reg. 20. But the Scottish Lords laboured by all Means to have avoided the Surrender of a Place so important, by pretending how anciently it ever appertain'd to their Crown, by parting with which now they should appear at too dear and base a Price, to have purchased Peace. No Argument could prevail against Gloucester's Resolution; whereupon they yielded Berwick, with Covenant too by no Art hereafter to labour the Reduction of it. They likewise appointed a Day for Restitution of all those Monies lent by King Edward, and promised upon a full Discussion, to make Satisfaction for all Damages done the English by any Inroad of the Scottish Borderers. And for the Duke of Albany's Provision, whose Safety in this Expedition was principally pretended; (a) a general Pardon for him and his Followers was granted, together with an Abolition of all Discontents: Whereby he was reinvested in all his former Dignities and Places; and by consent of the Nobility of Scotland proclaim'd Lieutenant of the Kingdom.

Duke of Albany restored.

Duke of Gloucester engages the Duke of Albany to his friendship.

Duke of Gloucester returns to London, and with great Applause is received.

With this Lord the Duke of Gloucester endeavour'd to make a most entire Friendship, and by all industry imploy'd for his Advancement in Authority, studied how to make him firm to his Purposes, if Occasion should hereafter present it self to require his Aid: And questionless, howsoever the Fortunes of these two Dukes accorded not in every Point, yet there was in their Ambitions some kind of Sympathy. Both being Brothers to Kings, and both the Kings by the Intolency or Licentiousness of their Actions become obnoxious to a publick Scandal. But Albany had the Advantage in a more deserv'd and universal Hatred to the King his Brother, whereby he might not improbably expect to be King in Fact, however his Brother were in Title. And Gloucester had the Start in that the King's Brother's Ease apparently tended to the shortning of his Life; and then he, remaining the only Prince of the Blood fit to govern, was not unlikely to govern as King both in Fact and Title. To the Advancement of such a Design, a perfect Amity with Scotland, Gloucester could not but imagine most necessary.

Having therefore settled Business there with all increase of Glory to the English Name, (and by Consequence to his own) he return'd to Berwick; which according to the former Agreement had been yielded to the Lord Stanley. Thence in all solemnity of Greatness he came towards London, to yield an Account of his prosperous Enterprize. By the Way he permitted the Honour of this Action to be divulged with the greatest Applause, thereby to insinuate his Reputation into the Opinion of the Commons; and to show how much more nobly he in this Expedition against Scotland had managed the Peace for the Honour of the English Nation, than his Brother had in his Undertaking against France. Considering that in Lieu of a little Money, which King Edward got from King Lewis, he had taken the only Place of Strength whereby the Scots might with Safety to themselves have endanger'd us, and brought them to what Conditions he pleased, forcing the King to immure himself, while the English at Liberty spoil'd the Country, and possessed themselves of his capital Town of Edenborough. And farther by Gloucester's Flatterers it was urged, that if their General had but had Commission ample enough, he would not have return'd without Reduction of the Kingdom of Scotland to the Crown of England. Obedience to a superior Command fixing so sudden a Period to his Actions. And certainly in this Expedition the Duke of Gloucester laid the Foundation of all his after-Atchievements: For here having by a free Spoil of every Town, except only Edenborough, purchased the Affection of the common Soldiers, whose Aim in War is Gain and License; and by sober Order and great Courage, together with a brave Zeal ever to bring Honour to his Side, won Estimation from the nobler Sort; he began to imagine himself reputed generally only unhappy in wanting a good Title to the Kingdom. The Difference between him and his Brother, was, that the one possessed, the other deserv'd the Crown. And his Thoughts farther flatter'd him, that it could not prove hereafter Difficult, upon any handsome Occasion to persuade the People, who already thought him Worthy, also to think it fit to make him King.

But these his black Intentions came not yet to Light; and indeed they were so monstrous, that they would not only have manifested the Ugliness of their Shape had they now appear'd; but like imperfect and deform'd Births, been buried, as soon as produced. Cunningly therefore by Pretences of a most serious Love to his Brother, and publicly ascribing the whole Glory of the Action to his Direction, he declin'd Suspicion. Being welcom'd by the King with all the Demonstrations of Joy, who congratulated his own Felicity in having with so little Charge and no Loss, tamed all the Infolency of the Scots, and reduced Berwick. He therefore to show how much he approv'd the Conditions of the Peace, went solemnly in Procession from St. Stephen's Chappel accompany'd with the Queen and a mighty Retinue of the greatest Lords into Westminster-Hall; where in Presence of the Earl of Angus, the Lord Grey, and Sir James Liddall, Embassadors extraordinary from Scotland the Peace was ratified.

During the War with Scotland, and after the Conclusion of this Peace, the King discover'd to the People his natural Disposition. Which being Bountiful and Courteous, far from the proud State then in Practice with the Tyrants of the East; begot a general Affection, and made the Subject comparing their Felicity, with the Misery of their Fathers, to bless the present Government. The Administration likewise of the Laws being orderly, without Violence or Partiality, caused all the former Injustice to be cast either upon the License of War, or the Predominancy of some Faction; and the King absolutely acquitted in Mens Opinion. And even from Lust, which was reputed his Bosom-sin, towards the latter end of his Life, he was somewhat clear: Either Conscience reforming him, or by continual Satiety grown to a Loathing of it: For the Abstinence could not be imputed to Age, he at his Death not exceeding Two and Forty. But what endear'd him so much to the Affection of the People, and especially to the Citizens of London, was his being rich by his Tribute from France, and therefore not likely to lie heavy on them; as likewise the so fam'd Bounty of his Hospitality; Two thousand Persons being daily serv'd in his Court at Eltham, where most solemnly he celebrated the Feast of the Nativity. And to recompence the great Love which in both Fortunes the Londoners had show'd him, to his last Hour he us'd towards them a particular Kind-

Reg. 21. ness: Even so much, that he invited the Lord Mayor (o) and Aldermen, and some of the principal Citizens to the Forrest of Walsham, to give them a Friendly not a pompous Entertainment. Where in a pleasant Lodge they were feasted, the King himself seeing their Dinner serv'd in; and by thus stooping down to a loving Familiarity, sunk deep into their Hearts: Ordinary slight Courtesies, order'd thus to the best Advantage, taking more often even with sound Judgments than churlish Benefits. And that the Sex he always affected might not be unremembred, he caused great plenty of Venison to be sent to the Lady Mayores and the Aldermen's Wives.

The Queen's Pride and Indiscretion. Thus was the Outward Face of the Court full of the Beauty of Delight and Majesty; while the Inward was all rotten with Discord and Envy. For the Queen by how much she consider'd her self more unworthy the Fortune she enjoy'd, by so much she endeavour'd in the exterior height of Carriage to raise her self; foolishly imagining Pride could set off the Humility of her Birth. She was likewise (according to the Nature of Women) Factionous; as if her Greatness could not appear clear enough without Opposition. And those she oppos'd were the chiefest both in Blood and Power; the Weaker she disdain'd to wrastle with, and they fearful to contest with her. But what subjected her to an universal Malice, was the Rapine, which the necessary Provision of her Kindred engaged her to. For they being many and great in Title could not be supplied according to their Ambition, but by so common an Injury as made her Name odious through the Kingdom. Moreover the Lords of her Blood, by reason of their Nearness to the King's Children being insolent, and in regard of their Youth, indiscreet; frequently ran into those Errors which betray'd them to the publick Scorn or Hatred. Against the Queen (for through her Kindred they aim'd at her) the Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Hastings, and others of the most ancient Nobility oppos'd themselves. And to render both her and hers odious, Gloucester laid the Death of the Duke of Clarence (which Fratricide himself most barbarously contriv'd) altogether upon their Malice; pretending a more than ordinary Caution for his own Safety, lest his Person might by the same Practices be brought in Danger. By which Calumny he both clear'd his own Reputation, and clouded the Fame of a Faction he endeavour'd so much to ruin. For this Side had much the Start in Opinion and Policy, over the other, who were Young, and unexperienced; and the President of whose Council was a Woman.

King Edward's Grief for the Quarrels among his Kindred. To compose these Quarrels it begot the King much Trouble: Neither could he without extream Anxiety hear the continual Complaints of Persons so considerable both in Power in the Kingdom, and Kindred to his Children, not knowing to how dangerous a Height this Discord in time might grow. But to increase his Discontent every Day his Jealousie increased Reg. 22. concerning King Lewis's Faith, who now began to unmask his Intention, and show how much he had deluded the English. For having ever since Maximilian's Marriage with Mary, Dutches of Burgundy, been upon unkind Terms with him; sometimes at open War, other times in an unfaithful Truce, he was now growing to an absolute Peace. And the Conditions were whisper'd contrary to the Treaty at Picquigny, which made the King suspicious they two might enter into some League prejudicial to the Honour of the English. For Maximilian having kept Lewis all the Life-time of his Lady, from any further incroach upon her Territories, and by his Fortune gotten into Opinion with the French, grew to be much desired in the nearest Friendship by them: And he having buried his Dutches (who owed her Death to her Modesty, in respect that having broke her Thigh by a Fall from a Horse, she denied to expose it to the Sight of Chirurgeons) was willing to stand upon good Terms with France. Knowing how slender and how unfaithful an Obedience those Countries would yield to a Prince, who was to rule by Courtelie; since to their natural Lords, they had ever shewed themselves Insolent and Rebellious. These Considerations prepared both Sides to Peace, and the Conclusion of it to beget a more perfect Amity was that the Lady Margaret, a Child of two Years Old, Daughter to Maximilian and the Dutches of Burgundy, should be affianced to the Dauphin, then upon the Age of Twelve. So that King Lewis in the Marriage of his Son, was ever most Disproportionable; the Daughter of England as much too old, as this Lady too young; but indeed his End was the same with Charles, Duke of Burgundy and many other wordly Fathers, to match his son for the best Advantage of his Profit and Convenience.

To confirm the uncertain Rumours of this Perjury in King Lewis, the Lord Howard return'd out of France, and made Relation, how he saw the Lady Margaret brought with all Pomp and Ceremony to Ambois and there married to Charles the Dauphin: And to heap yet more Injuries, not long after the Tribute hitherto so carefully paid, was denied. The French now disclosing the innate Malice they bore the English, and with how little Scruple they could dispence with the most solemn Oath, when no apparent Danger threatned the Crime: For though the Dauphin when he had attain'd to the Age of Consent, might have broke off this Marriage; and it could have been only term'd an Act of Discourtesie; yet King Lewis who had sworn to this Article with so much Ceremony, cannot be excused from a most foul Impiety.

But what Reason of State prevail'd with him, who heretofore awed by his Fears had condescended in a manner to compound for his Kingdom, thus now to slight the English, is not delivered in History. And it may appear Difficult to imagine, considering King Edward was now, if possibly, more absolute in his command at Home, his People better disciplin'd, and no Appearance of an Enemy from Abroad. Add to that, his Coffers full, increast every Year by the Tribute from France, and his Reputation high, by the Victory lately purchased against the Scots; a Nation though inferiour to the French in the Riches and Extent of Territory, yet in martial Courage equal; and in warring with whom, we have found more Sweat and Danger than with France. It is therefore hard to know the Cause of King Lewis's Proceedings in this injurious Way, if we look on our selves only as at Home: But if we consider the State of Businesses Abroad, we may easily discern his Policy. For now had the

(o) Sir Robert Chauncy, he did it says Holinshed, to encourage the Lord Mayor, who being a great Merchant paid the King vast Sums for Customs, and had besides entertain'd him very Magnificently before.

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. 1482. French Arts or the Change of Time quite dissolved all our Confederacies, and left us to maintain with our own Arms our own Quarrel. Reg. 22. St. Paul was annihilated, in whose Death expired all the Discontents of the factious Nobility in France.

Duke of
mad.

The Duke of Brittain by an extream Melancholy (which scarce was reputed less than Madness) was become unfit for Government, much less for any great Attempt: And being overcharged by the Practices and Arms of the French, in a manner made Resignation of his Dutchy to the Disposition of some Officers easie to be corrupted. And Burgundy (which in the Victories of Henry the Fifth, had so much advanced the English Enterprizes) was by the last League with Maximilian wholly at the Devotion of the French. So that all they who heretofore had brought us over, were now either reduced to be unprofitable for our Aid; or else become Enemies, should we renew our ancient Quarrel. Moreover the long Ease the King of England had lived in, and the Pleasures with which he appear'd altogether fascinated, render'd him to the World nothing formidable. And King Lewis having with so little Difficulty hitherto deluded him, and retain'd him in a kind of servile Amity, while he threw Injuries thick upon him; was now heighten'd to a Presumption, that the English would either connive at this Affront, or that by some new Cunning they might be appeased, were the Indignity never so much resent'd. And if the worst should happen, the French nothing fear'd the Enmity: Considering that King Edward alone would be unable to prevail against them seconded by the Forces of Maximilian, whom his Daughter now interest'd in the War.

These Considerations of Security to do Wrong according to the Nature of Wicked Princes, made King Lewis so boldly attempt it: And what was strange in a Man so cunning, he left himself no Excuse for the Fact, either in the Way of Honour or Conscience: And scarce in human Policy. Unless his Expectation reach'd beyond common Reason, in thought that Prince Philip, Son to Maximilian, and the Dutches (for she was Mother only to a Son and a Daughter) might chance to die, and thus by the Lady Margaret all those large Countries devolve into the Power of France. But how slight soever King Lewis's Opinion was of the English, this Breach of Faith was no sooner related to King Edward, but he resolv'd severely to take Revenge.

And calling together all the Council and Nobility, who for the Suddenness could be summon'd, he to this Purpose made a Declaration of his Wrongs, and Intentions how to right himself.

My Lords,

THE Injuries I have received are divulged every where, and the Eye of the World is fix'd upon me, to observe with what Countenance I suffer. And I must confess they are of so strange a Nature, that I remain rather amazed than enraged: Had I dealt with any Prince not civilized by Laws, or inured to Commerce; I had yet the Religion of so many Oaths, and the Reason of every Politick Circumstance so clear, that I could no Way have suspected this foul and foolish Breach of Faith. But in a Christian King (and who pretends to be most Christian) I have met with so horrid a Perjury, and so disgraceful to our Nation; that as all Mankind must abhor him as barbarous, so in my own Particular I must neglect the principal Office of a Prince, if I omit to chastise him. Most of you (my Lords) are Witnesses to the Solemnity of his Vows, when humbly he declined Ruin to his Kingdom: And I to avoid so great a Massacre as the War would have endanger'd, condescended to end all Controversies by a Peace. My Clemency is now become my Scorn; and I reap Indignities where I sow'd Favours. For this ungrateful Man: Prince I must not term him, who hath by Perjury forfeited that sacred Title, and in Contempt of all Law both Human and Divine, denies not only the Marriage of the Dauphin to our Daughter, which would have prov'd so great an Honour to his Blood, and Security to his Kingdom; but even the annual Tribute of Fifty Thousand Crowns; a slender Rent for so large a Country, as by our Permission he hath hitherto enjoy'd.

This Contumely I am resolv'd to punish; and I cannot doubt Success; Almighty God strengthens still his Arm, who undertakes a War for Justice. In our Expeditions heretofore against the French, what Prosperity waited upon the English Arms, is to the World divulg'd; and yet Ambition then appeared the chief Counsellor to War. Now beside all that Right, which led over Edward the Third our glorious Ancestor, and Henry the Fifth our Predecessor, we seem to have a Deputation from Heaven, to execute the Office of the Supreme Judge in chastising the Impious.

When we were last in France, an innate Fear in this false Man forced him down to a sordid Purchase of Security: How low will a wicked Conscience, (which even makes the Valiant, cowardly to tremble) bend him now? Now, when an implacable Resolution for Revenge sets a far sharper Edge upon our Swords: Now when he hath no Hypocrisy left undiscovered, nor Subterfuge for his former Perjury, nor Art to gain Belief to new Dissimulation: Now, when our Ears shall be deaf to all Submission, and when our Conscience is so well resolv'd for the Necessity of this War; that Mercy will be thought a vicious Lenity, and the most savage Cruelty, but an Act of Justice.

I need not repeat how much Age hath infirm'd him (and indeed I think it was his Dotage committed this so foolish Crime): Nor yet how hated he is render'd Abroad by his unfaithful Dealing, and at Home by his severe Government. The Commonalty sunk down by his heavy Impositions; the Nobility by his proud Neglect, exasperated to desire any Innovation. But we want not these Advantages; in the Justice of our Cause, and Valour of our People we have enough.

It is confessed our Confederacies are quite dissolved: And I rejoice in that alone we shall undertake this great Business: For Experience in our last Attempt show'd, that Princes of several Nations (however they pretend the same) have still several Aims: And oftentimes a Confederate is a greater Enemy to the Prosperity of a War, than the Enemy himself: Envy begetting more Difficulty in a Camp, than any Opposition from the adverse Army. Our Brother of Burgundy and Uncle of St. Paul are both dead. How little their Amity advanced us, may how a just Jealousie of their secret Practices hindered our Design then on France, you all may well remember. And how in our Return towards England, we had more Fear to have been assaulted by their traiterous Weapons, than by any Arms from the Enemy. But we will spare their Memory; they labour'd their own Safety, not our Glory. This I am secure, that as by Death they are render'd unprofitable to us, so likewise not dangerous. And as for Brittain, if his Weakness disable him to our Aid,

But I detain you, by my Speech, too long from Action. I see the Clouds of due Revenge gather'd in your Brow, and the Lightning of Fury break from your Eyes: Which bodes Thunder against our Enemy. Let us therefore lose no Time, but suddenly and severely scourge this perjured Coward to a too late Repentance; and regain Honour to our Nation, and his Kingdom to our Crown.

War with France desired and resolv'd on.

The Lords resent'd the Affront with Indignation as high as the King's, and desired that instant Preparations might be made for the War. But above all, the Duke of Gloucester appear'd zealous in the Quarrel; expressing aloud his Desire, That all his Estate might be spent, and all his Veins emptied in Revenge of this Injury. All the Court was presently for the Design, and the whole Kingdom with a fierce Appetite desired to arm: So that no Language was heard but Martial; and all the Gallantry was in new Armour, or other Conveniences for Service. The King most passionately pursued his Determination, and that very Spring resolv'd to begin the War. But he was diverted on the sudden from calling King Lewis to a Reckoning for this Crime; and summon'd by Death to give a strict Account for all his own. Death arrested him, and in the Space of not many Hours, instructed him in more than all the Oratory from Pulpits had done for Forty Years.

A. D. 1483. Reg. 23.

K. Edward suddenly seized with a mortal Sickness.

For as soon as he found himself mortally sick, he began to consider the Vanity of all his Victories, which with the Expence of so much Blood he had purchased, and at the Heart repented his too hard Bargain. He looked back upon the Beauty of his sensual Pleasures, and now discern'd it was only fair in the outside, inwardly rotten and deform'd. He cast up the Accounts of his Tribute both at home and abroad, and all those Treasures gather'd either by Proscription of his Enemies, or exacting from his Subjects, and found himself a Bankrupt. For till now, he wanted Leisure to search into that which most concern'd him; and being delighted too much in the Pomp and Pleasure of the Inn where he was not to stay, forgot he had a Journey, and unawares was overtaken by Night, an endless Night which no Day succeeds.

His Behaviour in his Sickness and his last Advice.

Perceiving his Doom inevitable, and no Hope of the least Reprieve, he began to order Business as fully as the Shortness of the Time would licence. The great Affair of his Soul, and indeed the only that is necessary, he committed to the Mercy of his Redeemer; and by the Sacraments then in use with the Church of England, and a real Contrition, he labour'd for a full Expiation of the Crimes and Errors of his Life. And as his Death is describ'd to us by an excellent Author who liv'd near his Time; Almighty God seems to have struck Water even from the Rock (as he Moses's Wand by did for the Israelites) in touching this Prince to the Heart, and forcing a most religious Repentance, from a Soul obdurate in Sin, as we may conjecture by his Life.

The Revenge of the Injury he receiv'd from K. Lewis, he referr'd to the Judgment of Heaven, whose Work it is to punish Perjury. And Lewis suffered for it according to his Demerit: For that Son, in marrying whom he so busied his Imaginations, and slighted all Faith and Religion, liv'd but a short Space, and died issueless. Not one Branch remaining of that great Tree, whose Root was in Perjury and Dissimulation.

The Protection of the King and Kingdom he left to the Lords nearest in Kindred to his Children, advising them, To Amity and Concord; by which the Nation would flourish in Greatness abroad and Safety at Home; the young King be secured from Flattery, and instructed in the best Discipline for Government; and they themselves live in much Honour and Felicity, if united to advance the Commonwealth, and oppose all foreign Danger: Where-as Discord would beget Civil War, and that endanger Ruin. So that this Christian King like Christ himself, when he departed bequeath'd Peace to the World. And had this Doctrine been as zealously followed as it was utter'd, the succeeding Time had not been guilty of so many sad Confusions. But for the present a perfect Reconciliation appear'd, both Sides lovingly embracing, and protesting all Amity for the future. So that with Comfort he forsook the World, and may well be said to have deserv'd a general Applause in this last Scene of his Life.

Among his Words of farewell at his Death, it is worthy Observation; That he solemnly protested his Repentance, for Obtaining the Crown with so much Blood, as the Necessity of the Quarrel spilt. Which certainly shews a most singular Piety, considering the indubitable Justice of his Title; and withal teacheth Princes a new Lesson, That the Power of Sway, which great Men so superstitiously adore, is but the Idol of Folly and Ambition; whose Oracles delude the Living, but on our Death-beds we discern the Truth, and hate the Irreligion of our former Error.

Concerning the Occasion of his Death, there is much Variety of Opinion; for by several Authors, it is severally imputed to Poison, grief, and Surfeit. They who ascribe it to Poison, are the passionate Enemies of Richard, Duke of Gloucester's Memory; who permit not Nature at that Time to have been obnoxious to Decay, but make the Death of every Prince an Act of Violence or Practice. And in regard this cruel Lord was guilty of much Blood, without any other Argument, condemn him for those Crimes, from which he was however actually most innocent. The French affirm it to have proceeded from Grief conceiv'd upon Repudiation of his Daughter, and Detention of the Tribute. But they looking on our Affairs afar off, mistake the Shadow for the Substance, desiring perhaps that King Lewis should kill a King of England by a new Weapon: And certainly Lewis did persuade himself, that King Edward was slain this Way; and congratulated his Wit much in the Accident. But this carries not the least Appearance of Probability (p). Great Sorrows kill for the most part suddenly, else by a languishing Decay of Nature; whereas King Edward died not presently

Whereas King Edward breath'd forth Passions to his Council, and found in them a Sympathy both in the Sorrow and the Rage: And as for Revenge, certainly the State of England was never better prepar'd to exact it; the King being a valiant and fortunate Leader, the People inured heretofore to the Exercise of Arms, and never so forward to any Quarrel, as against the French, from whom they ever reaped Victory and Treasure: And concerning Money the Strength of an Army, the Exchequer was full enough, without any burdensome Imposito begin the War.

Cause of his Death, and the Time of it.

It was therefore questionless a Surfeit brought this great Prince so suddenly to his end. For who observes well the Scope of his pleasure, finds it to have been placed much in Wantonness and Riot, the Two mighty Destroyers of Nature: And commonly by those Excesses with which we solace Life, we ruin it.
He died upon the Ninth of April 1483.(9) at his Palace of Westminster, and was interr'd at Windsor. Sixtus the Fourth being Pope, Frederick the Third Emperor, Ferdinand and Isabella King and Queen of Aragon and Castile, John the Second, King of Portugal, James the Third, of Scotland, and Lewis the Eleventh of France. Between whom and King Edward, as there was much Intercourse in Business, so was there great Concurrence in Fortune. Both began and ended their Reigns in the same Years: Both were held in Jealousie by the precedent Kings,
Edward by King Henry, Lewis by his Father
Charles the Seventh; both had Titles disputa-ble to the Crown. The House of Lancaster usurping against Edward; the House of England claiming against Lewis. Both were perplex'd with Civil War, and both successful.
Lewis infested by an insolent Nobility; Edward by a Saint-like Competitor. Lewis victorious by Art, Edward by Courage. Both were rebell'd against by their own Brothers; Lewis, by Charles, Duke of Berry, Edward, by George, Duke of Clarence: And both took a severe Revenge, Lewis freeing himself from so bosom an Enemy, by poisoning Charles; Edward by drowning Clarence. Both ended this Life with Appearance of much Zeal; Edward religiously, Lewis something superstitiously. Both left their Sons, yet Children to inherit, who died issue-less, and left their Crown to their greatest Enemies; Edward the Fifth to his Uncle Richard, Duke of Gloucester, Charles, the Eighth, to his Kinsman Lewis, Duke of Orleans.

But who looks upon the Lives of these Two Princes on the other Side, may, as in a Table which presents several Faces, perceive as great Disparity. But I am only to give you the Picture of King Edward without Flattery or Detraction; which is rare in History, considering Authors fashion for the most part Jdaas in their Minds, and according to them, not to the Truth of Action form a Prince; which tho' happily it win Applause to the Writer, is a high Abuse to the Reader.

But this King was, if we compare his with the Lives of Princes in general, worthy to be number'd among the best. And whom, though not an extraordinary Vertue, yet, a singular Fortune made conspicuous. He was born at Roan in Normandy, his Father at that Time Regent in France. The so fatal Division between the Houses of York and Lancaster with him in a Manner having both its Birth and Growth; for as he, so the Faction of his Family gathered Strength. His Education was, according to the best Provision for his Honour and Safety, in Arms: A strict and religious Discipline, in all Probability likely to have softned him too much to Mercy, and a Love of Quiet.

His Birth.
Education.

He had a great Extent of Wit, which certainly he owed to Nature: That Age bettering Men little by Learning, which howsoever he had wanted Leisure to have receiv'd; the Trumpet sounding still too loud in his Ear, to have admitted the sober Counsels of Philosophy.
And his Wit lay not in the Sights of Cunning and Deceit; but in a sharp Apprehension, yet not too much whetted by Suspicion.

Wit and Parts.

In Counsel he was judicious, with little Difficulty dispatching much: His Understanding open to clear Doubts, not dark and cloudy and apt to create new. His Wisdom look'd ever directly upon Truth, which appears by the Management of his Affairs both in Peace and War: In neither of which (as far as concern'd the political Part) he committed any main Error.
Tis true, he was over-reach'd in Peace by King
Lewis, abused concerning the Marriage of his Daughter; in War by the Earl of Warwick, when upon Confidence of a final Agreement he was surpriz'd: But both these Misfortunes I impute to want of Faith in his Enemies, not of Judgment in him. Though to speak impartially, his too great Presumption on the Oath of a dissembling Prince; and want of Circumspection, a Reconciliation being but in Treaty, cannot scape without Reprehension.

His Judgment.

His Nature certainly was both noble and honest, which if rectified by the strait Rule of Vertue, had render'd him fit for Example, whereas he is only now for Observation. For Prosperity raised him but to a Complacency in his Fortune, not to a Disdain of others Losses, or a Pride of his own Acquisitions. And when he had most Security in his Kingdom, and consequently most Allurements to Tyranny, then shewed he himself most familiar and indulgent.
An admirable Temper in a Prince, who so well knew his own Strength, and whom the Love of Riot necessitated to a Love of Treasure, which commonly is supplied by Oppression of the Subject.

His excellent Disposition.

The heavy Fine laid upon Sir Thomas Cook, and his Displacing the Chief Justice Markham, blemisheth him with Violence and Avarice.
But that Severity, and the other, when he began to look into the Penal Laws, were but short Tempests, or rather small Overcastings, during the glorious Calm of his Government.
And whatsoever Injury the Subject endured,
was not imputed to the King, but to Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, and some under-Informers;
or else to the Queen and her necessitous Kin-

His Courage & Conduct in War.

Great Judgment in leading his Armies, and Courage in fighting personally, speaks him both a daring Soldier, and an expert Commander. And the many Battels he fought, in all which he triumph'd, make him as much to be admired for his military Discipline, as his happy Success. Fortune not deserving to have all his mighty Victories ascribed to her Gift; Valour and good Conduct share at the least with her in the Fate of War. But as in Arms he appears most glorious to Posterity, so likewise most unhappy: For all those bloody Conquests he obtain'd, were against his own Nation; and the greatest Adversaries he overcame, were near in Consanguinity to him; so that he may more properly be said to have let himself Blood, than his Enemies; or rather for Preservation of his own Body, to have cut off his principal and most necessary Limbs. For beside those many Princes of the House of Somerset, Buckingham, Excester, Oxford, Devonshire, Northumberland, Westmerland, Shrewsbury, and finally the Tree it self, and the only Branch, Henry the Sixth and his Son Prince Edward; He slew even the Earl of Warwick and the Marquess Mountague; Two Brothers, who having lost their Father in his Quarrel, hazarded their Lives and those mighty Possessions and Honours which peaceably they might have enjoyed, only to advance his Title. But this was rather his Fate than his Fault; and into this Sea of Blood he failed not voluntarily, but violently driven by the Tempests of his Fortune. And for the

The Cruelty to his Brother, the Duke of Clarence, a Trouble to him.

Cruelty laid to him in the Death of the Duke of Clarence, he was certainly wrought to it by the Practice, and the Misinformation of an envious Faction in Court; the Horror of which Fratricide possessed him to the last Hour of his Life; frequently complaining against the unhappy Severity of his Justice, and against the hard Nature of his Counsellors, who would not interpose one Word to him for Mercy, whereby so black a Deed might have been prevented. But howsoever we may wash away much of this Blood from his Memory, yet there continue many foul Stains upon it; since publick Mischiefs seldom happen, but that the Prince, tho' not actually nocent, is in some Degree guilty.

The Turk's Success in Europe, his Grief.

As these so many Confusions at Home were the Misfortune of his Time, so was Abroad, that so scandalous Loss of the Eastern Empire to the Turk. For though King Edward were not the Occasion of so great Ruin to the Christian Commonwealth, and this happen'd before he attain'd the Sovereignty, his Father being Head of the Faction; yet the civil Wars of England rais'd about the Quarrel which he was soon after to maintain, and the universal Division among the Princes of the West gave Courage to the Infidels; and denied Succours to the miserable Emperour oppress'd by an over-potent Enemy. Whereby a City was prophaned, in which the Christian-Faith had flourish'd without Interruption for a thousand Years. But as the Sea is said to gain in another, if it looseth in this Place: So about this time Religion, by the singular Piety and Valour of Ferdinand and Isabella, won Ground upon the Moors in Spain, whence not long after they were totally and (I hope) for ever expel'd.

His Care of Justice.

But when the War licens'd the King to attend his Government, we find the Administration of Laws just and equal; and many new Statutes enacted, wholesome against Diseases crept into the State; so that he appear'd diligent both to heal up any Wound, which the Tumults of his Reign had given the Commonwealth, and provident for the Health of future Ages. And certainly no Prince could Husband the Benefits of Peace better for the outward Magnificence; for his Glory was much in Hospitality, and a pompous Celebration of the principal Feasts of our Redemption. In which Way of Bravery settling much of his Happiness; he had been doubtless the most Fortunate of any King of the Norman Line, had he not fail'd in the Expectation of his Daughters Marriage.

A. D. 1483.

Reg. 23.

His Buildings.

His Buildings were few, but sumptuous for that Time, or more properly but Reparations: Which are yet to be seen at the Tower of London, his House of Eltham, the Castles of Nottingham and Dover: But above all at Windsor, where he built the new Chappel (finish'd after by Sir Riginald Bray, Knight of the Order) and indow'd the College with mighty Revenues; which he gave not, but transferred thither; taking from King's-College in Cambridge, and Eaton-College a thousand Pound by the Year to enrich this at Windsor.

But our Buildings like our Children are obnoxious to Death; and Time scorns their Folly, who place a Perpetuity in either. And indeed the safer kind of Fate happen'd to King Edward in both these Felicities: His Posterity like his Edifices, lost in other Names. For his Two Sons, before they had survived their Father, the ceremonious Time of Mourning, were themselves inhumanely murder'd, and as obscurely buried. His Eldest Daughter the Lady Elizabeth, was married to the Earl of Richmond, known by the Name of Henry the Seventh; whose Heir in a strait Line not liable to any Doubt or Question, is his most sacred Majesty, now glorious in Government of this Realm. The Younger Daughters were bestowed, one in a Monastery, others upon inferior Lords. Cicily married John, Viscount Wells: Anne, Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk: Bridget was a professed Nun at Dartford: Mary was contracted to the King of Denmark, but died before Consummation of Marriage: Margaret died an Infant: Katherine married William Courtney, Earl of Devonshire. But of none of these younger Princesses at this Day remains any Thing but their Memory: All dying issueless but the Lady Katherine, whose Posterity failed likewise in the Third Descent. Henry her Son, Marquess of Exeter suffered by Attainder in the Reign of his Cousen German, Henry the Eighth, being not long before designed Heir Apparent to the Crown (an Honour fatal in England: ) and his Son Edward untimely came to his Death at Padua in Italy, in the Reign of Queen Mary, by whose Favour he had regain'd his Father's Honours and Possessions. So that all the clear Stream from the Spring of York flows in the House of Scotland: The troubled and impure runs in many Veins of the English Gentry. For by the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, he had an illegitimate Son, named Arthur, who by his Wife's Right was Viscount Lisle, and dying without Issue-male, left to his Three Daughters and their Posterity some Tincture of the Blood Royal.

His Children, and the Fate of his Sons Edward and Richard.

His illegitimate Offspring.

This Disease of his Blood was the Crime which procured both to his Government and Memory

His Lusts.

The LIFE and REIGN of EDWARD the Fourth.

A. D. 1483. Memory many hard Censures. For tho' some excuse his Lust, as a Sin, tho' black to the Eye of Heaven, yet no way generally injurious; in regard the Incontinency of one Man could not be so diffusive as to wrong a Multitude: Nevertheless, who observes the Revolutions of Kingdoms, shall find no one Iniquity in Princes so punish'd. The Dishonour of one Lady abused extending to the Disgrace of several Families, and mighty Factions knitting together for Revenge: In the whole Stock of Injuries none being so cruel to human Nature, and which with less Patience can be dissembled.

His Perjury.

His frequent Perjury, (a Sin, which strikes like a Sword with Two Edges, both against divine and humane Faith) was the Crime which render'd him most odious to the Society of Man. For impiously he appeared in this to brave Heaven, slighting all solemn Covenants made with God; and foolishly preferring before a holy Promise, a little Profit, or the Satisfaction of his Revenge. Which Crime, however for the present it might stand him in some Benefit, yet certainly it might have involv'd him in much Loss in all after-Enterprizes, which depended upon his Faith. The Death of Wells and Dimmock, of Fauconbridge, of Somerset, Lord Prior of St. John's and others, were the Wounds Perjury gave his Soul, the Scars of which remain yet foul upon his Fame. But perhaps he thought no Faith was to be held with an Enemy, or promised not with Intention of Performance: An impious Equivocation; but then in Practice with his Neighbour Princes both of France and Burgundy: So that the Custom may in some Sort seem to privilege the Fault.

His Carelessness and Confidence.

In his Youth he was so uncircumspect, and even when he had the strongest Arguments for Jealousie, so overconfident, that it engaged him to extream Difficulties, and endanger'd absolute Ruin. But his Fortune, almost miraculously, made up all those Breaches, which had been by his Carelessness and Presumption laid open; and delighting something wantonly to boast her Power and Favour to him, raised him then highest, when all the World, and almost his own Hopes forsook him. For presently upon the Slaughter of his Father at the Battel of Wakefield, and the Overthrow of his great Supporter the Earl of Warwick at that of S. Albans: She inthron'd him in the Kingdom, making the Queen and all the Favourers of Lancaster, when doubly victorious, retire as overcome; and the universal Acclamations of the People set the regal Diadem upon his Head; whose Father's Head at that Time, like a Traytor's was fixed upon the Walls of York, scorn'd with a Paper Crown. And afterward when from a mighty Prince he was become a miserable Exile, forced by the Treason of his chiefest Counsellors and Powers of his greatest Enemy to fly into Burgundy, where he likewise met with but a dissembled Amity: She restored him to what at first she gave: And whereas his Forces were so weak upon his Return into England, that despairing of more, he humbly only desired to be invested in his Father's Dutchy, and vowed never to attempt the Crown: She violently forc'd it on him, protesting, (by the Mouths of the Nobility who resorted to him at Nottingham) not to afford him Safety if he refused the Sovereignty; by which amorous Way of threatening, she in a manner wooed him to accept, what he durst not then hope to recover. And had the Appetite of Glory more prevail'd with him, than the Sense of Pleasure, as far as we may conjecture of his Fortune, he might have extended his Victories over the World, which are now straitned within the narrow Limits of our Island.

His Fortune.

The End of the Reign of King EDWARD the Fourth.

 IN THE
Reign of EDWARD the Fourth.

IN the beginning of this Government it rain'd Blood in Bedfordshire, the red Drops appearing on some Linnen that was hung out to be dry'd. Hol.

Tho' it may seem below the Dignity of History to take Notice of Fashions in dress, yet we do not think any Thing that may entertain the Curious too trivial to be inserted in this Place.

In the Seventh Year of the King's Reign, the People had an extravagant Way of adorning their Feet, which was thought of such ill Consequence, that a Proclamation was put forth against it. They wore the Beaks or Pikes of their Shoes so long, that it incumber'd them in their Walking, and they were forced to tie them up to their Knees; the fine Gentlemen did it with Chains of Silver, or Silver-gilt; and those who could not afford to be at the Charge of them with Silk Laces: Which ridiculous Fashion had been in Vogue ever since the Year 1382, above Four-score Years, and now 'twas prohibited on the Forfeiture of twenty Shillings, and the Pain of Cursing by the Clergy.

This Year the King concluded a League with Henry K. of Castile, and John, K. of Arragon; at the Conclusion of which he allow'd that certain Cotswold Sheep should be transported into Spain where the Breed so increased, and the Wool was so much finer than that of England, that King Edward's Complacency for the Kings of Spain has been very detrimental to his own Country.

In the Eleventh Year of his Reign, Anno 1471, William Caxton a Mercer of London, a Lover of Letters, and a good Historian for those Times, Author of the Chronicle, call'd Fructus Temporum, brought the Art of Printing into England, and practis'd it first in Westminster-Abby.

In his Seventeenth Year there was so dreadful a Plague, that Historians relate more People were destroy'd by it, than by Fifteen Years War before.

In his Nineteenth Year, Robert Bifield, Esq; one of the Sheriffs of London, was fined Fifty Pound by the Court of Aldermen, for affronting the Lord Mayor, which it seems was only in kneeling too near him at Prayers in Paul's Church.

In the following Year two notorious Thieves were pressed to Death for robbing St. Martin's Le Grand Church in London, and three others of the Gang hang'd and burnt.

In the Reigns of this King's Predecessors, Glory inspired the English Nobility with Valour, and produced many Hero's Ambition, Envy and Revenge did the same now. Faction made the Barons of England Enemies to one another, and Hatred and Envy animated them to such daring Actions in destroying each other, that one would think their Courage was as Invincible as their Hate. Of these the most Famous on the Part of King Henry were,

Henry and Edmund Beaufort, Dukes of Somerset; Henry Piercy, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas Courtney, Earl of Devonshire; James Butler, Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond; John, Earl of Oxford, his Son the Lord Aubrey Vere, and the Brave and Loyal Lord John, Earl of Oxford his other Son and Successor; the Lord Hungerford, the Lord Ross, the Lord Molins; John Holland, Duke of Exeter; the Lord Clifford; Ralph Nevil, Earl of Westmoreland; the Lord Wells; the Lord Bardolf; the Lord Fitz Walter; Sir Ralph Piercy; Sir John Nevill; Sir Henry Nevill, Son to the Lord Latimer; Sir Ralph Grey, and Sir Robert Wells, Son to the Lord Wells. These all died for the Cause of the House of Lancaster, except the Earls of Wiltshire and Oxford.

On King EDWARD's Part the most Eminent were,

John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester; the Earl of Rivers, and his Son Sir Anthony Woodville; William, Earl of Kent; the Lord Cobham; Henry, Lord Bouchier; the Lord Audley; the Lord Clinton; William, Lord Hastings, his Chamberlain and Favourite; the Lord Scroop; Sir Walter Blunt; William, Lord Herbert; Sir Richard Herbert; Sir Thomas Burroughs; Sir John Howard; the Lord Say; and Sir Richard Walgrave. The greater Part of these lost their Lives in the Quarrel of the House of York.

The following Lords were sometimes on the One Side, and sometimes on the Other; but at last they all dy'd in Defence of the Claim of the White Rose, as the Lancastrians were term'd, and the Yorkists the Red.

The first of these and of all the English Hero's was Richard Nevill, Earl of Warwick, surnam'd the King-Maker. He was a chief Instrument in deposing King Henry and crowning King Edward: In expelling King Edward and restoring King Henry; of the same Principles were his Brother John, Marquis Mountacute; John, Lord Wenlock; Thomas Nevill, call'd the Bastard of Falconbridge, and Sir William Tirrell, equally Famous for their Courage and Inconstancy.

The Writers who liv'd in King EDWARD the Fourth's Days were,

Nicholas Kenton of Suffolk, Provincial of the Carmelites in England.

Henry Parker, a Carmelite Fryer of Launceston, who preach'd against the Pride of the Prelates, for which he was imprison'd with one Thomas Holden.

John Gunthorpe, Dean of Wells, and Keeper of the Privy-Seal. He travell'd into Italy, where he studied Rhetorick under Guarinus of Ferrara.

Dr. William Fy, Prebend of Pauls.

Juliana Bemis, a Lady who wrote several Treatises of Hawking and Hunting, the Laws of Arms and Heraldry.

Sir John Fortescue, Lord Chief Justice of England, wrote several Treatises of Law and Politicks.

Thomas Wigenhall, a Monk of Durham.

Dr. John Hambois, a Doctor of Mulick.

John Tiptoft, Earl of Warcester, wrote divers Treatises on various Subjects: He was beheaded in the Year 1471, by Order of the Earl of Warwick for siding with this King.

John Milverton, a Carmelite Fryer of Bristol, Provincial of his Order thro' England, Scotland and Ireland. He defended some of his Fryers who were persecuted for writing against endowing the Church with Temporal Possessions; for which, being an unpardonable Crime, he was cited to Rome, imprison'd in the Castle of St. Angelo, and had not his Liberty till three Years after, when he was deliver'd by Sentence of the Cardinals appointed to be his Judges.

David Morgan a Welsh Man, Treasurer of the Church of Landaff, wrote a Discription of Wales and of its Antiquities.

John Shirwood, Bishop of Durham.

Thomas Kent, an excellent Philosopher.

Robert Huggen, a pretended Prophet of Norfolk.

Dr. John Maxfield, a learned Physician.

William Green, a Carmelite Fryer.

Thomas Norton of Bristol, a Chymist.

Dr. Rich. Porland, a Franciscan Fryer of Norfolk.

Dr. Thomas Milling, Bishop of Hereford.

Mr. Scogan, a Student of Oxford, a celebrated Wit according to those Times: He was sent for to Court and diverted the King, Queen and Courtiers with his Frolicks and Jests.

Those that follow were Historians.

Nicholas Mountacute, A. M. of Eaton School.

Roger Albanus, a Carmelite of London.

William Caxton, a Mercer of London, whom we have elsewhere mention'd: He wrote a History stil'd Fruetus Temporum, an Appendix to Trevisa, and translated several Books into English.

John Harding, Esq; wrote a Chronicle in English Verse: Wherein he collected all the Homages paid by the Scots Kings to the Kings of England, proving the Superiority of the Crown of England over that of Scotland.

John Rouse of Warwickshire, a Canon of Osnay, who dy'd Anno 1491.

BY the Death of King Edward IV, the first Prince of the Tork Line, the Inheritance of the Crown descended by the Right of Succession to his Eldest Son Edward, then Prince of Wales, who from that Day (viz. April 9. 1483.) was still'd King of England, and proclaim'd such by the Name of Edward V. being then about 13 Years of Age. (a) In his Father's Sickness, which was something long, and tho' lingering was judg'd mortal, Necessities of State, and the Peace of the Nation had oblig'd that King to Separate his Nobles and Kindred from him; which gave them an Opportunity of forming new Contrivances and Schemes among themselves to be put in Execution after his Death; which, notwithstanding the King's Foresight and Endeavours to prevent, prov'd fatal to his Son. The Prince of Wales himself was sent down to Ludlow in Shropshire, that by his Presence he might Compose the Disorders of the Welsh; who, tho' not in actual Rebellion, yet were grown so Unruly, and Disobedient, to their Governours and Superiors, that the Magistrates with all their Power, were not Able to suppress the Dissentions and Disorders, Robberies and Wrongs committed by them. The Wisdom of this Action appear'd in the present Effect it had upon them: for the Welsh, who have always been very Affectionate to those Princes, who have born the Title of their Principality, as being Memorials of their Ancient Liberty and Dominion, shewed a wonderful Respect to him; and tho' but a Child, were more Obedient to him, than ever they were known to their Ancient Magistrates. The Queen, who had a mighty Sway over the King's Affections, and never more than at this time, had so framed Matters, that for the Security of her Son, the Prince, as well as for their Honour and Interest, all her own Kindred and Relations were placed in the greatest Offices about him; by which Contrivance she thought to secure his Right and their Power, against all her and their Enemies: for the Queen's Brother Anthony Woodville Lord Rivers, a Wise and Valiant Man, was appointed his Governour; and Richard Lord Grey, the Queen's Son by her former Husband, with others of her Friends and Kin, had other Offices about him; and that London the Regal Seat might be kept to her Son's Interests, in his Absence, Thomas Grey her Eldest Son, being created Marquess Dorset, was made Governour of the Tower, and not only the Arms of that Magazine, but the King's Treasure put into his Hands. These things the Ancient Nobility of the Nation, of whom Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Hastings, Chamberlain to King Edward, were the Chief, bore with much Indignation, as knowing, that if the Queen, and her Kindred were so insolent and imperious when they had a King over them, who, tho' too willing to yield to their Humours and Desires for the Queen's Sake, yet kept them within some Bounds of Modesty and Subjection, they would grow most intolerable when they had a Young Prince under their Command, and might abuse his Power as they pleas'd, to fulfil their Wills, and so they should be in greater Danger and Contempt under the New King, than they had been under the Old; tho' even by him few of them were trusted, or regarded. These Presages of Unhappy Times, made them entertain the Thoughts and Resolutions of getting the Prince into their Power, if the King should Die, and to put him under the Government of the Duke of Gloucester, who might justly Claim that Place, as the next Prince of the Blood, and their Uncle by Father's Side, and would certainly put

But whether they had Communicated their Designs to the Duke of Gloucester or no, is uncertain, because he was then at York, being lately return'd from his Expedition to the Borders of Scotland, whither he had been sent by his Brother to repress the sudden Invasions of those People, who, upon the Breach with Lewis XI. the French King, were grown very troublefom Neighbours to the English. Crown after K. Edward's Death.

Anno 17.
Edw. 4.

In vita Lud. XI.
c. 112. and 122.

Duke remaining here unemploy'd, began to cast his Thoughts upon the Succession to the Crown, and to consider, how many things made for his Title, tho' his Brother's Children stood between it and him, in the Eye of the World; which yet ought to be no Hindrance to his Claim, if Justice and Right were on his Side. And first, He call'd to Mind, that in the Attainder of his Brother George Duke of Clarence, it was alledg'd against him, "That to advance himself to the Kingdom, and for ever to disable the King, and his Posterity from inheriting the Crown, he had contrary to Truth, Nature, and Religion, Viper-like destroying her who gave him Life, publish'd, that King Edward was a Bastard, and so no Way capable to Reign; and that he himself therefore was true Heir of the Kingdom, and the Royalty and Crown belong'd to him and his Heirs. As also that there was a Report grounded upon vehement Presumptions, that the Duke of Clarence himself was a Bastard. Which Malicious Calumnies, tho' he did not believe, and was more loath to Alledge against his Mother as true, yet he thought they might be thus far serviceable to him, that since both his Brothers were now Dead, or Dying, he was the Only Legitimate Issue of Richard Duke of York; and so unquestionably the Right Heir to the Crown, if the Issue of his Brothers were either thereby, or any other Ways made incapable of it. And as to the Children of the Duke of Clarence, they were render'd incapable of the Crown by the Attainder of their Father, and need not that Bastardy be pleaded against them. The only Bar of his Title was then the Children of his Brother King Edward, by the Lady Elizabeth Grey; the Marriage with whom having at first begotten a great Contest, and being violently Opposed by his Mother the Dutchess of York upon this Ground, because he was before married to the Lady Eleanor Butler, Widow of Thomas Lord Butler, Baron of Sudesley, and Daughter of John Lord Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury; he resolv'd to search narrowly into the Truth of it, not only to Vindicate his own Right, but to keep the Royal Line from the foul Blot of an Illegitimate Succession. This Inquiry he made by Men both Diligent and Faithful, by whose labour he got the Depositions of several Persons concerning it; and among others, (as Philip de Comines relates) the Testimony of Dr. Thomas Stillington, Bishop of Bath, to this Effect, according to the Words of the Author; "Le Evefque de Bath (lequel avoit este Counseiller du Roy Edward) disoit, que le dit Roy avoit promis Foy de Marriage à une Dame de Angleterre, & que il avoit nomme Dame Eleanor Talbot, & que le Roy avoit fait la Promise entre les Mains du dict Evefque, & dit aussi c'est Evefque, qu'avoit apres Espouse, & n'y avoit, que luy, & ceux deux. Which is thus English'd: The Bishop of Bath, a Privy Councillor of King Edward, said, That the said King had Plighted his Faith to Marry a Lady of England, whom the Bishop named the Lady Eleanor Talbot, and that this Contract was made between the Hands of the said Bishop, who said that afterwards he Married them, no Persons being present but they two, and he the King charging him strictly not to reveal it. These Proofs the Duke caused to be drawn up into an Authentick Form, and consulted the most Eminent Doctors and Proctors of the Civil Law, who unanimously gave their Judgments, that King Edward's Children were Bastards, the King having another Wife before their Mother; and consequently that Richard Duke of Gloucester was the only undoubted Heir to the Lord Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who was adjudged to be the true Heir to the Crown of this Realm by Authority of Parliament. And thus the Duke of Gloucester having cleared up his Title to the Crown kept it secret, till he should have a fair Opportunity after his Brother's Death to vindicate his own Right, with as little Disturbance to the Peace of the Nation, and Dishonour to his Nephews, as was possible; tho' it is probable, that one Potter of Redcross-street without Cripple-gate, a Servant of the Duke's, who was Privy to the Business, unwarily discover'd it, by telling one Mistlebrunke, who brought him the News of King Edward's Death; Then, says he, will my Master the Duke of Gloucester be King: which Words tho' startling to him, yet the Grounds of them not being known, made little Noise, till the Duke of Gloucester was on the Throne.

The Civilians consulted about King Edward's Issue.

These Foundations of Discord being laid, tho' privately, in the Life of the Father, receiv'd a Perfection immediately after his Death, and began with the Reign of the Son; tho' to satisfy the King on his Death-Bed the two Parties had shaken hands as Friends, and promis'd to forget all former Injuries. For the Queen, as if she had been conscious that her Pride had been too great to be forgiven, presently after her Husband's Death, writes down to her Brother the Earl of Rivers to raise such a Body of Men, as might be sufficient to defend him against the Lords, and bring her Son up to London to be crown'd, that it might not be in the Power of her Enemies to keep him from the actual Possession of the Throne; which Order the said Earl as carefully obey'd. On the Other-side, the Duke of Buckingham, as Zealous to carry on the Design of himself and his Party, to take the King out of the hands of his Mother's Kindred, sent a Trusty Servant of his, named Pursivall, to the City of York, to propound their Design to the Duke of Gloucester, and to offer him, if need requir'd, a Thousand stout Fellows to assist him in the Effecting of it. The Duke of Gloucester looking upon this Tender, as the first Step to his greater Design, willingly comply'd with the Proposal, and sending the Messenger back with many Thanks to his Master, and other private Instructions, contrived a Meeting soon after about Northampton; where the two Dukes, with all the Lords and Gentlemen their Friends, and 900 Men in their Retinue, came at the time agreed on. Here they entred into a Consultation immediately upon their Arrival, and the Duke of Gloucester, who was the Chief Man in the Action, communicated the Necessity and Reasonableness of the Undertaking, to all the Lords and Gentlemen assembled, in words to this Effect: "That it was neither reasonable, nor tolerable, to leave the Young King their Master in the Hands and Custody of his Mother's Kindred; who to engross all Honour to themselves, would exclude the Rest of the Nobility from their Attendance on him, 'tho all of them were as ready and willing to perform all the Services

 " Noble left about him, is neither honourable " to his Majesty, nor to Us, and must in the

 " this Strangeness make the King's most Potent " Friends either turn his utter Enemies, or be" come very indifferent to his Service, when " they see their Inferiors both in Birth and

 " Youth framed to the Love and Liking of them,

 " Disgust, and, now their Pride is arm'd with " Authority, become implacable to most of us,
 " to whom they have ever had malice enough
 " to ruin us, and wanted nothing but what they " have now, Authority to vent it upon us?
 " That these things consider'd, it was their " greatest Wisdom to take the Young King out " of their Enemies Hands, and not suffer things
 " to continue in the Posture they are now in " their old Enmity will revive with their Power,

 " and their long accusom'd Malice will be " strengthen'd with their Authority, in which
 " if we endure them once to be settled, it will " not be in all our Powers to oppose them
 " effectually; and therefore now's the Time to " prevent all Mischiefs by taking away the Cause
 " of them. These Words and Perswasions mo" ved all present to engage heartily in the Busi" ness; and the Duke of Buckingham and Lord
 " Hastings, who were Men both of great Power
 " and Interest, shew'd such a Forwardness in the " Attempt, that all the Rest were encourag'd by " their Example to be Assistants and Followers of " them; and many, which were not present, were " drawn in by the Duke of Gloucester's Letters to " promise their help in the same Affair, if there " were further Occasion,

While the Lords were thus consulting, and 1483.
 contriving to get the King into their Hands, without the Knowledge or Privy of the Queen and her Friends, the Duke of Gloucester receiv'd the News, that the Lord Rivers had gather'd a strong Body of armed Men, and with them was ready to bring up the King to London to his Coronation; which unexpected report surprized them much, because it broke all their Measures at once, it being impossible for them, tho' they had a good Number of Attendants, to effect their Design, if he were brought to London under a strong Guard; especially considering, that as on the one hand the Earl of Rivers was a Valiant and Experienc'd Soldier, so if they should gain the King by Force, besides the danger of the King's Person, it would look like an Open Rebellion: Whereupon the Duke of Gloucester, and his Friends, rather chose to overturn Force by Policy, and to that end privately order'd some of his Friends, who were about the Queen, to represent to her, " That as it was no ways necessary to bring the King to London with an Army of Attendants, as tho' he were to pass thro' an Enemy's and not his own Country, so it would be dangerous to the King's Person and Government; for whereas now all the Lords seem'd to be perfect Friends, and to study nothing but the Honour of the King, and the Triumph of his Coronation, if they see the Lords about his Royal Person, whom so lately they thought their Enemies, to gather great Numbers of Men armed about them in the King's Name, they will immediately sus-spect and fear, that those Men are intended not so much for the King's Safety as their Destruction, and so they would take themselves obliged for their own Defence to raise an equal Force, and fill the Nation with Uproar and Confusion, to the Danger of the King and Breach of the Peace: and therefore such Methods of Action ought carefully to be avoided, especially since her Son was a Child, and in the Beginning of his Reign. These Reasons seem'd plausible to the Queen, who was not suspicious of the Evil designed, and very willing to submit to any thing for the Good of her Son, and his quiet Settlement on the Throne;
 and therefore without delay wrote Letters to her Brother the Lord Rivers, ordering him to dismiss all her Son's extraordinary Attendants and Guards, and hasten to London with only his own Household Servants and usual Retinue.
 The Duke of Gloucester also, much about the same time, sent Letters to the Lord Rivers, with full Assurances of Duty and Subjection to the King his Nephew, and Love and Friendship to himself; so that he seeing all things Calm and Peaceable, concurred readily with the Queen's Desires, and leaving his armed Men behind him, came up with no greater Number of Followers, than was necessary to shew the King's Honour and Greatness. In their Way about Northampton, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, with their Retinues, had layn some Days, and hearing of the King's Arrival met him at Northampton;
 but because that Town was not big enough to hold both their Companies, they advis'd, that the King should go forward to Stony-Stratford to lodge there, and they would stay at Northampton, inviting the Lord Rivers to lodge with them, that they might enjoy his Company that Evening. The Lord Rivers, hoping to improve his Friendship with them by Compliance, dismissed his Company, and took his Lodgings with the Dukes, who feasted him that Night with all Demonstrations of Joy, and Signs of Friendship,

1483. ship, till they parted with him to his Lodgings. But as soon as he was gone, the two Dukes with a Select number of their Friends enter'd into a Consultation, and spent the greatest part of the Night in it: what their Resolutions were, the next Day's Actions shew. In the Morning they got up very early, and by private Orders had all their Servants ready to Attend them, before the Lord Rivers or his Servants were stirring. The Keys of the Inn, wherein they all were, they took into their own Custody; and pretending that they themselves would be the first in the Morning, who should be at Stony-Stratford to Attend the King, they sent a certain Number of their Retinue to Line the Way, and suffer none to enter that Town, till they should arrive to wait on his Majesty; for the Dukes were resolv'd (as it was given out) to be the first that Morning who should go to the King from Northampton. All this was done without Lord Rivers's Knowledge or Advice, who therefore when he came to hear it, was very much surpris'd at the thing, and so much the more, because neither himself, nor Servants were permitted to go out of the Inn. His Thoughts were in a great hurry, and what the Reason should be, he could not conjecture. He easily saw thro' their weak Pretences, and began to fear, that his last Night's Cheer might prove a bait to Falshood and Treachery: Fly he could not if he were Guilty, but not being conscious of any Wrong done them, which might provoke them to Revenge, he resolv'd to go to the Dukes, and demand of them the Reason and Cause of this Action, which he accordingly did: But instead of giving him an Answer, they quarrell'd with him, and told him with great Passion, "That "he was one of them, who had labour'd all he could to alienate the King's Mind from them, and stir up a Dissention between the King and his Nobles, that he might bring them and their Families to Confusion: but now they would take Care that it should not lye in his Power. The Lord Rivers was an Eloquent and well-spoken Man, and began to make his Defence calmly and coolly; but they would hear no Excuses, nor suffer him to make Answer, and committing him to the Custody of some of their Servants, till they should give further Orders concerning him, they mounted their Horses, and rode in haste to the King at Stony-Stratford. When they were come into the Royal Presence, (the King being ready to Mount to leave Room for their Companies) they alighted from their Horses with all their Attendants, and saluted the King upon their Knees, who received them freely and favourably, not mistrusting in the least what had been done. They pretended that they came only to wait on his Majesty in his Journey, and to that end the Duke of Buckingham call'd aloud to the Gentlemen and Yeomen to keep their Places, and march forward. But before the King was out of the Town they pick'd a Quarrel with the Lord Richard Grey, the Queen's Son and the King's half Brother, charging him in the King's Presence, "That he and the Marquess

"Dorset, with his Uncle the Lord Rivers, had conspir'd together to rule the King and Realm while the King was in his Minority; and to that end had stirr'd up Divisions among the Nobles, that by subduing some of them, they might destroy the rest: And for the more effectual Accomplishment of this their Design, the Lord Marquess had entred into the Tower of London, and had taken from thence all the King's Treasure, and sent several Ships to Sea with it, that none might be able to 1483. "oppose him. The King, who not only was Young, and unexperienc'd in State-Affairs, but having been absent sometime, was ignorant of such Matters of Fact as his Brother was charged with, yet gave a very Judicious Answer to the Accusation, That he could not tell what his Brother the Marquess had done; but in good faith, he said, he dare well Answer for his Uncle Rivers, and his Brother Richard, that they were both Innocent of any such Matter, having been continually with him. The Duke of Buckingham reply'd, That they had kept the knowledge of their Actions from his good Grace, and forthwith they Arrested the said Lord Grey, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawse in the King's Presence; and then in stead of going forward, return'd back again with the King to Northampton; where they displaced all such Persons, who had any Offices about the King, as they could not confide in, and entred into serious Consultation about their further Proceedings. The King was much troubled at these Dealings, and wept because he had not Power to defend Himself or his Friends, but the Lords had now obtain'd their Designs, and valu'd not who took, what they did, well or ill: yet they gave the King all the respect of good Subjects; and promis'd the Queen's Kindred that all should be well; but when they left Northampton, they sent them to divers Prisons in the North for a time, and at length, tho' they pretended they should have a fair Tryal to answer to several Misdemeanours which they had to lay to their Charge, they were all brought to Pomfract Castle in order to their Execution.

These Actions of the Lords being done under a shew of Friendship, and carrying in them something of Violence and Treachery, begat a great Amazement in all Places where they were known, and few Men construed them, as the Lords wish'd, but look'd upon them as the Prologues to the King's Destruction. The Queen, who was particularly certify'd of the same Night, that the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, and others of their Party, whom she look'd upon as her implacable Enemies, had taken her Son the King, and Imprison'd her Brother Rivers, and Son Richard Grey, with other of her Friends, in Places Remote and Unknown, fell into a bitter Passion of Grief, and bewailed the Destruction of her Child, and other Friends, cursing the Hour in which she credulously harken'd to the Perswasions of her false Friends, and by ordering her Son's Guards to be dismiss'd, had expos'd him and her Kindred to the Malice and base Designs of her Enemies. But since to indulge herself in her just Grief, and neglect a Provision for her own, and those Childrens Safety which she had with her, would make her Case worse than it was at present; therefore she resolv'd to lay aside her Sorrow for the present, and get herself, the Duke of York her 2d Son, and her five Daughters, with what Goods were Necessary for her Use into the Sanctuary at Westminster; and thereupon at Midnight order'd her Servants, and what help could be had, to remove them with all speed thither; where being receiv'd into the Abbot's Lodgings, she and her Children, and all her Company were immediately Registered for Sanctuary Persons, and so look'd upon themselves, as in an inviolable Fortrefs against their Enemies Power or Malice. The Lord Hastings, who was Chamberlain, was at the same time at Court, and tho' a Conspirator with the Lords, yet made a quite different Interpretation of the Lords Actions; because he being truly Loyal, and heartily desiring the Welfare of the 1483. the King, believed, that they had no further Intent, than to take him out of the Government of the Queen's Kindred, whose Insolencies were intolerable, and from whom he himself in the late Reign was often in danger of his Life: He was therefore much pleas'd to see the Queen and her Friends in such a Fright, and not doubting but, the Nation would be much better govern'd than before, and the King much happier in the Hands of the Ancient Nobility, rejoiced to see the Downfall of the Queen, and her Relations, whose Pride they had felt long enough in the late King's Reign; but that he might give the Nobility about the Court a true Information of the Lords Action, he dispatch'd a Messenger the same Night to Dr. Rotherham (a) Archbishop of York, and then Lord Chancellor, who liv'd in York-Place by Westminster, to assure him, "That the Lords Intentions were honourable, and for the Nation's Welfare: and tho' the Imprisonment of the Queen's Kindred, and the Queen's Fears, who was flying in great haste and confusion into Sanctuary, had no good Aspect; yet he should find that all things would in the end prove well. The Archbishop, who was awaked out of his first Sleep by his Servants, and something amazed at the suddenness of the News, reply'd, Say'st thou, that all shall be well? I can't see what good can be expected from such Demeanour. Pray tell him, That be it as well as it will, it will never be so well as we have seen it: and so he sent the Messenger back again to his Master. But the Archbishop was in too great a Disturbance to return to his Rest; and therefore immediately rose, and calling up all his Servants, went with them arm'd to the Queen at her Palace, and carried the Great Seal along with him. He found all things there in a Tumult, the Servants removing Trunks and Householdstuff to carry them into the Sanctuary: The Queen he saw sitting upon the Floor on Mats, lamenting her own and her Childrens Miseries and Misfortunes. The Archbishop, who was no ways engaged in the Conspiracy against her, much compassionated her Case and Grief; and endeavouring to comfort her, told her the Message which he had received from the Lord Hastings not an Hour before, by which he was assured, that Matters were nothing so bad as she imagin'd, that the King was in safe Hands, and doubted not but all would be well. The Queen, who had an invincible Odium to Hastings, as soon as she heard his Name, reply'd, "That nothing was to be believ'd that came from him, being one of them that sought the Destruction of herself and her Blood. The Archbishop seeing her not thus to be comforted, assur'd her for himself, That he would be Constant to her; and if the Lords should deal ill with the Prince, and crown any other Person King besides her Son, he would on the Morrow crown his Brother the Duke of York, whom she had then in Sanctuary with her; And that, Madam, (says he) you may be certain of my Integrity, Lo! here I leave with you the Great Seal of England, the Badge of Regal Power, without which nothing of Moment in State Affairs can be done. His Father your Husband gave it me, and I here return it to you to keep it for his Children, and secure their Right; and if I could give you any greater Testimony of my Loyalty, I would do it: and so he departed to his own House in the dawning of the Morning, not considering what he had done in resigning the Seal. The next day the City of London was in an Up-

1483. roar, and divers Lords and Gentlemen took Arms, and assembled great Companies of Citizens and others for their own Defence, till they should see what the Lords intended; for the general Report was, that what was done to the Lord Rivers, and the others with him, was but a Blind to the People: the real Design of the Nobility was to keep the King from his Coronation, and deprive him of his Right; and this they were the more confirm'd in, because great Numbers of the Duke of Gloucester's Servants and Friends were about the City and on the Thames, who examin'd all that pass'd, and kept any Persons from taking Sanctuary. In these Tumults Archbishop Rotherham, fearing lest there should be a just Occasion to shew his Authority, and troubled that he had deliver'd up the Great Seal to the Queen, to whom it did not belong, without the King's Order, sent privately for the Seal again and obtain'd it. In the mean time, the Lord Chamberlain Hastings, whose Loyalty was not question'd, and who was suppos'd not to be ignorant of the Lords Intentions, went into the City to appease the Tumults, and calling the Lords and Gentlemen together who headed the Commonalty, told them, That tho' the Suddenness of the Lords Actions was surprizing, because the Reasons were not generally known; yet he could assure them, that the Duke of Gloucester was true and faithful to his Prince, of which he had given many undeniable Proofs in his Brother's Reign, and would continue the same to his Son: That the Lords Rivers and Grey, and the Knights apprehended with them, were imprison'd for certain Conspiracies plotted against the Life of the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, as would appear evidently at their Trials, which was design'd shortly to be had before all the Lords of his Majesty's Council: That their taking Arms in such a Riotous and Seditious manner would prove of very dangerous Consequence to themselves, if they did not speedily lay them down, as they had without just Reason or Cause taken them up; and therefore he advised them to depart to their Dwellings, and not pretend to Judge or Censure the Actions of their Superiors, who meant nothing but the Common good, till they knew the Truth of their Designs, lest they themselves should be the only Damages to the Publick, and hinder the King's Coronation, which the Lords were coming up to London to effect with all convenient speed. With these words the Chamberlain so pacify'd the Discontents of the Citizens, that all things were for the present at quiet.

By this time the Lords, who seem'd as Zealous for the King's Coronation as his Uncle had been, and behaved themselves with such wonderful Reverence and Respect to the King, even from the time that he came into their Hands, that he suspected no ill Designs in them, were upon their march to London, which caus'd the People to be the more easie, since they thought that now they should soon discern their Intentions. By the Way as they pass'd, the Duke of Gloucester assum'd nothing upon the Account of his Birth or Greatness, but demean'd himself as a Dutiful Subject; and that he might give a Demonstration to the People of the treacherous and cruel Designs of the Lord Rivers, and the Queen's Friends, against himself and the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke's Servants shew'd the Barrels of Harnes which they had privily convey'd in their Carriages to Murther them;

The King Charity to the Nation to hang them. When the King and Dukes drew near the City of London, Edmund Shaw Goldsmith, then Mayor, and William White and John Matthews Sheriffs, with all their Brethren the Aldermen in Scarlet, and 500 Commoners on Horseback in Purple-colour'd Gowns met them at Harnsey-Park, and with great Honour and Reverence conducted him thro' their City to the Bishop of London's Palace, near St. Paul's Church, on the 4th of May.

Duke of Gloucester's Loyalty shew'd. In this Solemn Cavalcade the Behaviour of the Duke of Gloucester to the King was very remarkable, for he rode bare-headed before him, and often with a loud Voice said to the People, Behold your Prince and Sovereign; giving them on all Occasions such an Example of Reverence and Duty as might teach them how to honour and respect their Prince; by which Actions he so won upon all the Spectators, that they look'd on the late Misrepresentations of him as the Effects of his Enemies Malice, and he was on all hands accounted the Best, as he was the first Subject in the Kingdom. At the Bishop's Palace he did the King Homage, and invited all the Nobility to do the same; by which he put his Loyalty out of dispute with the Nobles, as he had done before with the Commons. Within a few days after, a Great Council of the Nobility

The Duke of Gloucester chosen Protector. met to settle the Government, and choose a Protector according to the usual Custom in the Minority of their Kings, and the Duke of Gloucester was without the least Contradiction appointed to Manage that Honourable Station, not only as the King's Uncle, and the next Prince of the Blood, and a Person fit for that Trust, as of eminent Judgment and Courage; but as one that was most Loyal and Loving to the King, and likely to prove the most Faithful in that Station. By this Council was the Archbishop of York much blamed for delivering the Great Seal to the Queen, and being depriv'd of his Councillorship, the Seal was given in the beginning of June to Dr. John Russell Bishop of Lincoln, a Wife and good Man, and of very great Experience in State-Affairs. Several other Inferior Officers of the Court were displaced, and others more fit put in their Room. The Lord Chamberlain Hastings was continu'd in his Office, with some others whom the Protector and Council had no great Objections against; and so the Council being dissolved, the Protector betook himself to his Double Care: 1. Of the King to Content and Please him, as well as Educate him and Crown him. 2. Of the State and People, to rule so well as might befor the King's Honour and general Good and Welfare of the Nation.

The Protector desires the Duke of York to be brought to the King. King Edward, who was now under the sole Care and Government of his Uncle Richard Duke of Gloucester, made Protector by the Nobility, and general Approbation of the People, being displeased at the Violent Actions of the Lords towards his Mother's Relations, whom not only continual Converse, but Nature had endeared to him, and seeing his Mother and Brother in Sanctuary, as if she had fear'd the same hard Usage, if not worse, was not contented with the present Disposition of Affairs; and tho' he being Young could not help what was done, yet he could not willingly submit to it. The Protector, who was a very Sagacious Person, and shew'd all Readiness to satisfy the King's Will, and discharge his Station well, soon discern'd the Causes of the King's Uneasiness, and considering how much the Reasons of the King's Grief reflected upon his Reputation, as well as hinder'd his Designs in bringing the King to his Coronation, (for why should the Queen with her Children continue in Sanctuary, unless it were that she was Jealous of some Wrong and Injury from him, who having the Supream Power now in his hands could only hurt her? And what a lame Ceremony would the Coronation be, if the Queen and the King's only Brother bore not a Part in it, but instead of that were deterred from it) he resolv'd to remove these Rubs in the way of his Government and Designs; and to that end calling a Council, he deliver'd himself to this Purpose: (a) "Let me perish for ever if it be not my greatest, my continual Care to promote the Happiness and Welfare of the King my Nephew, and all my Brother's Family; being sensible, that not only the Nation's, but my own Ruin is the unavoidable Consequence of their Misfortunes: and therefore since it hath pleased you, who are the Nobles of the Land, and to whom it belongs chiefly to Provide for the good Government of it in the Minority of the King, to confer that weighty Employment of Ruling all upon my self, as I shall always look upon my self only as the King's and your Deputy, so I shall, in all difficult Matters of State, look upon you as my Helpers and Assistants, and not dare to move one Step without your Council and Advice, that so I may have your Approbation in all I do, that it is for the Good of the King and Welfare of all. In the Management of the Station you have placed me in, I do find, that the Queen's Continuance in the Sanctuary with her Children, is such an invincible Impediment in the Execution of my Place, that I cannot but propound the manifest Inconveniences of it; and so much the rather, because I expected, that so good a Settlement as your Lordships had made in the last Council would have remov'd her Womanish Fears, and she would have return'd to Court to the Contentment of his Majesty and us all: but since she persists in her Mischievous Purposes, it is evident, that if Fear drove her into the Sanctuary, 'tis nothing but Malice that keeps her there; for she, who is no impolitic Woman, sees several unavoidable Mischiefs redounding to the Publick, and to his Majesty by this her Action, which had she not some ill Designs she would carefully avoid. And first, what greater Affront can be offer'd to you of his Majesty's Council, than for the Queen and Children to remain in Sanctuary? Will not the People upon so unexpected a Resolution make these Inferences from it, that doubtless they are in very great Danger, and that you who are in Power are her implacable Enemies, since neither her Son's Authority, nor her own and Childrens Greatness, are sufficient to Secure them, but they are forc'd to seek Protection from the Church, which is the Asylum of the greatest Criminals? And

(a) This Speech did not begin with a Curse, according to the Copy in Holinshed, nor is it entirely the same as in Holinshed, Pag. 717.

1483. " what an intolerable Injury is this to you? But " if you shall think fit to pass this Wrong over,
 " yet his Majesty's Discontents are not to be " over-look'd, who wanting the Company of his " Brother, with whom chiefly he uses to Re-
 " create himself, leads a melancholy and dis" contented Life, which doubtless if not timely " prevented may endanger his Health; for the " good State of the Body does not long last usu" ally, when the Mind is disturb'd. Sorrow of " Mind drieth up the Bones, especially in Youth,
 " and want of moderate Recreation and suitable
 " Company begets a Dulness and Pensiveness,
 " which brings Diseases and Distempers on the " Body, which proves fatal. Wherefore since
 " even Kings themselves must have some Com" pany, and they are too great for their Sub" jects generally, it seems Necessary that his " Brother, who comes nearest an Equality with " him, should be sent for to him, that he may " refresh himself with him. And thus we may " hope that the King will not only be satisfy'd
 " and pleas'd, but we shall be freed from the ill
 " Opinion which certainly all foreign Princes
 " have of us; for as long as he continues in " Sanctuary, they will either censure us as " cruel or tyrannical, or deride us as impo-
 " tent or weak. But besides, the Coronation
 " of the King being the main thing now in Agi" tation, how can we proceed in it with any heart
 " or earnestness, while the Queen and Duke of " York are in Sanctuary? What sort of Men shall " we be thought, who at the same time we " crown one Brother, so terrifie the other, that " he is forc'd to abide at the Altar of the same
 " Church for his Safety. Who can with Satis" faction officiate at this great Ceremony, while " the Duke of York, whose Place is next to the " King, is absent from it. It is therefore my " Opinion, these Reasons and Considerations be" ing well weighed, that some Honourable and " Trusty Person, who cannot be doubted to " tender the King's Wealth, and Reputation of " the Council, and is in Credit with the Queen,
 " be sent to her to demand the Release of the " Duke of York: And for this Office, I think
 " no Person better qualify'd than the most Re" verend Father my Lord Cardinal, (a) the " Archbishop of Canterbury, who may be the " most prevailing Mediator in this Matter, if
 " he pleases to take the Trouble upon him,
 " which of his great Goodness, I do believe he will " not refuse for the King's Sake and ours, and
 " the Wealth of the Young Duke himself, the " King's most honourable Brother, and for the " Comfort of my Sovereign Lord himself, my " most Dearest Nephew, considering that it will " be a certain means to stop the Mouths of our " Enemies abroad, and prevent the Ill-constru" ctions of censorious Persons at home, and a" void the ill Consequences which arise from it,
 " both to his Majesty, and the whole Realm.
 " And tho' the Cardinal may go no further
 " in treating with the Queen, than to perswade
 " her by the best Arguments of Reason and " Necessity to yield to our Desires, which his " Wisdom knows best how to Use and Apply;
 " yet if she prove so obstinate and wilful, and " will yield to no Advice and Counsel which he " can give; then 'tis my Opinion that we fetch
 " the Duke of York out of that Prison by force,
 " and bring him into the King's Company and
 " Prefence; in which we will take such Care of " him, and give him such honourable Treatment,
 " that all the World shall perceive, to our Ho" nour and her Reproach, that it was nothing
 " but her Frowardness and groundless Suspicion,
 " that first carried, and then kept him there.
 " This is my Judgment in this Affair; but if any " of you, my Lords, are of contrary Sentiments,
 " and find me mistaken, I never was, nor by " God's Grace ever shall be so wedded to my " own Opinion, but I shall be ready to change
 " it upon better Reasons and Grounds.
 " When the Protector had thus deliver'd his " Mind to the Council, they all approv'd of his " Motion, as a thing good and reasonable in it" self, and honourable both to the King, and the " Duke his Brother, agreeing with him, that the " Archbishop of Canterbury was the fittest Person
 " in all respects, to be a Mediator between the " Queen and them; not doubting, but by his Can" dour and Wisdom this Business might easily be " effected, and the Queen without more ado
 " perswaded to deliver him. Nor did the Arch" bishop at all refuse the Office, which much be" came his Station, being to Compose a growing " Difference among Persons of the Greatest Qua" lity: but he with the Lords Spiritual present
 " told the Council with Submission, (b) That as " he consented to the Motion that the Duke of " York should be brought to the King's Prefence
 " out of the Sanctuary by Perswasions, and would " himself do his Best to effect it, since they had
 " pleas'd to impose that task upon him; yet he " could not by any means consent to that Pro" position, That if the Queen refus'd to deliver
 " him, he should be taken out of Sanctuary by " force; because it would be a thing not only " Ungrateful to the whole Nation, but highly
 " displeasing to Almighty God, to have the Pri" vilege of Sanctuary broken, in that Church,
 " which, being at first consecrated by S. Peter,
 " who came down above 500 Years ago in " Person accompany'd with many Angels by " Night to do it, has since been adorn'd with
 " the Privilege of a Sanctuary by many Popes
 " and Kings; and therefore as no Bishop ever
 " dare attempt the Consecration of that Church,
 " so no Prince has ever yet been so fierce and
 " indevout as to violate the Privilege of it:
 " And God forbid, that any Man whatsoever
 " shall at this time, or hereafter, upon any world" ly Advantages or Reasons, attempt to infringe
 " the Immunities of that most Holy Place, that " hath been the Defence and Safety of so many " Good-mens Lives. However, he said, he hop'd
 " they should not be driven to use such Extre-
 " mities, and doubted not, when the Queen,
 " who was a Person of known Judgment and Un" derstanding, once heard their Reasons, she " would for her Son's sake, the King, readily " yield to their Desires; and if it otherwise
 " should happen, he would so perform his Part,
 " that they should be convinc'd, that there want" ed no good Will, or Endeavour in himself, but " the Queen's Dread, and Womanish fear was " the only Cause of it. The Duke of Buckingham,
 " who impatiently heard the Archbishop's Obje" ction against taking the Duke out of Sanctuary by " force, immediately resumes the Discourse, and in " a Passion replies with an Oath; " Womanish
 " Fear, say you my Lord? Nay, Womanish Fro-" wardness; for I dare take it upon my Soul,

" that

1483. " that she knows she has no just Occasion to fear
 " any Danger to her Son or her self. But as to " her self, here is no Man that will contend with " Women, and I would to God some of her Kin" dred were so too, and then should the Con" test be soon at an end with them. Yet I dare
 " be bold to say, that none of her Kindred are " the Less belov'd for the Relation they have
 " to her, but because of their own Demerits,
 " and for joyning with her in her Malicious De" signs. However let it be granted, that we " love neither her nor her Kindred; yet there " can be no just Ground to infer from thence
 " that we hate the King's Brother, who, tho'
 " her Son, yet is also a-kin to us; and if she
 " desir'd his Honour, as we do, and had not more
 " regard to her own Will, than her Son's Wel" fare, she would not be so obstinate, but would " be as unwilling to keep him from the King's " Prefence, as any of us are. Some of whom
 " at least she must acknowledge to have as much
 " Wit as her self, and can't doubt of their Fi" delity and Love to the Duke, who they would " be as loath should come to any harm as she
 " her self can be, and yet they would have him
 " from her to continue with the King, if she " will tarry there: but if she pleases to come " out her self with him, and her other Children,
 " and take up her Habitation in such a Place
 " where they may be with Honour to her self
 " and them, every Man of us shall be better con" tent than if she sends him alone. Now if upon " these Grounds she refuses to deliver him, de-
 " nyng to follow the Wisdom of them, of whose
 " ripe Judgment and Fidelity she hath had good " Experience, it is easie to discern that it is " her Frowardness, and not her Fear, that is the " Cause of it. But we will suppose that her
 " Distrusts are invincible, thro' the greatness of " her Fears, (as what can hinder her from fear" ing her own Shadow, if she will so much in-" dulse her Passions) we have the greater rea" son to take heed, how we leave the Duke in " her Hands: for if she causelessly fear his hurt
 " out of Sanctuary, she may also fear that he " may be fetch'd from thence; (for 'tis easie for " her to imagin, that if we be resolv'd to have " him from her, we will not value the Sacred" ness of the Place she is in; as indeed I think
 " Good Men without Sin might somewhat less " regard them than they do) and so for grea" ter Security convey him out of the Realm,
 " which if she should be so lucky as to effect,
 " (and without any great Difficulty it may be " done) all the World will scorn and deride
 " us, saying, That we are a wise sort of Coun-
 " cellors about the King, to suffer his Brother
 " to be cast away under our Noses. And there" fore I assure you, for my part, I am for fetch" ing him away against her Will, rather than by " humouring her Fears and Peevishness, give " her an Opportunity of conveying him away.
 " And yet I shall be bold to assert, that I do " not break any Privilege of Sanctuary, but " rather rectify one of the Abuses of it: for
 " tho' indeed Sanctuaries, as they were appoint" ed and used under the Jewish Law, were, and
 " still may be of very good Use in several Cases,
 " as to be a Refuge for such Men as the Chance
 " of Sea, or their evil Debtors have brought to " Poverty, to protect them from the Cruelty of " their Creditors; and because the Title to the " Crown of these Realms hath often come in " Question, in which Contests each Side counts
 " the other Traitors, and the Conquering Side,
 " tho' sometimes the worst Rebels, treats the " adverse Party as such, it is Necessary there

The Use and Abuse of Sanctuaries.

1483. " should be a Refuge in this Case to the Unfor" tunate: but as for Thieves and Murderers,
 " whereof these Places are full, and who sel" dom leave their Trade when they have once
 " begun, it is an horrid Shame that any San" ctuary should save them; and especially wil-
 " ful Murderers, whom God himself commands
 " to be taken from the Altar, and put to Death.
 " Yet if we look into our Sanctuaries, as now
 " they are managed, how few are there whom
 " Necessity of their own Defence, or their Mis" fortunes have driven to take Shelter there?
 " But on the other side, what numbers are there
 " in them of Thieves, Murderers, and malicious
 " and heinous Traitors, and especially in the " two chief Ones in this City, the one at the " Elbow, and the other in the very Midst of it?
 " Infomuch that if the Good they do were bal-
 " lanc'd with the Evil, we shall find 'twere bet" ter for us to be without them, unless such as
 " are in Power would effectually correct their " Abuses, and amend them. And indeed, 'tis
 " a gross Shame not to be endur'd, to see St. Pe" ter made a Patron of Thieves, Prodigals, Knaves
 " and Whores! Surely neither God, nor that " Apostle can approve of these Abuses; and
 " therefore they may be reformed with thanks
 " of Both. Let Sanctuaries then continue in God's " Name in their full force, as far as Religion
 " and Reason will permit, and I am sure no
 " lawful Privilege granted to them can hinder
 " us from fetching the Duke of York from thence,
 " where he neither is, nor can be a Sanctuary-" Person. A Sanctuary serveth to defend the " Body of Man, who is in Danger from not on" ly some great, but unlawful Hurt? And what " Danger is that Duke in? Is not the King his " Brother, and all we his Special Friends? As " he has never done any Man an Injury, so
 " no Man designs him any Wrong, and then
 " what Grounds can there be for him to be " left in Sanctuary? Besides, Men come not to " a Sanctuary, as to Baptism by Godfathers, but " they must ask it themselves if they will have
 " it; for none but such as can alledge their just
 " Fears and Dangers ought to be admitted thi" ther. And how can the Duke of York be just" ly entertain'd or kept there, who cannot thro'
 " his Infancy require it; and if he were sensible
 " of the Place he is in, would rather desire " to be released from it: So that I think
 " with the Clergy's Leave, 'tis no Breach of " Privilege, if he and many others be taken by " Force out of it. And to convince them of it
 " more fully, let me ask them a few Questions.
 " If a Man go into Sanctuary with another Man's " Goods, may not the King, leaving his Body
 " at Liberty, take them out of Sanctuary, and " restore them to the right Owner? Can either
 " Pope or King privilege a Man from paying " Debts that is able to pay them? Several of " the Clergy present agreed, That by the Laws
 " of God and the Church, a Sanctuary-Man may " be deliver'd up to pay his Debts, or restore
 " stoln Goods, his Liberty being allow'd him to " get his Living by his Labour. Then the Duke
 " said, " There's the same Reason to do it, if a " Man's Wife ran from him to Sanctuary, or a " Child take Sanctuary because he will not go to " School, and many like Cases. And therefore I " conclude, that since he can be no Sanctuary-" Man who hath no Discretion to desire it, (for
 " I never yet heard of Sanctuary-Children) nor
 " Malice to deserve it, whose Life and Liberty
 " can in no wise be in Danger, he that taketh such " an one out of Sanctuary to do him good, breaks
 " no Privilege of that Holy Place.

When

1483. When the Duke had finish'd this long Discourse, it was generally Agreed by all the Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, (a) That if the Queen would not Deliver up the Duke by Perswasions, he should be forc'd from her by the King's Authority: But it being judg'd convenient that all fair Means should be first try'd, the Cardinal, with several Lords to accompany him, was sent into the Sanctuary to the Queen; the Protector, and the rest of the Council going into the Star-Chamber at Westminster to expect the Event. When the Cardinal was come into the Queen's Presence, after all Dutiful Salutations, he Deliver'd to her the Cause of his Coming, Saying, "That he was with those other Lords, sent by the Protector, and the Privy Council to her Majesty, to let her know, how much her Detaining of the Duke of York in that Place was Scandalous to the Publick, and disliked by the King his Brother; it being an Action that must needs produce ill Effects: That the King himself was much grieved at it, and the Council offended, because it look'd as if one Brother was in Danger from the other, and could not be Preserved by the other's Life: That it would be a very great Comfort to his Majesty to have his Natural Brother in Company with him; nor would it be of Less Advantage to the Young Duke himself, because it would Confirm and Strengthen their Loves to be brought up together, as well at their Books, as Sports: That in the King's Court the Duke could only Live answerable to his State and Condition: That it would much Please the Protector and Council to send him to the King's Presence, and in Effect might prove of no Small Advantage to her Friends, that were in Prison. Upon which Accounts, as he was sent by his Majesty and Council to demand the Duke of her, to be brought to his Brother; so he could not but earnestly entreat her to comply with a thing so very Reasonable, and every way Convenient. The Queen, who was of a sharp Wit and graceful Speech, answer'd the Cardinal; and said, "My Lord, I cannot deny, but it is very convenient that my Son, the Duke, should be in the Company of his Brother the King as well for Society, as Love's-sake; but since they are both so Young, as that it is the most suitable for them to be under the Government of their Mother; It is better for the King to be with me here, than that I should send the Duke to him: Tho' was it really otherwise, that Duty obliged the Duke to go to him, yet Necessity in this Case creates a Dispensation, because he hath been of late so sorely afflicted with Diseases, and being not perfectly recover'd is in so great a Danger of a Relapse (which generally Physicians say is more fatal than the first Sickness) that I dare trust no Earthly Person as yet with the Care of him: For tho' I doubt not, but that he might have such about him as would do their Best to Preserve his Health, yet since I have ordered him all along, and am his Mother, it must be allow'd by all Men, that as I am the most Able, so I shall be the most Affectionately Careful and Tender of him. And for these Reasons, I hope both the King and his Council will dispense with his Absence a-while, till he is perfectly Recovered, and in Health; and before that, I can't endure to hear of Parting with him.

The Cardinal hearing this Reply, answer'd; 1483. "No Man, Good Madam, doth deny but that your Majesty is the fittest Person to take Care of all your Children, and I am sure the Council will be very Glad to hear that it is your Pleasure so to do; yea, they would beg it of you, Provided you would be contented to do it in such a Place as is consistent with their, and your own Honour; Whereas, if you resolve to tarry in this Place, then they judge it more convenient, that the Duke should be with the King at Liberty, to the Comfort and Satisfaction of them both, tho' with some small Danger to his Health; than to remain in Sanctuary, to the Dishonour of the King, Duke himself, and the whole Council: for it is not always so Necessary that the Child should be with the Mother, but there may be Reasons sometimes of taking him from her, and that for the Best, as your Majesty knows there was, when your Eldest Son, then Prince of Wales, and now King, was sent to keep his Court at Ludlow for his own Honour and the Good Order of the Country, of which your Majesty was so well convinced, that you seem'd Contented with it.

The Queen grew a little Warm, and smartly retorted, "Not so very well Contented neither at that Separation; tho' the Case is much different now: For the Prince was in good Health, the Duke is now Sick; for tho' the height of the Distemper is past, yet he is Weak, and not so fully recovered, but that without great Care he may fall into a Relapse; in which Condition, while he remains, I wonder that the Protector and Council should be so Earnest to have him from me, since if the Child should grow Sick again and Miscarry, they would incur the Censures of some Ill-dealings with him. And whereas you say that it is Dishonourable to my Child, and to them, that he remain in this Place, I think the Contrary; for certainly 'tis most for their Honour to let him Abide, where no Man can doubt but he will remain Safest, and that is here so long as I continue here: and I do not intend to leave this Place and endanger my Life with my Friends, who, I would to God were rather in Safety here with me, than I were in Hazard with them. Why, Madam, (saith the Lord Howard) "Do you know any Reason, that they are in Danger? No truly, (said she roundly) "Nor why they should be in Prison neither, as they now be: but I have great Cause to fear, lest those, who have not scrupled to put them in Prison without Cause, will as little value to Destroy them without Law or Right. Upon these Words, the Cardinal wink'd upon the Lord to put an End to that Discourse; and then added himself, "That he did not doubt, but that those Lords, who being of her Kindred remained under Arrest, would upon a due Examination of Matters, discharge themselves well enough of any Accusation alledged against them: And as to her own Royal Person, there neither was, nor could be any kind of Danger. How shall I be certain of that (said the Queen)? Is it, that I am Innocent? It doth not appear that they are Guilty. Is it, that I am better beloved of their Enemies? No; but rather, they are hated for my Sake. Is it, that I am so nearly related to the King? They are not much further off: and therefore since it seems to me, that as

(a) Several of the Bishops were against fetching him out by Force.

1483. "I am in the same Cause, so I am in like Danger;
"I do not intend to depart out of this Place.
"And as for my Son, the Duke of York, I pur"pose to keep him with me till I see how Busi"nesses will go; for the more greedy and ear"nest some Men are to have him into their "Hands without any substantial Cause, the more "Fearful and Scrupulous am I to deliver him.

The Cardinal's
Answer.

"And the more Suspicious you are, Madam, (answer'd the Cardinal) "the more Jealous are "others of you, least under a causeless Pretence
"of Danger, you should convey him out of the "Nation; and so if they permit him to remain
"with you now, it shall not be in their Power "to have him for the Future. Wherefore it is "the Opinion of many of the Council, that "there is a Necessity of taking the Duke of York
"immediately into their Care and Government,
"and since he can enjoy no Privilege by Sanctu"ary, who has neither Will to Require it, nor "Malice or Offence to need it, they judge it no
"Breach of Sanctuary, if you finally refuse to "deliver him by fair means, to fetch him out "of it: And I assure you, Madam, that the "Protector, who bears a most tender Love to "his Nephews; and the Council, who have an "equal Care and Respect for your Children, will "certainly set him at Liberty, unless you resign
"him to us, least you should send him away. Ay,

Queen's Reply.

(says the Queen) "hath the Protector his Uncle
"such a Love for him, that he fears nothing
"more than that he should Escape his Hands?
"I unfeignedly declare, that it never so much "as entred into my Thoughts to send him out "of this Place into any Foreign Parts, partly "because his Health will not bear any Journeys,
"and partly because, tho' I should not scruple
"to send him into any Part of the World,
"where I knew him out of all Danger, yet I do "not think any Place more secure than this
"Sanctuary, which there never was any Ty"rant so devilish, who dare Violate; and I trust
"that the Almighty God will so awe the Minds
"of his, and my Enemies, as to Restrain them "from offering Violence to this Holy Place. But

Queen's Argument for Privileges of Sanctuary.

"you tell me, That the Lord Protector and
"the Council are of Opinion that my Son can't "deserve a Sanctuary, and therefore may not "be allow'd the Privileges of it: He hath found "out a goodly Gloss, as if that Place which can "Protect a Thief, or Wicked Person, is not of "greater Force to Defend the Innocent, because "he is in no Danger, and therefore can have no
"need of it; which is an Opinion as Erroneous
"as Hellish. But the Child, you say, can't re"quire the Privilege of a Sanctuary, and there-

"is not the Sanctuary a Protection in that Case

"less my Child. Besides by Law, as my Lear-

"Nature, as his Mother; and by the Law of "God, as being in Sanctuary with him; If all
"this be not enough to secure him from any
"Human Force, I think nothing under Heaven

"have always found so much. Here was I brought "to Bed of my Son who is now King, and tho'
"his Enemy Reigned, and might have used the "same or like Pretences to have taken us both
"from Sanctuary, yet he did not; and I hope
"no Man will have the Boldness to act contra"ry to all former Precedents, but the Place
"that protected one Son, will be as great a "Security to the other: For to be plain with "you, My Lord, I fear to put him into the "Protector's Hands, because he hath his "Brother already, and since he pretends to be "the next Heir to the Crown after them, not"withstanding his Sisters, if they any ways
"miscarry, his Way to the Throne lies Plain "and Easy to him. Now this is so just a Cause
"of Fear, that even the Laws of the Land teach "me it, which as Learned Men tell me, forbids
"every Man the Guardianship of them, by "whose Death they become Heirs to their In"heritance; and if the Law is so careful of
"such as have the least Inheritance, how much "more ought I to be fearful that my Children
"come not into his Power, who by their Death
"will have the Kingdom for his Inheritance.
"By these Reasons I am confirmed in my Reso"lutions of keeping my Son in Sanctuary with "me and my Right so to do, and think them so "far to Out-ballance the Protector's frivolous "Reasons of keeping his Brother company, and
"being Dishonourable to him, that I cannot al"ter my Mind: For I have reason to think that "whoever he proves a Protector to, he will "prove a Destroyer to them, if they be once in "his Hands and Power. I know the Protector
"and Council have Power enough, if they have
"Will, to take him and me from this Place;
"but whosoever he be that shall dare to do it,

"ary, but no Possibility to come to it.

These Words of the Cardinal's being Perem- ptory and Short, much amused the Queen, being put to it on a sudden to resolve whether she would send him, or no. The Cardinal she saw ready to depart, and the Protector and Council were near she knew; what to do she could not tell: she fear'd that by Delivering him, she cast him into the Mouth of Ruin; and by Keeping him, she did but provoke the Protector and Council to be more Rough and Severe with them both. She saw there was no way to save him from the Protector's Hands, but by Conveying him out of his Knowledge or Power; which tho' she Wish'd, yet she had no Way to effect it: Wherefore she resolv'd to make the best use of Necessity, and since the Protector must have him, take the best Way to Secure him in his Hands. She consider'd, that her Fears were but grounded on vehement Presumptions, and therefore hop'd Things might not prove so Bad as she imagin'd. She could not doubt of the Cardinal's Sincerity and Loyalty to her Son, and tho' she indeed fear'd he might be deceived, yet she did not believe either he, or the Lords present, would be any ways Accessory to his Destruction: and for these Reasons she thought it better to deliver him to them, who were ready to Pawn their Honour and Lives for his Security, and would therefore look upon themselves engaged for his Safety, than suffer him to be taken from her; and there- upon taking her Son, the Duke of York, in her Hand, she led him to the Cardinal and Lords, and with great Earnestness said to them, " My

The Queen's Speech at the Delivery of the Duke of York to the Lords.

" Lord Cardinal, and you my Lords, I am not " so opinionated of my self, or ill-advised " concerning you, as to Mistrust either your " Wisdom or Fidelity, as I shall prove to you " by reposing such Trust in you, as, if either of " them be wanting in you, will Redound to my " Inexpressible Grief, the Damage of the whole " Realm, and your eternal Shame and Disgrace: " For Lo! Here is my Son, the Person whom " you desire; and tho' I doubt not but that I " could keep him Safe in this Sanctuary from " all Violence; yet here I resign him into your " Hands. I am sensible that I run great Hazards " in so doing, no whit less than my Fears sug- " gest; for I have some so great Enemies to my " Blood, that if they knew where any of it lay " in their own Veins, they would presently let " it out; and much more in others, and the near- " er to me the more Zealously. Experience " also convinces us all, that the Desire of a " Kingdom knows no Kindred. The Brother " in that Case hath been the Destruction of the " Brother, and the Son of his Father; and have " we any Cause to think the Uncle will be more " tender of his Nephews? Each of these Chil- " dren are the other's Defence while they are " asunder; if one be safe they are both secure; " but being both together they are in great Dan- " ger: and therefore as a Wise Merchant will " never adventure all his Goods in one Ship, " so it looks not so Politickly in me to put " them both under the same Hazards. But not- " withstanding all this, (whether rightly foreseen " or no, I leave to you to think on, and pre- " vent.) I do here Deliver him, and his Brother " in him to your Keeping, of whom I shall ask " him again at all times before God and the " World. I am Confident of your Fidelity, and

" and have no reason to distrust your Wisdom, " Power, or Ability to keep him, if you will " make use of your Resolution when it is re- " quired; and if you are unwilling to do that, " then I pray you leave him still here with me: " and that you may not meet with more than " you did expect, let me beg of you, for " the Trust which his Father ever reposed " in you, and for the Confidence I now put in " you, that as you think I fear too much, so " you would be cautious that in this weighty " Case you fear not too little; because your " Credulity here may make an irrecoverable " Mistake. Having thus spoken, she turn'd to " the Child, and said to him, " Farewel, mine own " sweet Son, The Almighty be thy Protector: Let " me Kiss thee once more before we part, for " God knows when we shall Kiss again; and then " having kissed him, she Blessed him, and turn'd " from him and wept, and so went her way, leav- " ing the Child with the Lords weeping also for " her Departure.

The Cardinal and Lords having obtain'd their The Duke Desire thus, and gotten the Duke of York from of York brought to the Protector. his Mother, immediately led him to the Star- Chamber, where the Protector and Lords of the Council staid in Expectation of him. The Pro- tector receiv'd him with all the seeming Kind- ness and Respect that was due to him, as the King's Brother and his Nephew; and taking him in his Arms kissed him, and said, Now Welcome my Lord with all my very Heart: and the same Day carried him to the King his Brother, who was at the Bishop of London's Palace near S. Paul's Church. Here he left them a few Days toge- ther; and because all Things were in a great forwardness for the Coronation, which he was Zealous to Promote, he caus'd the King and the Duke his Brother to be remov'd to the Tower, the usual Place from whence that Solemnity be- gan, with much Pomp and State. But now the Protector was at a stand how to Proceed: He look'd upon himself, as the Lawful King of these Realms, by the Judgment of such as were best Able to determine such Doubts; but yet since his Brother's Children were generally presumed the True Heirs, and their Illegitimacy not un- derstood, or Disregarded, he was Afraid to Claim his Right against the Common Opinion, and yet as loath to throw it up himself, as he must do by Crowning his Brother's Son. There was almost a Necessity the Coronation should go forward; it had proceeded so far, that the Na- tion would grumble extreamly at the Expence if it were now laid aside; and on the other side, if his Nephew were crown'd he must give up his Right, and not only deprive himself but his Children: Wherefore he resolv'd with himself to seem as Earnest as ever in carrying it on, A Council and to that end, appointed a Council of such appoint- ed to carry on the Coronation. Lords as he knew to be most Faithful to the King his Nephew, of whom the Lord Hastings the Chamberlain, and Lord Stanley were the Chief, to Assemble De die in diem at Baynard's- Castle to consult and contrive the Ways and Ceremonies for the Coronation of his Nephew; but in the mean Season he contriv'd secretly to make known his own Title to certain Persons that he could Confide in, and by delaying the Coronation try how far his own Interests might be Advanced, that he might obtain his Right Peaceably and Quietly; but being Sensible how great Prejudices he was to Encounter with on all Hands, he knew he must proceed very warily in it. The Duke of Buckingham in all his Mo- tions hitherto had been his chief Friend and Assistant. He in a manner had made him Pro- tector, 1483. tector, and it would be such a Disobligation if he should not make use of him in his Councils, that he certainly would turn his Enemy, and being of such mighty Interest would pull him down, as he had set him up. And yet he could hardly hope for any Encouragement from him; because tho' the Duke was a Male-content in the Days of the late King, yet he seem'd very Loyal to his Son, as if he had Buried the Enmity to his Father in his Grave. But the Protector knew old Enmity is easily Reviv'd, and to prepare the Duke of Buckingham for his Designs, he Suborn'd certain Persons about the Duke to represent to him the King's Displeasure for Imprisoning his Mother's Kindred, and into what a miserable Dilemma he had run himself by that Action; for if they were Released they'd bear him an Immortal Grudge, and if they were put to Death, he was sure to incur the King's Anger so much, that he could hope for nothing, but Misfortunes on all Hands; for the King did not Refrain from such Expressions as shew'd, that whenever he had Power he would Revenge it upon him to the Utmost. These Relations struck him with a Fear of Danger, and predispos'd him to lay hold upon any Opportunity of Securing himself; which the Duke of Gloucester, who laid the Train, soon offer'd him: for a little after inviting him to a Conference, he desired him to Assist him in taking upon him the Crown of England as his Right, shewing him the Judgment of the Civil Lawyers concerning the Illegitimacy of his Brother's Children, and promising, as the Reward of his Faithful Services to him, that his Son should Marry the Duke's Daughter; that he would give him the Earldom of Hereford with all the Appurtenances, which tho' his Inheritance, yet had been Unjustly kept from him by his Brother; And lastly, That he would Allow him a large Share of R. Edward's Treasure, and so much of the Wardrobe as should furnish his House, and settle upon him and his Posterity the Office of the High-Constable of England, which his Ancestors by Descent for many Generations had enjoy'd.

Duke of Buckingham engages with the Protector in taking the Crown.

The Duke of Buckingham was not hard to be won to engage in such an Action as secur'd him from his present Fears, and afforded a Prospect of so much Gain and Advantage, and so became a Zealous Actor for the Protector in making him King; for he soon brought many of his Friends into the same Design, and with the Protector constituted a Council, which sat at Crosby's-Place, the Protector's Mansion House, to contrive the most Artificial and Politick Ways to Settle the Crown upon his Head; but they were to meet very Secretly and Privately.

The Pro-
tector's Private Council suspected
other.

This Council had not sat long, but both their Persons and their Actions were Discerned: for Cardinal Bourcier Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Rotherham Archbishop of York, John Morton Bishop of Ely, the Lord Stanley, Lord Hastings, and other Persons of Quality, who were busie to order the Coronation, perceiv'd that, notwithstanding their Endeavours, Matters mov'd slowly, and they saw Cause to suspect contrary Motions.

The Common People began to Murmur at the Delays of the Coronation, and Talk'd as tho' there were some bad Designs on foot, tho' no Man could guess at what was really intended; but it was generally look'd upon as a bad Omen that the Protector took upon him a State and Magnificence above his Place, and would endure none but his own Servants about the King, who gave an unkind Welcome to all Persons, that either desir'd to see the King out of Curiosity, or wait on him out of Duty; as tho' they would tell Men that they must seek the King elsewhere, viz. at their Master's Palace, which was soon so well understood by such as expected any Honours and Preferments at Court, that the Protector was Flatter'd and Caress'd as King, while his Nephew was little regarded, and bore only an insignificant Name.

These Actions increased the Jealousie of the Lords who sat at Baynard's-Castle to Direct the Coronation; and the Lord Stanley, who was a Wise and Sagacious Man, began to declare openly to his Brethren, "That he much dislike'd these Doings, and could not believe that two different Councils could Produce any good Effects: We are conscious of the Loyalty and Integrity of our Actions; but who knows what the Cabal at Crosby's-Place Talk of, and Contrive? I fear, what we are Building, they are Plucking down; and unless we could Unite, or know their Councils, ours will be in Vain. Peace, My Lord, said the Lord Hastings, never fear or misdoubt any thing; I durst assure you upon my Life All's well, or at least nothing Ill is intended against Us: For while One Man is there, who is never Absent, I am sure there can be nothing propounded which shall sound Ill to me, but it will be in my Ears as soon as it is out of their Mouths almost. This the Lord Hastings meant of one Catesby a Lawyer, who was his special Confident, and being put into a Considerable Trust in the Counties of Leicester and Northampton, where this Lord's Interest and Power lay, merely by his Means, was reputed by him so Faithful and Grateful, that he would neither do, nor suffer to be done any things Injurious to his Patron: which indeed he had great reason to have done, but he much deceiv'd him, as will after appear, and so was the Chief Instrument of Working the Protector's Will and Aims; for the Lords generally saw so many Signs of Distrust, that had they not rely'd entirely upon the Lord Hastings's Word, whom they knew Firm and Loyal, they had all departed every Man to his own Country and provided for their own Safety, which had certainly broken all the Protector's Measures; for they were Men of great Power and Interest with the People, and could easily have kept Matters in the Right Current had they been at Home; but Catesby carrying all fair to Hastings, and he perswading them that nothing could be done amiss till he should know it and advertise them of it, they trusted to him, and denying their own Senses almost to construe all things for the best, laid themselves open to Ruin, and made way to the Protector's Designs, which both himself and his Council were vigilant to improve.

The former Jealousies of the Council at Baynard's-Castle were soon known to the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, and tho' they would not seem to be sensible of it, yet they took up Resolutions with themselves either to win them over to their Side, or if not to secure them from being their Enemies, and to this end they shew'd great Favour to the Lord Hastings, who much influenc'd the Actions of all the Rest, and kept him much in their Company, hoping by Familiarity and friendly Endearments to dispose him to a Compliance with their Designs, which they not long after caus'd Catesby his familiar Acquaintance to Propound to him, but at some distance, least his Refusal should betray all; for if they could gain him, they were sure of the greater part of the Rest. Catesby, who now had forgotten all former Obligations, and 1483. and was courting greater Favours, readily undertook the Employment, and coming to the Lord Hastings, who had not yet the least Mistrust of him, after much other Discourse about the present Circumstances of Affairs, asks his Opinion about the Title and Claim that the Protector had to the Crown; insinuating, that if it might Lawfully be done, it would be better that an Experienc'd Person and a Brave Commander should Rule than a Child. The Lord Hastings, who was firmly Loyal to K. Edward's Children, presuming upon Catesby's Fidelity, freely open'd his Mind to him without any Circumlocutions, and having shew'd him what Jealousies the Council had of the Protector's Actions, with Indignation expressed his utter Dislike of it in Words to this Effect: "That he had rather see the Death and Destruction of the Protector and D. of Buckingham, than the Young King deprived of the Crown; and that if he discern'd any Designs that Way in any Persons whatsoever, he would engage his utmost Power and Ability against them. These Words, which 'tis believed the Lord Hastings would never have spoke, had he suspected (a) either the Mission, or Treachery of Catesby, were carried to the Protector immediately, and represented to him not with the mollifying Terms of a Friend, but Aggravations of an Enemy, because he hop'd by his Death and the Protector's Favour, which for this ill Office alone he had reason not to doubt of, to obtain most of the Rule and Trust, which that Lord had in his Country, and so his Ruin would be his own Making.

Catesby's Treachery.

The Protector received the Account of Hastings's Aversion to his Designs with much Trouble and Regret, not for the Disappointment only, but because he had a great Love for him, who had always been his Friend, and had done him many Kindnesses in his Brother's Days, and therefore engaged Catesby to win him, if possible: but Catesby willing to see his Downfall, represented him so irreconcilable to his Proceedings, that he chang'd the Protector's Love into Hatred to him, and made him lay hold upon any slight Pretences to take away his Life, without which he saw he must meet with a great Impediment in the Road of his Ambition, and so the Way was Agreed upon in this Manner. The Protector call'd a Great Council at the Tower on Friday the 13th of June, on pretence of concluding all Things for the Coronation, which drew on apace, the Pageants being making Day and Night at Westminster, and Victuals killed ready for it. The Lords of this Council assembled Early in the Morning, and sat Close to their Business to settle every thing for that Solemnity.

Hastings's Death contriv'd.

The Protector came about Nine a Clock to them, and having Saluted all the Lords very courteously, excus'd himself for coming to them so late, saying Merrily, That he had play'd the Sluggard this Morning. Then he sat down and discoursed a-while with them about the Business in hand, and was very Pleasant and Jocular in all his Speeches. Among other things more Serious he by the Bye said to the Bishop of Ely, My Lord, You have very good Strawberries in your Garden at Holborn, I desire you to let us have a Dish to Dinner. Gladly, my Lord, will I do that, (quoth the Bishop) I wish I had some better Thing as ready for your Service as they; and thereupon sent his Servant in all haste for a Dish of Strawberries. A little after this, the Protector obliging them to go on in their Councils, requested them to dispense with his Absence a-while, and so Departed.

In the space of little more than an Hour he return'd again, but with such an angry Countenance, knitting his Brows, frowning and biting his Lips, that the whole Council were amaz'd at the sudden Change. Being set down, he said nothing for a good while, but at length spoke with great Concern, and ask'd them this Question, What Punishment do they deserve who had Plotted his Death, who was so near in Blood to the King, and by Office the Protector of the King's Person and Realm? This Question he had rais'd out of Catesby's Account of the Lord Hastings's Words and Discourse, which he so represented to him, as if he had Wish'd and Contriv'd his Death. The Lords of the Council were much startled at it, and, thinking with themselves of whom he meant it, return'd no Answer. The Lord Hastings who was always familiar with him, and thought this general Silence not respectful, reply'd, That they deserv'd to be punish'd as heinous Traitors, whosoever they were. Then said the Protector, And that hath that Sorceress my Brother's Wife, (meaning the Queen, but disdain'd to call her so) with others her Accomplices endeavour'd to do. These Words begat fresh Fears and Disturbances among them; because they most of them favour'd the Queen: but Hastings was well enough Content that the Crime was not laid upon any that he lov'd better, tho' he lik'd not that the Protector had not communicated it to him, as he had done his Designs to put the Queen's Kindred to Death: (which was by his Advice and Approbation to be done that Day at Pomfret-Castle.) The Protector still went on in his Complaints, and said, "See, in what a miserable manner that Sorceress, and Shore's Wife, with others their Associates have by their Sorcery and Witchcraft miserably destroy'd my Body: And therewith Unbuttoning his Left Sleeve, shew'd them his Arm fleshless, dry and wither'd, Saying, "Thus would they by degrees have destroy'd my whole Body, if they had not been Discover'd and Prevented, in a short time. This Proof, which the Protector thought to give of his Accusation, convinc'd the Council that he had only a Mind to Quarrel with them, for they all knew that his Arm was never otherwise, and that as the Queen was too Nice to engage in any such Foolish Enterprize, so if she had done it, she would not have made Shore's Wife, whom of all Women she most hated, because she was her Husband's best-beloved Concubine, one of her Council.

The Queen accused of Witchcraft.

The Lord Hastings, who from King Edward's Death had kept Shore's Wife (for whom he had a great Kindness in the King's Life, but in Reverence to him forbore her) was inwardly troubled to hear her, whom he lov'd, and knew to be Innocent of any such thing, so highly and unjustly Accused, and because he had made the first Answer to the Duke's Question, he took himself obliged to return as Modest an Answer as he could to his Accusation; and therefore said, "Certainly my Lord, if they have indeed done any such Thing, they deserve to be both severely punish'd: But this Answer discover'd the Lord Hastings's Opinion so much, that he thought the Accusation false and forged, that

(a) Sir Thomas Moor makes it a Doubt whether he Spoke the Words, or not; or indeed, whether Catesby try'd him, or not.

1483. the Protector in Anger catch'd hold of his Words, and said, Do you Answer me with If's and And's, as if I charg'd them falsely? I tell you, they have done it, and thou hast joyn'd with them in this Villainy; and therewith clapped his Fist down hard upon the Board, at which Sign several Men in Arms rush'd into the Room, crying, Treason, Treason. The Protector seeing them come in, said to the Lord Hastings, I Arrest the Traitor. What me, My Lord, said Hastings? Yea, thou Traitor, said the Protector. Whereupon he was taken into their Custody. In this Buffle, which was all before contrived, a certain Person struck at the Lord Stanley with a Pole-Ax, and had certainly cleft him down, had not he been aware of the Blow and sunk under the Table: yet he was wounded so on the Head that the Blood ran about his Ears.

Then was the Archbishop of York, Bishop of Ely, and Lord Stanley, with divers other Lords who were thought averse to his Designs, Imprison'd in several places in the Tower; and the Lord Hastings order'd forthwith to Confess and Prepare himself for his Death, for the Protector had Sworn by St. Paul that he would not Dine till his Head was off.

It was in vain to complain of Severity, or demand Justice, the Protector's Oath must not be broken: so he was forc'd to take the next Priest that came, and make a short Confession, for the Common Form was too long for the Protector's Stomach to wait on, and being immediately hurried to the Green by the Chappel within the Tower, his Head was laid on a Timber-logg which was provided for Repairing the Chappel, and there stricken off. His Body and Head were carried to Windfor, and there buried by his Master King Edward IV. late deceased, it being very Convenient that he should have a Place next him at his Death, who had lost his Life for his Unmoveable Loyalty to his Children.

Omens of Hastings's
Death.

The Death of this Great Lord, as it was sudden and unsuspected, so it may seem to have been particularly regarded by Heaven, from whence he had many Omens of it given him either to avoid it or prepare for it, if he had had but Wisdom to take a due Notice of them; which are worth a particular Relation, that we may see the Care Providence has of Men in imminent Dangers.

The Night before his Death the Lord Stanley had a fearful Dream, in which he thought that a Wild Boar with his Tusshes had so wounded his own and the Lord Chamberlain's Head, that the Blood ran about both their Shoulders. This Dream had more than an usual Impression upon him, and because he interpreted the Dream of the Protector, who gave the Boar for his Arms, and the Wounds and Blood from their Heads of some imminent Danger of their Lives, he resolv'd no longer to tarry within reach of his Power, but ordering Horses to be got ready, sent his Chamberlain to the Lord Hastings at Midnight to acquaint him with his Dream, and encourage him to take Horse as fast as he could, and with him secure himself, for with swift Horses they could get near their Friends by Morning.

Lord Stanley from his Dream advise him to fly.

The Lord Hastings, tho' awak'd out of his Sleep, yet being naturally a Man neither Melancholy nor Superstitious, receiv'd the Message with a Smile; And said to him, Doth my Lord, your Master, give so much Credit to such Trifles as Dreams, which are usually the Effect of our Fears or Cares? Pray tell him, That it is plain Witchcraft to believe in such Dreams, which if they may be allowed Foretellers of Things to come, yet are so Uncertain, that we may do our selves more Harm than Good in following them: for who could assure him, that if there is any real Danger to be feared from the Boar, we shall not fall into it rather by Flying than Tarrying? For if we should be taken and brought back, (as might very well happen) we should give the Boar just Occasion to Goar us; for our Flight would be such an Argument of some Guilt, that we could hardly avoid it, and to alledge a Dream as the Cause, would make us ridiculous to all Men: Wherefore if there were Danger, as indeed there is none unless in his causeless Fears, it is rather in Flying than Tarrying; and if we must fall into it one way or other, I had rather that Men should see it to be from others Falshood, than my Guilt or Cowardice: And therefore go to thy Master, and commend me to him, and bid him be merry and fear nothing; for I can assure him, that there is as little Danger from the Man he means as from my own right Hand. God grant it may be so (says the Messenger) and so departed. The Gentleman brought the Message to his Lord, and made him forgot his Resolution; tho' with what Mischief to himself the Event proved.

Other Ominous Presages he had of his Death that Morning, which his Security would not suffer him to take Notice of. Before he was up from his Bed, (where he had lain all Night with Shore's Wife) there came to him Sir Thomas Howard, Son of the Lord Howard, to call him as he pretended, and to Accompany him to the Council; but he was really sent by the Protector to perswade him to come if he should not intend it, or if he design'd it to hasten him; which tho' he manag'd artificially enough, yet being of the Protector's Cabinet Council he was suspicious, and in the Way as they passed along, he gave the Lord Hastings such an Odd interruption, in his Discourse with a Priest which he met by the Way, by telling him, tho' merrily, That he wonder'd he would Talk so long with a Priest, He had no Occasion for one, as yet; that he might easily have suspected he knew that he should have need of one Soon: but he was a loose and careless Man, and regarded it not.

In the Way also as he passed from his House to the Tower, his Horse that he was accusom'd to Ride, stumbled with him twice or thrice so dangerously that he had almost falln; which thing, tho' it happens almost daily to Persons who fall into no Mischance, yet of old it was accounted a certain Presage of some Misfortune. Also when he came to the Tower-Wharff, within a Stone's cast of the place where his Head was cut off a few Hours after, he met with a Purse-servant of his own Name call'd Hastings, who having met him in the same Place, when he lay under King Edward's Displeasure thro' the Accusation of the Lord Rivers the Queen's Brother, and was in great Danger of his Life, put him in Mind of his former Danger, and thereupon he fell into a Discourse with him about it and said, Ah Hastings! Dost thou remember, when I once met thee in this Place before with an heavy Heart? Yea, my Lord (said he) very well, and Thanks be to God, your Enemies got no good and you no harm by it. You would say so indeed (said the Lord Hastings) if you knew as much as I do now, or as you will shortly. I was never so afraid of my Life, as I was then; but now Matters are well mended with me: Mine Enemies are now in as great Danger as I was then, (This he said, because he knew that the Protector by his and others Advice had given

With these Words he parted and went into the Tower, whence he never came out again. Oh the uncertain Confidence and short-sighted Knowledge of Man! When this Lord was most afraid, he was most secure; and when he was secure, Danger was over his Head. By him we may see the Truth of David's Advice, Oh put not your trust in Princes! and learn to leave all to God's Providence who delivers us in Dangers, and never leaves us but when we grow Self-confident; of which this great Man was a sad Example, and ought to be a Warning to us in the like Case.

Hastings's Death murmured at and justified.

The Protector having thus far proceeded to open himself a plain Way to the Crown by removing all that appear'd in Opposition to it, Hastings being Dead, and the Lords of his Party in Prison, was yet at a Plunge, how to justify to the Nation the Severity of these Proceedings against him. For the Lord Hastings tho' in himself no good Man, as his Publick keeping of Shore's Wife for his Concubine declared, yet was had in great Esteem by the King's Friends, as a Person of approved Loyalty and good Affection to King Edward's Line, and by the People as a Lover of the Common Good, and he was sensible that the News of his Death, which would fly into all Parts from the City apace, would cause great Discontents in all Parts of the Nation: Whereupon he thought it his wisest Course to send for the Lord Mayor and Chief Citizens to him into the Tower, and give them a full Account of the Justice of the Lord Hastings's Sufferings; that so the Murmurs of the City being appeased, the Nation might have no cause to repine.

This Contrivance he put in Execution immediately after Dinner the same Day, and having put on Old rusty Armour, which lay neglected in the Tower, and commanded the Duke of Buckingham to do the same, as if their sudden Danger had caused them to take any thing that lay next for their Defence, he and the Duke stood ready to receive them.

When they were come, the Protector told them, "That the Lord Hastings, and several other Persons, had conspired and contrived together suddenly to Kill him and the Duke of Buckingham that Day in Council, for what Cause, or for what Design he could not guess, and had not yet time to search it out, because he had no certain Knowledge of the intended Treason before Ten a Clock of the same Day, so that he had enough to do to stand upon his own Guard, and provide for his own Defence; which tho' they had both done in an Undecent manner, by putting on such filthy Armour, yet Necessity obliging them to it, they were forc'd to take what was next Hand: That God had wonderfully protected them from the Danger he hoped, now the Lord Hastings was dead, against whom, tho' there might seem to be something of Cruelty us'd in so sudden an Execution without any Legal Tryal and Hearing, yet there appearing to the King and the Lords of his Council many Reasons to believe, that if he had been kept in Prison, his Complices would have made a formidable Insurrection in the Country to Rescue him, and his Guilt being very Evident, they judg'd it best to inflict the deserved Punishment of his Crimes upon him immediately, that the Peace of the Nation might not be in Danger. This is the real Truth of the Business, and we 1483. "have therefore call'd you hither to inform you of it that you may, as you see Cause, satisfy the People of the Justice of the Lord Hastings's Sufferings, which tho' we were no ways oblig'd to do, yet out of our Care to please them, we have condescended to it, and we require you thus to Report it. They all answer'd fair, and declar'd their Readiness to Obey, as if they really believed him, tho' in themselves they look'd upon his Harangue as a plausible Pretence for a foul Fact, and so taking their Leaves of him departed. But upon more Mature Deliberation this was not thought sufficient to appease the People's Minds; and therefore soon after the Mayor and Citizens were gone, an Herald of Arms was sent into the City to Publish a Proclamation in all Parts of it, to this Effect:

"That the Lord Hastings with divers other wicked Conspirators, had Traiterously contrived the same Day to have Slain the Protector and Duke of Buckingham Sitting in Council, with a Purpose and Design to take upon him the Government of the King and Kingdom, and rule all Things at his Pleasure, hoping that when they were Dead, they should meet no Opposition in their Designs. And in how miserable a Condition this Nation had been, if God had left them in his Hands, appear'd from the former Actions of the said Lord, who being so ill a Man, could not make a good Governour. For he it was, that by his ill Advice enticed the King's Father to many Things much redounding to his Dishonour and to the Universal Damage and Detriment of the Realm, leading him into Debauchery by his Exemplary Wickedness, and procuring Lewd and Ungracious Persons to gratifie his Lusts, and particularly Shore's Wife, who was one of his Secret Council in this Treason, by which lewd Living, the said King not only shortned his Days, but also was forced to Oppress and Tax his People, that he might have sufficient to gratify his Expences. And since the Death of the said K. he hath lived in a continual Incontinency with the said Shore's Wife, and lay Nightly with her, and particularly the very Night before his Death; so that it was no marvel if his Ungracious Life brought him to as Unhappy a Death, which he was put to by the Special Command of the King's Highness, and of his Honourable and Faithful Council, both for his own Demerits, being so openly taken in his intended Treason, and also least any Delay of his Execution might have encourag'd other Mischievous Persons, who were engaged in the Conspiracy with him, to make an Insurrection for his Deliverance, which being wisely foreseen, and as effectually prevented, was the only means under God's Providence to preserve the whole Realm in Peace and Quietness.

This Proclamation, which was very well Indited (as was thought by Catesby, who was a Chief Actor in this Tragedy) and as fairly written on Parchment, tho' the Expedition of the Publishing of it was look'd upon as Politick and Wise to prevent the Discontents of the People, yet it did very little Good: for when Men came to compare Things, and consider'd, That the Proclamation was very Elegantly compos'd, very fairly written, and being very long was yet Publish'd within two Hours after the Death of the Lord Hastings, they began to suspect that that Lord had foul Dealings, and that his Ruin being determin'd, it was compos'd and written before his Death; for the Time after was A Proclamation Publish'd to justify Hastings's Death.

The Proclamation not regarded.

1483. was not sufficient, either to Compose or Write it in. And hence it was, that some spared not to Reflect upon it. The School-master of Paul's, sharply said,

Here's a very goodly Cast, Fouly cast away for Haste.

And a Merchant that stood by him, Answer'd him, It was Written by Prophecy. Thus did the Protector endeavour to Palliate his Wickedness, in Destroying the Lord Hastings, but all was in vain; this Action was too foul to receive any tolerable Plea, which would pass with Men of any Thought at all.

The Protector proceeds against Shore's Wife.

The Protector having done as much as cou'd be done, to excuse his Cruelty to the Lord Hastings, took himself oblig'd to proceed against Shore's Wife, whom he had accus'd of the same Treason; least if he shou'd let her escape, he shou'd betray his Plot: for if she were not Guilty, no more was the Lord Hastings; and if he deserved Death, so did she. For this Reason, he sent Sir Thomas Howard to her House, with an Order of Council to Apprehend her Person, and Seize her Goods, as forfeited to the King by her Treason; which were both accordingly done; and her Goods, to the value of Two or Three Thousand Marks being taken from her, she was carry'd to Prison into the Tower: Within a few Days after, she was brought to her Examination before the King's Council, and the Protector laid to her Charge, "That she had endeavour'd his Ruin and Destruction several ways; and particularly, by Witchcraft had decay'd his Body, and with the Lord Hastings, had contriv'd to Assassinate him. But she made so good a Defence for her self, as that there appear'd not the least Likelihood of her being Guilty: Whereupon they, by the Protector's Order, fell upon her for her open and scandalous Whoredome, which every Body knowing she cou'd not Deny. And because they wou'd do something to her to Satisfy him, they deliver'd her over to the Bishop of London, to do Publick Penance for her Sin in St. Paul's Church, which she accordingly perform'd the next Sunday-Morning, after this Manner: Mrs. Shore being depriv'd of all her Ornaments, and Cloath'd with a white Sheet, was brought by way of Procession, with the Cross carried before her, and a Wax Taper in her Hand, to the Church of St. Paul's from the Bishop's Palace adjoining, through great Crowds of People gather'd together to behold her; and there Standing before the Preacher, acknowledg'd in a set Form, her open Wickedness, and declared her Repentance for it: In all this Action, she behav'd her self with so much Modesty and Decency, that such as respected her Beauty more than her Fault, never were in greater Admiration of her, than now: for she being a Beautiful and Handsome Woman, wanting nothing in her Face but a little Blush, this shameful Act supply'd that so well, that she appear'd more lovely for it; and as to such, as were glad to see Sin Corrected, yet they pittied her, because they knew, that the Protector did it more out of Hatred to her Person, than Sin; more out of Malice, than a love to Virtue.

Mrs. Shore's Character.

This Woman was Born in London, virtuously Educated, and Well Married to a Substantial and Honest Citizen; but being drawn to the Match, rather by Interest than Affection, by her Parents Judgment, than her own Inclination, she never had that Fondness for him, that joyns a Wife inviolably to her Husband's Bed. This Looseness to her Husband, with that natural Ambition, and Affectation of Gay Cloathing and Greatness, which is usually in Women much above their Fortunes, though almost never so Great, dispos'd her to accept of the King's Kindness, when offer'd; who, besides that he was a very Handsome and Lovely Person, cou'd easily gratify her Desires, and by fulfilling his Lusts, she knew she had Mastery of his Gifts and Treasure; and for these Reasons, she became his Concubine. Her Husband (tho' made Unhappy by her Lewdness) yet carried his Resentments evenly; and after the King had Abus'd her, never wou'd have any thing to do with her, whether out of Reverence to the King's Person, or out of a Principle of Conscience, it is not easy to determine, tho' both might concur. She lived many Years in King Edward's Court, and tho' that King had many Concubines, and some of them of much greater Quality than her self, yet he loved her best for her merry and ingenious Behaviour. In this Great, tho' Bad Station, she Demean'd her self with admirable Prudence, and was not Exalted by the King's Favour, but always us'd it with as much Benefit to others as to her self; for she never abus'd the King's Kindness to any Man's Hurt, but always us'd it to their Comfort and Advantage: Where the King took Displeasure against any Man, she would mitigate his Anger and Appease his Mind; and such as were out of Favour, she would Reconcile. For many heinous Offenders she obtain'd Pardon, and got a Relaxation, and sometimes a total Remission of large Fines: and tho' she was the only effectual Suitor almost at Court for such as wanted Places and Preferments, yet she made little Advantage to her self by it; expecting none, or very small Reward, and that rather Gay than Rich; either because she was content with doing of a Kindness, or delighted to be Sought to; for Wanton Women and Wealthy, be not always Covetous. In fine, her Lewdness was her only Fault; and tho' that was great enough, yet to have a King for their Bedfellow is such a mighty Temptation, that if no Woman would Condemn her before they have the like Trials, it's to be fear'd, she'd have few to cast a Stone at her. She was Affable and Obliging, Generous and Charitable; and tho', indeed, she was after reduc'd to a miserable Poverty in her Old Age, a just Punishment for her Sin, yet it was a Reproach to many Thousands, that she was so, whom she kept from Beggary; and if they had been Grateful to Requite her for those Kindnesses in her Want, which she scorn'd to Sell in her Prosperity, she might have Liv'd to her Death, in a Condition great enough for her Birth and Degree.

While the Protector was thus busied at London, in making his way to the Crown, and excusing himself for the Death of the Lord Hastings, his bloody Order given for the Execution of the Queen's Kindred, the Lord Rivers and Richard Lord Grey, with Richard Hauke and Sir Thomas Vaughan at Pomfract, was punctually executed by Sir Richard Rascliffe, a great Favourite of the Protector's, who was a Man of a desperate Courage, and forward to promote all his Designs. It is thought, they suffer'd Death at the same time the Lord Hastings was Beheaded in the Tower; who being a principal Adviser in their Deaths, may be a Warning to us all, how we concur in the undeserved Sufferings of innocent Persons: For God often, and that justly, brings the Evil

we

1483. we do to others upon our own Heads. The Lord Hastings, by advising the Protector to Destroy the Queen's Kindred caulesly, shew'd him the way to do the like to himself. The manner of their Execution was as barbarous as unjust. Great and Heavy Accusations were laid against them, but none prov'd. They had not so much as the formality of a Tryal, but were brought to the Scaffold on the Day appointed; and being branded, in general, with the Name of Traitors, were Beheaded. The Lord Rivers would fain have declar'd his Innocency to the People, but Ratcliffe would not suffer him, least his Words should lay open the Protector's Cruelty too much, and make both him and his Party odious to the People; and so he Died in silence. Sir Thomas Vaughan would not endure his Mouth to be stopp'd, but as he was going to the Block he said aloud, A Mischief take them that Expounded the Prophecy, "which foretold that G should Destroy King Edward's Children, for George Duke of Clarence, who for that Suspicion is now Dead; for there still remain'd Richard G. i. e. Duke of Gloucester, who now I see is he that shall, and will, accomplish the Prophecy, and Destroy King Edward's Children, and all his Allies and Friends, as appeareth by us this Day; against whom, I Appeal to the High Tribunal of God, for this wrongful Murther, and our real Innocency. Sir Richard Ratcliffe heard this with Regret, and putting it off, said to him in scorn, You have made a goodly Appeal, lay down your Head. Yea, faith Sir Thomas, but I Die in the Right, take heed that you Die not in the Wrong: and having this said, he was Beheaded. He, with the other three, were Buried Naked in the Monastery of St. John the Evangelist at Pomfract.

Sir Richard Ratcliffe would not let them speak to the People.

The Charge of Bastardy laid to the Princes.

Richard accuses his Mother of Adultery.

Then the Conspirators held Council among themselves, how they might bring about their Wicked Purposes. Their chief Difficulty, was to Engage the City; and having Gain'd the Lord Mayor, Sir Edmund Shaw his Brother, Dr. John Shaw a Priest, and Frier Pinker Provincial of the Augustine Friars, to their Interest, they determin'd, That Doctor Shaw should first break the Matter in a Sermon he was to Preach at Paul's Cross, and the main Argument he was to use for the Deposing of King Edward and the Advancement of his Uncle Richard, was resolv'd among them to be the Bastardy of the Two Princes, Sons to Edward the Fourth; which disabled them to Inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm. Tho' this Charge would bring the Scandal of Adultery on the Queen, yet Richard and the Conspirators did not consider much, that the whole Royal Family would be Defam'd by it, in the highest degree: On the contrary, (rather than fail of the Sovereignty to which he aspir'd) the Duke of Gloucester, and his Emisfaries, intended to give out, That King Edward the Fourth was Himself a Bastard, tho' His Mother was the Parent of the Protector, and in calling Her an Adultress, he profaned the Honour of the very Person that brought him into the World. This Accusation he would have at first only hinted, and spoken mysteriously, that if the People, in abhorrence of such an unnatural Slander, should have been set against the Publisher of it, there might be room to put some other Construction on the Words. Shaw was order'd to declare to his Auditory, That King Edward had promis'd Marriage to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, by whom he had a Child; and that the Dutcheß of York had told him, He was her Husband before God, to prevent His Marrying the Lady Elizabeth Grey, whose Children, by King Edward, were consequently Bastards. He was not to mention any thing of that King's Illegitimacy, unless he found his Reflection on the Queen's Children would not take. The Doctor was a famous Preacher, and a vast Number of Persons, of all Qualities, us'd to flock to hear him: So they thought they had gone a great way in accomplishing their Designs, when they had got him to their Side. Shaw was not only ready to speak what the Conspirators would have him, but turn'd his whole Discourse against the Legitimacy of the Young King and his Brother: He began his Sermon with this Expression, Spuria Vitilamina non agent Radices altas, Bastard Slips, shall never take deep Root. He shew'd the Blessings that God bestow'd on the Fruits of the Marriage-Bed, and the Unhappiness of those Children who were Born out of Wedlock. Several Examples of both kinds he us'd to prove the Truth of his Assertion. He took occasion from what he had said, to shew the Reason they had to fear, that the Reign of the present King would be Unfortunate; and enlarg'd very much on the Great things that they might hope for, from the Government of a Prince of the Duke of York's illustrious Qualities, the Father of King Edward the Fourth, or rather, of the Lord Protector, who was the only Lawful begotten Son of the late Duke of York, who was Kill'd at the Battel of Wakefield. He then declared, That King Edward was never Legally Married to the Queen, being Husband, before God, to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy: besides, neither He, nor the Duke of Clarence were thought Legitimate by those of the Duke of York's Family, who were most acquainted with the Dutcheß of York's Intrigues with several Persons of Her Husband's Court, whom they Resembled in the Face: But my Lord Protector, that very Noble Prince, the Pattern of all Heroick Deeds, represented the very Face and Mind of the Great Duke his Father: He (says the False Preacher) is the perfect Image of his Father; his Features are the same, and the very express Likeness of that Noble Duke. At these Words, 'twas design'd the Protector should have enter'd, as if it had been by chance; and the Conspirators hoped, that the Multitude taking the Doctor's Words, as coming from the immediate Inspiration of the Holy Ghost, would have been induc'd to have Cry'd out, God Save King Richard. Which Artifice was prevented, either by the Doctor's making too much haste to come to that Part of his Sermon, or the Lord Protector's Negligence to come in at the Instant when he was saying it; for it was over before he came, and the Priest was enter'd on some other Matter when the Duke appear'd, which, however he left, and Repeated again, abruptly, The Lord Protector, that very Noble Prince, the Pattern of all Heroick Deeds, Represents the very Face and Mind of the Great Duke his Father; his Features are the same, and the plain express Likeness of that Noble Duke. The Protector, Accompanied by the Duke of Buckingham, pass thro' the Multitude, as the Priest said this: but the People were so far from Saluting him King, that they were struck with Indignation at the Preacher's Base Flattery and Treason; who, when he had clos'd his Sermon, went Home, Hid himself for Shame, and never after durst shew his Face in the World. Being inform'd how Odious he was become for what he had done, he fell, out of Grief and Remorse, into a Consumption, of which he Died in a short time. He Preached this Notable

The Duke of Buckingham's Oration to the Citizens.

Gentlemen, Out of the Zeal and Sincere Affection we have for your Persons and Interests, we are come to acquaint you with a Matter of High Importance, equally pleasing to God, and profitable to the Commonwealth, and to none more, than to you the Citizens of this Famous and Honourable City. For the very Thing, which we believe you have a long while wanted and wish'd for, what you wou'd have Purchas'd at any Rate, and gone far to fetch, we are come hither to bring, without any Labour, Trouble, Cost, or Peril to you: And what can this be, but your own Safety, the Peace of your Wives and Daughters, the Security of your Goods and Estates, which were all in Danger till now? Who, of you, cou'd call what he had his own, there were so many Snares laid to Deceive you? So many Fines and Forfeitures, Taxes and Impositions, of which there was no End, and often no Necessity; or if there was, it was occasion'd by Riots and Unreasonable Waste, rather than a Just and Lawful Charge, for the Defence or Honour of the State. Your best Citizens were Plunder'd, and their Wealth squander'd by Profuse Favourites: Fifteenths, and the usual Subsidies wou'd not do, but under the plausible Name of Benevolence, your Goods were taken from you by the Commissioners much against your Will, as if by that Name, was understood, That every Man shou'd pay, not what he pleas'd, but what the King wou'd have him; who never was moderate in His Demands, always Exorbitant, turning Forfeitures into Fines, Fines into Ransoms; Small Offences into Misprison of Treason, and Misprison into Treason itself. We need not give you Examples of it, Burdet's Case will never be forgot; who for a Word spoken in haste, was cruelly Beheaded. Did not Judge Markham Resign his Office, rather than Joyn with his Brethren, in Passing that Illegal Sentence on that Honest Man? Were you not all Witnesses of the Barbarous Treatment one of your own Body, the Worshipful Alderman Cook, met with? And your own selves know, too well, how many Instances of this kind I might name among you. King Edward gaining the Crown by Conquest, all that were any ways Related to those that were his Enemies, lay under the Charge of Treason: Thus half of the Kingdom became at once Traytors; for half of the Kingdom were either Friends to King Henry, or Relations or Friends to some that were so. Tho' Open War with Invaders, is Terrible and Destructive to a Nation, yet Civil Dissentions are much more fatal, and to be dreaded; with which His Reign was more disturb'd, than the Reigns of all his Predecessors: but he is Dead and Gone, and God Forgive his Soul. It cost the People more Blood and Treasure to get the Crown for This, than it had done to Conquer France Twice: Half of the Nobility of the Realm lost their Lives or Estates in his Quarrel; and when the Dispute was over, the Peace that follow'd was not much safer than the War: Every Rich and Landed Man was in danger; for whom cou'd he Trust that Distrusted his own Brother? whom Spare, that Kill'd his own Brother? or who cou'd perfectly Love him, whom his own Brother cou'd not Love? We shall, in Honour to the Memory of One that was our Sovereign, forbear to Mention, who were the Persons on which he was so lavish of his Favours; only 'tis well known, that those that deserved them most, had least of them. Was not Shore's Wife his Chief Minister? Was not there more Court made to her than to all the Lords in England; except those that were the Strumpet's Favourites? Who, poor Woman, was her self Chaste and of Good Reputation, till he deluded her to his Lust, and tempted her from her Husband, an Honest Substantial Young Man, whom you all know. Indeed, I am ashamed to say it, the King's Appetite in that Point was insatiable and intollerable: no Woman cou'd escape him, Young or Old, Rich or Poor, Wife or Virgin, all fell Victims to his Lust; by which Means, the most Honourable Houses were Defil'd, and the most Honest Families were Corrupted. You of this Renown'd City suffer'd most: You who deserv'd most from him for your readiness to Serve the House of York with your Lives and Fortunes, which tho' he Ill Requited, there is of that House, who, by God's Grace, shall Reward you better. I shall not enlarge on this Subject, you have heard it from One, whom you will hearken to more, as you ought to do; for I am not so vain as to think, what I can say, will have so great Authority with you, as the Words of a Preacher; a Man so Wife and so Pious, that he wou'd not utter a Thing, in the Pulpit especially, which he did not firmly believe 'twas his Duty to Declare. You remember, I doubt not, how he set forth the last Sunday, the Right of the most Excellent Prince Richard, Duke of Gloucester, unto the Crown of this Realm: For, as he prov'd to you, the Children of King Edward the Fourth were never Lawfully Begotten, the King leaving his Lawful Wife, the Lady Lucy to contract an Illegal Marriage with the Queen: My Noble Lord the Protector's Reverence to the Dutche's his Mother, will not permit me to say any thing further concerning what the worthy Doctor alledg'd of her Familiarity with Others besides her own Husband, for fear of Offending the Duke of Gloucester her Son: Tho' for these Causes, the Crown of England is devolv'd to the most Excellent Prince, the Lord Protector, as the only Lawfully Begotten Son of the Right Noble Duke of York. This, and the Consideration of his many High Qualities, has prevail'd with the Lords and Commons of England, of the Northern Counties especially, who have declared they will not have a Bastard Reign over them, to Petition that High and Mighty Prince, to take on him the Sovereign Power for the Good of the Realm, to which he has so Rightful and Lawful a Title: We have reason to fear he will not grant our Request, being a Prince whose Wisdom foresees the Labour both of Mind and Body that attends the Supreme Dignity: Which Office is not a Place for a Child; as that Wise Man observ'd, who said Va Regno cuius Rex Puer est, "Wo 1483. "Wo is that Realm that has a Child to their King! Wherefore we have reason to bless God that the Prince whose Right it is to reign over us is of so ripe Age, so great Wisdom and Experience, who tho' he is unwilling to take the Government upon himself, yet the Petition of the Lords and Gentlemen will meet with the more favourable Acceptance, if you the Worshipful Citizens of the Metropolis of the Kingdom will joyn with us in our Request; which for your own Welfare we doubt not but you will. However, I heartily entreat you to do it for the Common Good of the People of England, whom you will oblige by Choosing them so good a King, and His Majesty by shewing early your ready Disposition to his Election. In which my most dear Friends, I require you in the Name of my Self and these Lords, to shew us plainly your Minds and Intentions. The Duke stop'd here, expecting the Assembly would have cry'd out, God Save King Richard: but all were hush'd and Silent, as if the Auditory was confounded with the Extravagance of the Proposal; at which the Duke was extremely surpriz'd, and taking aside the Mayor, with some others of the Conspirators, said to them softly, How comes it the People are so still? Sir, says the Mayor, It may be they don't understand you well. The Duke to help the Matter repeated his Speech with a little Variation, and with such Grace and Eloquence, that Never so ill a Subject was handled with so much Oratory. However the Assembly continu'd Silent. Then the Mayor told the Duke, "The Citizens had not been accusom'd to hear any one but the Recorder, and perhaps they would take the Thing better from him who is the Mouth of the City. Upon which the Recorder Fitz-Williams, much against his Will spoke to the same Purpose at the Mayor's Command; and yet he manag'd his Speech so well as to be understood to speak the Duke's Sense, and not his own. The People being still as before, the Duke mutter'd to the Lord Mayor, saying, "They are wonderfully Obstinate in their Silence: And turning to the Assembly, he said, "Dear Friends, We came to acquaint you with a Thing which we needed not have done, had it not been for the Affection we bear you. The Lords and Commons could have determin'd the Matter without you, but would gladly have you joyn with us, which is for your Honour and Profit, tho' you do not see it or consider it: We require you therefore to give your Answer one way or another, Whether you are willing, as the Lords are, to have the most Excellent Prince the Lord Protector to be your King or not? The Assembly then began to murmur, and at last some of the Protector's and the Duke's Servants, some of the City Apprentices, and the Rabble that had crouded into the Hall, cry'd out, King Richard, King Richard! and threw up their Hats in token of Joy. The Duke perceiv'd easily enough who they were that made the Noise; yet, as if the Acclamation had been General, he took hold of it; saying, "Tis a Goodly and a Joyful Cry to hear every Man with one Voice agree to it, and no body say No; Since therefore, Dear Friends, we see you are all as one Man inclin'd to have this Noble Prince to be your King, we shall Report the Matter so effectually to him, that we doubt not 'twill be much for your Advantage. We require you to Attend us to Morrow with our joyn't Petition to his Grace; as has been already Agreed on between us. Then the Duke and the Lords came down from the Hustings and the Assembly broke up, the most part of them with Weeping Eyes and Aching Hearts; tho' they were forc'd to hide their Tears and their Sorrows as much as possible for fear of giving Offence, which had been Dangerous.

The next Day the Lord Mayor, the Aldermen, and the Chief of the Common-Council resorted to Baynard's-Castle, where the Protector then lay; and the Duke of Buckingham, Attended by several Lords and Gentlemen, came thither also. The Duke sent Word to the Protector that a great Company attended to move a Business of the Highest Importance to him, and desir'd Audience of his Grace. The Duke of Gloucester made some Difficulty of coming forth, as if he was jealous whether their Errand was good or not.

The Duke of Buckingham took this Occasion to shew the Lord Mayor and Citizens how little the Protector was Conscious of their Design; and then he sent another Messenger with so Humble and so Earnest a Request to be Heard, that his Grace came forth; yet with so much affected Diffidence, that he seem'd unwilling to draw near them till he knew their Business. Then the Duke of Buckingham very submissively beg'd Pardon for Himself and his Company, and Liberty to propose to him what they had to offer, without which they durst not proceed; tho' 'twas for his Grace's Honour and the Good of the Realm. The Protector gave them Leave to propose what they would, saying, "He believ'd None of 'em meant him any Harm. The Duke then set forth Elegantly and Pathetically "the Grievances of the People, and pray'd him to Redress them by Assuming the Sovereign Authority, which of Right belong'd to him, and which the whole Kingdom with unusual Unanimity desired he would take to himself for the benefit of the Commonwealth, as much as for his Grace's Honour. The Protector seem'd mightily surpriz'd; and Answer'd, "That tho' he knew the Things he allow'd to be true, yet he lov'd King Edward and his Children above any Crown whatsoever, and therefore cou'd not Grant their Request. However he pardon'd their Petition, and thank'd them for their Love, but desir'd them to be Obedient to the Prince under whom Himself and they liv'd at that Time, and whom he would Advise to the best of his Capacity, as he had already done to the Satisfaction of all Parties. The Duke of Buckingham murmur'd at this Reply, and after having ask'd and obtain'd Pardon a second time for what he was about to say, He declar'd aloud to the Protector, "That they were all Agreed not to have any of King Edward's Line to Reign over them: That they were gone too far to go back; for which Reason if his Grace would be pleas'd to take the Crown upon Him, they humbly beseech him to do it; Or if he would give them a resolute Answer to the Contrary, which they should be loath to Hear; They must and would Look out for some Worthy Person that would Accept of their Proposal. At these Words, the Protector began to comply a little, and at last he Spoke thus to them; "Since we perceive that the whole Realm is bent upon it not to have King Edward's Children to Govern them of which we are sorry, and knowing that the Crown can belong to no Man so justly as to our Self, the Right Heir, lawfully begotten of the Body of our most Dear Father Richard late Duke of York; to which Title is now joyn'd your Election

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD III.

His Difficultation.

THE next Day he went to Westminster,
 Sat himself Down in the Court of King's-Bench, made a very Gracious Speech to the Assembly there present, and promis'd them Halcyon days from the Beginning of his Reign.

To shew his Forgiving Temper, he order'd one Hog whom he hated, and who was fled to Sanctuary for fear of him, to be brought before him, took him by the Hand and spoke favourably to him, which the Multitude thought was a Token of his Clemency, and the Wisemen of his Vanity. In his return Home, he saluted every one he met.

He is Crown'd.

From this Mock Election in June he com-menc'd his Reign, and was crown'd in July with the same Provision that was made for the Coronation of his Nephew. But to be sure of his Enemies he sent for 5000 Men out of the North, who came up to Town ill Cloath'd and worse Harnefs'd, their Horses poor and their Arms rusty; who being muster'd in Finsbury-Fields were the Contempt of the Spectators. The Appearance of these Rude Fellows in Arms, gave Cause to the People to suspect, that as he was conscious of his Guilt, he was apprehensive of its Punishment.

On the 4th of July he came to the Tower by Water, with his Wife Ann Daughter to Richard Earl of Warwick; and the next Day he created
Thomas Lord Howard Duke of Norfolk, Sir Tho- mas Howard his Son Earl of Surrey, William Lord
Berkley Earl of Nottingham, Francis Lord Lovell
Viscount Lovell, and Lord Chamberlain of the Household, and the Lord Stanley was set at Liberty and made Lord Steward of the Household:
 The King being afraid of the Lord Strange who was raising Men in Lincolnshire, as was reported.
 The Archbishop of York was releas'd from his Imprisonment, and Bishop Morton deliver'd to the Charge of the Duke of Buckingham, who engag'd to keep him in Safe Custody at his Man-nour of Brecknock. King Richard also created His Son Seventeen Knights of the Bath, and his Son Ed- created ward Prince of Wales. The same Day he and Prince of his Queen rode through the City of London to Westminster, and the next Day they were both crown'd in the Abbey-Church with extraordinary Pomp. What is most Observable in the Proce-sion is, That the Countess of Richmond, Mother to King Henry the Seventh, bore up the Queen's Train. After the Ceremony was over, the King dismiss'd all the Lords who attended his Coronation except the Lord Stanley, whom he retain'd till he heard that the Lord Strange, his Son, was Quiet in the Country. He gave the Lords a strict Charge to see their several Counties were well Govern'd and none of his Subjects Wrong'd.

 He liberally rewarded his Northern Men, who valu'd themselves so much on the King's Favour, that presuming to commit many acts of Injustice and Oppression upon it, he was forc'd to take a Journey into the North to reclaim them. What is ill got is never well kept; which King Richard soon shew'd by the Murder of his two Innocent Nephews, the Young King and his Tender Brother; whose Death has however been much doubted of since, whether 'twas in his Time or not; Perkin Warbeck, thro' the Malice of some and the Folly of others, having a long time abus'd the World, and impos'd himself upon Princes as well as People, for the Younger of King Edward the Fourth's Sons. King Richard contriv'd the Destruction of the two Young Princes in a Progress he made to Gloucester, to Honour the Town, which gave him the Title of Duke, with a Visit: He imagin'd that while his Nephews liv'd, his Right to the Crown would be call'd in question: wherefore he resolv'd to rid himself of them, and to that end sent John Green, a Creature of his, to Sir Robert Brackenbury, Constable of the Tower with a Letter, desiring him one How or other to make away with the two Children whom he had in Keeping.

1483. Keeping. Brackenbury refus'd to do it, and Green return'd to King Richard, who then lay at Warwick, with the Constable's Answer; at which the King was so displeas'd, that he said to a Page of his the same Night, Alas! Who is there that a Man can trust? Those that I have brought up my self, those that I thought wou'd be most ready to serve me, even those fail me, and will not do what I command them. The Page reply'd, Sir, There lyes a Man on the Pallat in the Outer Chamber, who I am sure will think Nothing too hard that you shall Require him to do. Meaning Sir James Tyrrell, a brave handfom Man, who deserv'd a better Master, and wou'd have merited the Esteem of all Men had his Virtue been as Great as his Valour. He was Ambitious, and with regret saw Sir Richard Ratcliff soar above him in his Master's Favour. The King knowing how aspiring he was, imagin'd the Page had hit upon the Person who was for his Purpose, believing Tyrrell wou'd do any thing in hopes of further Preferment; So he went out into the Chamber where he found Sir James and Sir Thomas Tyrrell his Brother on a Pallat Bed, to whom he said merrily, What are you a-bed so soon, Gentlemen? And calling Sir James to him, told him his Mind and what he wanted of him; whom he found ready to do whatever he commanded him. The next Day therefore he sent him with a Letter to Sir Robert Brackenbury, requiring him to deliver Sir James the Keys of the Tower, to the end that he might accomplish the King's Pleasure in certain things he had given him Commandment about. Sir Robert having restor'd the Keys to this Assassin, he resolv'd to murder the two Princes in the ensuing Night. When the Elder, who was call'd King Edward the Fifth, was told that his Uncle was crown'd King; He sigh'd and said, Al! wou'd my Uncle let me have my Life, he might take my Kingdom. The Person that told him so, comforted him as well as he could, and for a little while the King and his Brother were well us'd; but afterwards they were shut up Close, and one Servant only allow'd to Attend them. Then the Young King apprehending what would be his Fate, gave himself over to Sorrow and Despair; and the Prince his Brother was the Companion of his Grief as well as of his Misfortune. Sir James Tyrrell contriv'd to have them murder'd in their Beds, and appointed one Miles Forrest, a noted Ruffian, and John Dighton his Groom a lusty Fellow, to see Execution done. Those that waited near the Prince's Lodgings were Removed, and Way made for Forrest and Dighton to enter their Chamber, unperceiv'd of any one, at Midnight. The poor Youths were Asleep in their Beds, whom the two Assassins wrap'd up in the Blankets and Coverlaid of the Bed, clapt the Feather-bed and Pillows upon them, stopt their Mouths and smother'd them to Death. When the Ruffians perceiv'd by their Struggling that they were Dying, and afterwards by their Lying still that they were Dead, they laid their Bodies out Naked upon the Bed, and fetch'd Sir James Tyrrell to see them, who ordered the Murderers to Bury them at the Stair-foot deep in the Ground under a Heap of Stones. Then Tyrrell Rode to the King, and gave him a full Account of the Murder, with which he was so well pleased, that 'tis said, he Knighted him at that time; tho' he seem'd not to approve of their being Buried in so vile a Corner, they being the Sons of a King: Upon which, Sir Robert Brackenbury's Chaplain took their Bodies up, and Buried them privately in a Place, that, by occasion of his Death, never came to light. Sir James Tyrrell, when he was afterwards in the Reign of King Henry the Seventh, committed to the Tower for Treason, confess'd the Murder in the manner we have related it: So did Dighton, and both the Master and the Man, and Forrest the Warder came to miserable Ends, The Murderers thro' the Just Judgment of God, the Avenger of Innocent Blood. Dighton and Forrest, tho' they were not Executed by the Hangman, died in a most Horrible manner, rotting away by degrees. Sir James Tyrrell was Beheaded, and King Richard himself, Slain by his Enemies, and his Body ignominiously used by the Rabble. He could never after be at rest; his Guilt haunted him like a Spectre; He was afraid of his own Shadow when he went abroad, his Eyes rowl'd in his Head; his Limbs trembled, and his Hand was always on his Dagger; His Sleep was ever disturb'd by frightful Dreams; he would suddenly Start up, Leap out of his Bed and Run about the Chamber. Nor did he long Enjoy the Fruits of his Bloody Policy; for tho' the Princes were Removed, New Enemies arose from time to time, that kept him in continual Fear thro' the Course of his Short Reign. The First that Conspired against him, was the very Person who had been most instrumental in his Advancement, the D. of Buckingham, whose intimacy with him, commenced from the Death of K. Edward the Fourth.

We must look a little backward into the beginning of their Confederacy, the better to clear the History of this Duke's Misfortunes. On the Death of King Edward he sent a trusty Servant of his to the Duke of Gloucester, to offer him his Service, and that he wou'd Attend him with a Thousand Men, whenever he pleas'd to command him. The Duke of Gloucester return'd him Thanks, and inform'd the Duke of Buckingham with his Secret Designs. At Northampton, Buckingham met the Duke of Gloucester, at the Head of Three Hundred Horse, and joyn'd with him in all his Undertakings; He accompanied him to London, and stay'd with him till after the Coronation: He went with him to Gloucester, and there he took his Leave of him to return Home; where he was no sooner arrived, than he began to Repent of what he had done; and to think, he had not been sufficiently Rewarded for it by the Usurper. The Reason of his First Discontent, is said to be this: Some time before the Usurper was Crown'd, 'twas agreed between him and the Duke of Buckingham, that the latter should have all the Lands belonging to the Duke of Hereford, to which he pretended to have a Title, by his Descent from the House of Lancaster; his Mother being the Daughter of Edmund Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, Brother to John Duke of Somerset, Father to Margaret Countess of Richmond, Mother to King Henry VII. But this Title having some Relation to that of the Crown, the Usurper would not hear of Restoring him to the Duke of Hereford's Estate, and rejected his Petition with Indignation and Threats, when he was in possession of the Sovereignty; which the Duke of Buckingham so highly resented, that from that time forward he contriv'd how he might Pull him Down from the Throne upon which he had Set him. We are told, he feign'd himself Sick, and excus'd his Attendance at the Coronation, and that King Richard should send him word, If he would not come and Ride, he would make him be Carried.

This Circumstance of the Duke of Buckingham's Discontent is not given Credit to, by those who consider the Natures of the Usurper and of the Duke, being both of them the greatest King Richard's Terrors of Conscience.

The Duke of Buckingham falls out with him.

1483. greatest Dissemblers in the World: The one would not so rashly have provok'd a powerful Enemy, nor the other have given a Jealous Tyrant occasion to suspect his Fidelity: The Truth is, the Duke of Buckingham was a high Spirited Man, and envied the Glory of another so much, that when he saw the Crown set upon King Richard's Head, he could not endure the Sight, but turn'd his Head away. Others Write, that they continu'd good Friends till after his return Home, and that the Usurper dismiss'd him at Gloucester with Rich Gifts and Extraordinary Marks of his Favour and Affection: When he came to Brecknock, he convers'd much with Dr. Moreton, Bishop of Ely, whom he had there in Keeping. This Prelate was a very Wise Politick Person, a Man of Learning and of a Winning Behaviour. He had been always Faithful to King Henry; and when he fell in with the Party of King Edward, on King Henry's Death, he serv'd him as faithfully, and was one of the Lords whom the Usurper seiz'd at the Council in the Tower. The Bishop perceiving the Duke of Buckingham was pleas'd with his Company and Discourse, thought he might improve the Favour he had obtain'd of him to the Advantage of the Common-wealth, by getting him to Joyn in a Conspiracy against King Richard, towards whom, he found, he was not very well inclin'd; yet he manag'd the Matter so warily, that he rather seem'd to Follow than to Lead him, and brought him by degrees to open his whole Mind to him, and to Engage in Prosecuting a Design which he had form'd, to bring about a Match between Henry Earl of Richmond, and the Lady Elizabeth, Eldest Daughter to King Edward, by which Marriage, the Two Houses of York and Lancaster would be United, and an End put to the Long and Bloody Disputes between the Two Factions. He durst not come to the Point presently, but advanced to it step by step, as he saw the Duke of Buckingham prepared to hearken to it.

His Discourse
with the
Bp. of Ely.

When that Lord came to Brecknock first, he Prais'd the King, and boasted what Great Things the Nation might expect from such a Prince: The Bishop reply'd; "My Lord, 'Twould be Folly in me to Lye, and if I should Swear the contrary, your Lordship would not, I suppose, believe me; had Things gone as I would have had them, King Henry's Son had been King, and not King Edward. But when, by God's Providence, he was depriv'd of the Crown, and King Edward advanced to the Throne, I was not so mad, as to bring a Dead Man in competition with a Living One: So I became King Edward's Faithful Chaplain, and should have been glad that his Son had Succeeded him: However, since God has otherwise order'd it, I shall not kick against the Pricks, nor labour to Set up whom the Almighty has pull'd Down: As for the late Protector, the King that now is —. Here he stopt short, as if he had said too much already, to heighten the Duke's Curiosity to know what he had to say more. The Duke earnestly desired him to proceed, promising him, upon his Honour, That never any Hurt should come of it; and perhaps, it might produce more Good than he was aware of; Saying, he intended to consult him, and to be govern'd by his Advice; for which cause only, he had procur'd of the King to have him in his Custody, where he might reckon himself at Home; otherwise, he had been deliver'd to those that would not 1483. have been so kind to him. The Bishop humbly thank'd him, and said, "Indeed, my Lord, I don't care to talk much of Princes, as a thing which is dangerous, tho' the Words may be innocent; for if they be not taken in Good part, they may be fatal to him that speaks them, the Prince putting what Construction he pleases upon them: I often think of the Fable in Esop, when the Lyon Proclaim'd That no Horn'd Beast should stay in the Wood, on pain of Death; One that had a Bunch of Flesh in his Forehead, fled away in haste: The Fox meeting him, ask'd him, Whither so fast? The Beast answer'd, Troth I don't know, nor don't care, provided I was out of the Wood, as the Proclamation commands all Horn'd Beasts to be gone. You Fool, says the Fox, thou mayest stay, the Lyon does not mean thee; it is not a Horn that grows in thy Head; No, quoth the Beast, I know that well enough, but what if he should call it a Horn, where am I then? The Duke Laugh'd at the Tale, and answered, "I warrant you, my Lord, neither the Lyon nor the Boar, shall resent any Thing that is said here, it shall never go any farther I assure you. The Bishop reply'd, "If it did, were the Thing that I was about to say, understood as I meant it, I should deserve Thanks; but taken as I suppose it would be, it might perhaps turn to your Prejudice and mine. This rais'd the Duke's Curiosity still higher; upon which the Bishop proceeded thus: "As for the late Protector, since he is now King, I don't intend to dispute his Title; however, for the good of the Realm he Governs (of which I am a poor Member) I was about to wish, that to the Good Qualities he possesses, it had pleas'd God to have added some of those Excellent Virtues, requisite for the Governing a Kingdom, which are so conspicuous in the Person of your Grace. The End of Sir Thomas Moor's History.

Here Ends Sir Thomas Moor.
What follows, is taken for Hall and Hollinshead's Chronicles.

The Duke wondring why the Bishop made such frequent Pauses, was the more eager to have him speak his Mind freely, and reply'd; "I cannot but take notice of your Stopping so often in the midst of your Discourse, which hinders my making any Judgment of your Opinion of the King, or your Good Will towards me. As for any Good Qualities in me, I pretend to none, and expect no Praise on account of my Merit. I plainly perceive you have some hidden Meaning which you reserve from me, either out of Fear or Shame. You may be bold and free with me who am your Friend; I assure you on my Honour, that I will be as Secret in this Case, as the Deaf and Dumb Person is to the Singer, or the Tree to the Hunter.

The Bishop grew Bolder on the Duke's Promise of Secrecy, in which he was encouraged, by the Discoveries he made of Buckingham's Hatred to the King. He resolv'd therefore to come to the Point, and to propose to the Duke, That either out of Ambition, or his Love to his Country, he should attempt to Destroy the Tyrant.

To this End, he resum'd his former Conversation in this manner: "My singular Good Lord; Since I have been your Grace's Prisoner, I have not known what it is to be de-

1483. "deprived of Liberty; and to avoid Idleness, the Mother and Nurse of Vice, I have spent my Time in Reading. I have Read in some of my Books, That no Man was Born for himself only: He owes a Duty to his Parents that Begat him; to his Relations and Friends for Proximity of Blood and Good Offices; but above all to the Country, whose Air he first breath'd; and this Duty is never to be forgotten: For which Reason, I consider the Present State of this Realm, wherein I was Born, and in these Considerations, I cannot help making Reflections on what a Governour we now have, and what a Ruler we might have. In the present Circumstances of Affairs, the Kingdom must soon decay: Confusion and Destruction will certainly be the sudden end of Disorder and Mis-rule. All my Hope is in your Grace: When I reflect on your Valour, your Justice, Impartiality, your Zeal for the Publick Welfare, your Learning, your Sense and Eloquence, I rejoyce in the Happiness of England, that possesses so Good and so Great a Prince, worthy the Highest Dignities: But when I on the other Side consider the Good Qualities of the late Protector (now call'd King) how they are violated and subverted by Tyranny, eclipsed by Blind and Insatiate Ambition, and changed from Mild and Human, to Cruel and Bloody; I cannot forbear declaring openly to you, That He is neither fit to be King of so Noble a Realm, nor so Noble a Realm fit to be Govern'd by such a Tyrant, whose Kingdom, were it larger than it is, could not long continue: God will overthrow those that are thirsty of Blood; he will bring horrible Slaughter upon them: How many Brave and Virtuous Persons were Murder'd to make way for him to the Throne? Did he not accuse his own Mother, an Honourable and Religious Princess, of Adultery? Which, if it had been true, a Dutiful Child would have past it over in silence. Did he not declare his two Brothers and his two Nephews Bastards? And what is still more barbarous, did he not cause those two Poor Innocent Princes, whose Blood cries aloud for Vengeance, to be cruelly Murdered? My Heart melts when I think of their Untimely Fate; and my Soul, with Horror, remembers this Bloody Butcher, this Inhumane Monster. What Man can be sure of his own Life, under the Dominion of a Prince, who spared not his own Blood? Especially, if at any time he is suspicious of his Fidelity to him, and that he is carrying on Ill Designs against him, as every thing will be term'd, that tends to the Good of the Publick: all will be reckon'd Guilty by him that, are Great and Rich. 'Tis enough for Persons to have large Possessions to provoke his Wrath. Now, my Lord, to conclude this Discourse with what I have to say to your Grace; I Conjure you by your Love to God, your Illustrious Line, and your Native Country, to take the Imperial Crown of this Realm upon you, to restore this Kingdom to its ancient Splendour, and deliver it from the Violence of the Oppressor. I dare affirm, if the Turk stood in Competition with this Bloody Tyrant, this Killer of Infants, the People of England would Prefer him to Richard, who now sits in the Throne. How much more then would they Rejoyce to live under the Government of so Excellent a Prince as your Grace? Despise not, neither lose so fair an Occasion of Saving your Self and your Dear

Bishop Moreton speaks openly against K. Richard.

He proposes to the Duke to set up for the Crown.

1483. Country: But if you will not your self accept of the Sovereignty of this Kingdom; if the Toils and Hazards of a Crown, prevail over you more than the Charms of Power, I Intreat you, by the Faith you owe to God, and your Oath to St. George, Patron of the Honourable Garter, (of which Order you are a Companion) by your Affection to the Place that gave you Birth, and to the English Nation; that you will in your High and Princely Wisdom, think of some Means of Advancing such a Good Governour, as you shall appoint to Rule and Govern them. All the Hopes of the People of England are in you, and to you only can they fly for Succour. If you could Set up the House of Lancaster once more, or Mary the Eldest Daughter of King Edward to some Great and Potent Prince, the New King would not long Enjoy his Usurp'd Empire: All Civil War would cease, Domestick Discord would sleep, and Universal Peace and Profit would be the Blessings of this Noble Realm.

When the Bishop had done speaking, the Duke continued Silent for some time: The Bishop chang'd Colour, and was very much Concern'd at it, expecting his Proposal would have been receiv'd with Joy and Greediness.

The Duke perceiving the Fright he was in, said, "Fear nothing, my Lord, I will keep my Word with you; to Morrow we'll Talk more of the Matter, let us now go to Supper."

The Duke the next Day sent for the Bishop, who had not all that while been very Easy, for fear how his last Conversation would be taken.

Buckingham repeated almost all the Bishop of Ely had said to him, and when he had done, he pull'd off his Hat and made this sort of a Prayer, The Duke of Buckingham's Answer to the Bishop of Ely.

"O Lord God! Creator of all things; how much is thy Kingdom of England and the English Nation indebted to thy Goodness? Tho' we are now Oppress'd by an Evil Governour, yet I hope ere long, by Thy Help, to provide such a Ruler, as shall be to Thy Pleasure and the Security of the Common-wealth. He then put on his Hat, and apply'd himself thus to the Bishop; "My Lord of Ely, I have always found you Faithful and Affectionate to me, and especially in your last Free Confidence in me: I acknowledge you to be a Sure Friend, a Trusty Counsellor, a Vigilant States-Man, and a True Lover of your Country; for which I return you hearty Thanks now, and shall Recompence you more effectually, if Life and Power serve. Since, when we were last together, you open'd your Mind freely, touching the Duke of Gloucester, who has Usurp'd the Crown; and hinted a little, the Advancement of the Two Noble Families of York and Lancaster; I shall also, with as much freedom, Communicate to you what I have done, and what I intend to do. I declare therefore, that when King Edward Died, to whom I thought I was very little obliged, (tho' he and I had Married two Sisters) because he neither Promoted nor Prefer'd me as I thought I deserv'd, by my Birth, and the Relation I had to him. I did not much value his Children's Interest, having their Father's Hard Usage still in my Mind. I call'd an Old Proverb to remembrance, which says, Wo be to that Kingdom where Children Rule and Women Govern. I thought it of very Ill Consequence to the People of England, to suffer the Young King to Govern, or the Queen his Mother to be Regent; considering that her Brothers and her Children by her First Husband, tho' of no

1483. "no High Descent, would be at the Head "of all Affairs by their Favour with the "Queen, and have more Share in the Govern"ment than the King's Relations, or any Per"son of the Highest Quality in the Kingdom.
 "For this Reason I thought it to be for the "Publick Welfare and my Private Advantage
 "to Side with the Duke of Gloucester, whom I "took to be as Sincere and Merciful as I now "find him to be False and Cruel. By my means,
 "as you, my Lord, know well, he was made Pro"tector of the King and Kingdom. After which,
 "partly by fair Words and partly by Threats,
 "he perswaded me and other Lords, as well Spi"ritual as Temporal, to consent that he "might assume the Crown till the young King
 "was Four and Twenty Years of Age. I stuck
 "at it at first, and he produced Instruments wit-
 "ness'd by Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries,
 "whose Depositions I then thought to be true,
 "Testifying that King Edward's Children were "Bastards. When these Testimonials were read
 "before us, he stood up Bare-headed and said,
*Well, My Lords, Even as I and you (Sage and Discreet Councillors) would that my Nephew should have no Wrong, so I pray you to do me nothing but Right.
 These Depositions being true, I am the Undoubted Heir to Lord Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who by Act of Parliament was adjudged the true Heir to the Crown of this Realm.*

"Upon which, my self and others took him
 "really for our Rightful Prince and Sovereign

 "his Father's Attainder could not Inherit. The "Duke was also suspected to be a Bastard.
 "Thus by my Assistance and Friendship he was "made King: At which time he promis'd me at "Baynard's-Castle, laying his Hand on mine, that "the two young Princes should Live and should be "Provided for to Mine and every One's Satis"faction: How he perform'd his Promises, we "all know to our Sorrow. When he was in "Possession of the Throne, he forgot his Friends "and the Assurances he had given them: He
 "deny'd to grant my Petition for Part of the "Earl of Hereford's Lands, which his Brother
 "wrongfully detain'd from me: He refused me
 "in such a manner as made the Affront much "more Intollerable. I have born his Ingrati-
 "tude hitherto with Patience; I have conceal'd
 "my Repentments I had with him afterwards,
 "carry'd it outwardly fair, tho' I inwardly re-
 "pentent that I had been accessory to his Ad"vancement. But when I was certainly inform'd
 "of the Death of the two Innocent Princes;
 "to which (God be my Judge) I never con"sented; My Blood curdled at his Treason
 "and Barbarity, I abhor'd the Sight of him,
 "and his Company much more; and pretending
 "an Excuse to leave the Court retir'd to "Brecknock. In my Way home, I meditated
 "how I might Dethrone this Unnatural Uncle.
 "I thought if I would take the Sovereignty on "my self, Now was the Time. The Temporal
 "Lords I saw hated the Tyrant: he was odious
 "alike to the Gentlemen and People of Eng"land; and had I assum'd the Supream Power,
 "I thought there was nobody so likely to "carry it as my self. Flattering my Ambition
 "with those Vain Imaginations, I staid
 "two Days at Tewkesbury. As I travell'd fur"ther Homewards, I consider'd that to Pretend "to Seat my self on the Throne as a Conqueror
 "would not do; which would be to subject
 "the whole Constitution of the Government,
 "and entitle the Conqueror to all the No-
 "blemens Possessions, which would ruin my Design: At last I remember'd that Edmund Duke

 "of Somerset my Grandfather, was with King
 "Henry the Sixth in two or three Degrees from
 "John Duke of Lancaster lawfully Begotten;
 "my Mother being Duke Edmund's Eldest "Daughter, I look'd on my self as the next
 "Heir to Henry the Sixth of the House of Lan"caster: But as I travel'd Homewards, between "Worcester and Bridgenorth I met the Lady Mar"garet Countess of Richmond, at present Wife to "the Lord Stanley, who is the Rightful and Sole "Heir of John Duke of Somerset, my Grandfa-
 "ther's Elder Brother, whose Title I had forgot
 "till I saw her in my Way, and then I remem"ber'd that both her Claim and her Son the "Earl of Richmond's were Bars to mine, and "forbad my Pretending to the Imperial Crown
 "of England.

"I had some Discourse with her about her "Son, and then we parted, she for Worcester and "I for Shrewsbury. As I proceeded in my Jour"ney, I consider'd with my self, whether since
 "I could not Pretend to the Crown by Descent,
 "I might not have recourse to the Election of "the Lords and Gentry of the Realm, the "Usurper being generally hated by them: But "then I began to reflect on the Dangers and "Difficulties of the Enterprize; That the late "King's Daughters and Friends, and the Earl
 "of Richmond's Relations, whose Interest is ve"ry considerable, would certainly oppose me
 "to the Utmost: And if the Houses of Lan"caster and York should joyn against me, I should
 "soon lose the Vain Power I might obtain:
 "Wherefore I resolv'd to flatter my self no
 "more with Chimæra's of my Imaginary Right "to the Royal Diadem, but only to revenge
 "Mine and the People's Wrongs on the Com"mon Enemy.

"The Countess of Richmond propos'd in the "Conversation we had on the Road, That her "Son might marry One of King Edward's
 "Daughters; and she conjur'd me by the Me"mory of Duke Humphrey my Grandfather, that "I would Procure the King's Favour for her
 "Son, and get him to Consent to the Match.
 "I took no notice of her Proposal then; which
 "when I weigh'd in my Mind, I found of so "great Advantage to the Commonwealth, that "I thought it was an Inspiration of the Holy "Spirit for the Benefit of the Kingdom; and I "came to a Resolution in my self to Spend my "Life and Fortune in endeavouring to accom"plish so Glorious a Design, to Marry the Prin"cess Elizabeth to the Earl of Richmond, the "Heir of the House of Lancaster, in whose Quar"rel my Father and Grandfather lost their Lives
 "in Battel. If the Mothers of the Princess and "the Earl can come to an Agreement concern"ing the Marriage, I doubt not but the Proud
 "Boar, whose Tusks have goar'd so many In"nocent Persons, shall soon be brought to Con"fusion. The rightful and Indubitate Heir shall "enjoy the Crown, and Peace be restor'd to
 "this distracted Kingdom.

The Bishop rejoiced extreamly at this Free Declaration of the Duke: and that he might not slacken his Zeal in so Righteous a Cause, he en-deavour'd to Fire him the more, and hasten him to the Execution of his Designs; My Lord, The Bi-says the Bishop, Since by the Providence of God and your Grace's incomparable Wisdom this Happy Alliance is set on foot, 'tis Convenient or rather Necessary that we should Consult whom to trust in so Important and Perilous an Undertaking. To whom shall we first apply towards effecting it? To whom, reply'd The Duke the Duke, but to the Countess of Richmond; who knows

1483. knows where her Son is, and how to Send to him.
The Bishop answer'd, If you begin there, I have an Old Friend in her Service one Reginald Bray, a Man of Probity and Judgment, for whom I will send to attend your Grace and receive your Commands, if you think Proper so to do. The Duke consenting to it, the Bishop wrote to Mr. Bray to come to him to Brecknock; which he did immediately, believing there was something to be done for his Lady's and her Son's Service. The Duke told him what he intended to attempt in favour of the Earl of Richmond, no less than to Seat him in the Royal Throne of England, if he Swore to marry the Lady Elizabeth; and by that Alliance put an End to the long and bloody Dispute between the White Rose and the Red.

In order to this, He said, the Countess must manage the Business with the Queen Dowager and the Princess her Daughter, and when they were engaged, send to her Son in Britain, and get him to Swear he would Perform the Articles, agreed on between his Mother and the Princess Elizabeth in both their Names. Bray gladly undertook to carry this Message to his Mistress, And now they were Embark'd in so great an Affair, the Bishop, who long'd to be at Liberty, desir'd the Duke to let him go to Ely, where the Number of his Friends would secure him against all the Force King Richard could send to destroy him. The Duke being loath to lose so Able and Experienced a Councillor, excus'd his detaining him a little longer; saying, he should go in a few Days, and so well accompanied that he need fear no Enemy.

The Bp. leaves the Duke.
The Bishop impatient of Confinement, stole away from Brecknock to Ely in Disguise, rais'd Money there, and pass'd over into Flanders. The good Prelate thought he had done enough in setting the Duke at Work on so Hazardous a Business, in which it seems he did not care to venture further. Whether he thought he could be more Serviceable to the Earl of Richmond Abroad, or was afraid of his Person at Home; or whatever reason he had to leave the Duke of Buckingham, he does not appear to be Excusable in History: For knowing the Duke was too apt to Open his Mind freely, he might have imagin'd that his Indiscretion would ruin him, and 'twas to Sacrifice a Person of his High Quality, to put him upon an Enterprize he was not fit to Manage, and then forsake him in the Execution of it; at which the Duke was very much concern'd.

The Countess of Richmond sends to the Q. Dowager.
In the mean time Reginald Bray return'd to his Mistress, inform'd her of what had been concerted between the Duke and the Bishop, for the Advancement of her Son; and the Countess with great Joy intended to play her Part as soon as possible. The first thing she was to do, was to engage the Queen Dowager and the Princess; To which purpose she dispatch'd one Lewis a Welshman who was her Physician, with Instructions to Attend the Queen at Westminster, and break the Matter to her. Lewis's Message was not in the least suspected, because he came as a Doctor, to Advise her about her Health. When he was admitted into her Presence, and every body withdrawn, he gave her to understand what Errand he was sent upon: He set forth the Wrongs She, her Children, and the whole Nation had suffered by the Tyranny of Richard, what Miseries had befalln the Kingdom by the Civil War between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and what Advantages would accrue to her, her Children, and the Commonwealth, by the Uniting the Two Houses in marrying her Daughter Elizabeth, the only true 1483.

Heir of the House of York, to his Mistress's Son the Only true Heir of the House of Lancaster. The Queen heard him with Attention, agreed to the Proposals, and bad him tell his Lady, That all King Edward's Friends and Dependants should joyn with her for the Earl of Richmond, on Condition he took his Corporal Oath to marry the Lady Elizabeth her Eldest Daughter, or in case she were not living, the Lady Cecilia, her Second Daughter. Dr. Lewis carry'd this pleasing Answer to his Mistress; from whom he went frequently to the Queen as a Physician, and from her to the Countess, till Matters were fully concluded between them. While these Things were transacting by the two Princesses, Reginald Bray was employ'd to engage as many Persons of Quality as he could in the Earl's Interest; accordingly he procur'd Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheyney, Richard Guilford and Thomas Rame Esquires, and others, to Promise their utmost Assistance, taking an Oath of Secrecy and Fidelity of all of them. The Queen Dowager on her Part made the Earl many Friends, and the Business in a short time was so ripe, that 'twas thought proper to send an Account of it to the Earl, and give him Notice to prepare for his Return to England. Christopher Urswick her Chaplain, was first sent, and soon after follow'd by Hugh Conway Esq; with Money to Provide Men and other Necessaries for his Voyage, and a full Account of the Disposition the Nobility and Commonalty were in to receive him favourably. She advis'd him to Land in Wales, that Principality being most inclin'd to him, as well for his Descent being Welsh, as for the great Estate she had there. For fear Mr. Conway should miscarry in his Voyage, Mr. Rame was dispatch'd away with the same Instructions: The former sail'd from Plymouth, the latter from Kent; and tho' they took different Routes, they arriv'd at the Duke of Britain's Court both within an Hour of each other. They communicated the Subject of their Commission to him. For which he render'd Thanks to the Almighty, being such Joyful News as he would not have given light Credit to; but it came so circumstantiated, and by such trusty Messengers, that he did not doubt of the Truth of it. He imparted the Secret to the Duke of Bretagne, informing him what a fair Prospect he had of obtaining the Crown of England, desiring him to Assist him, and Promising to return all his Acts of Generosity and Friendship as soon as it was in his Power. The Duke gave him hopes of Assistance, and accordingly he Lent him Money and Troops for his intended Expedition; tho' Thomas Hutton, King Richard's Ambassador, offer'd large Sums, and earnestly solicited the Duke and his Ministers to put the Earl's Person in Safe Custody. The Earl having receiv'd so good Encouragement in Bretagne, sent Mr. Conway and Mr. Rame back again to give his Friends an account of his Intentions and Preparations, and to desire them to Provide every thing necessary for his Reception.

The Messengers returning, satisfy'd the Queen Dowager by Dr. Lewis of the Earl's Readiness to comply with the Terms she propos'd, and inform'd the Conspirators of the Duke of Bretagne's Promising to lend him Men and Money: Upon which they all repair'd to their several Posts to make Provision for joyning him with sufficient Strength to accomplish their Designs when he Arriv'd. With these, all such as had any Grudge against, or Quarrel with King Richard, fell in, by which means the Party encreased daily, and so many Persons could not act zealously in such an Affair without giving

King Richard endeavour'd by his Spies to find out the bottom of their Conspiracies, but he had to deal with Men of Equal Cunning and Secrecy, and he cou'd not fix the Matter on any one, tho' he did not doubt but there was a Plot carrying on to Dethrone him and Advance the Earl of Richmond. The Duke of Buckingham's avoiding the Court, made him Jealous that he was in it; and to get him into his Power he made use of his Dissimulation, a Quality that had been very serviceable to him in his Usurpation, and wrote him very Kind obliging Letters to come to London; but the Duke pretending Indisposition excus'd himself. The King enrag'd to find his Artifices unsuccessful, sent him a Letter in a rougher Stile commanding him on his Allegiance to Attend him. The Duke answer'd as roughly,

The Duke will

That he would not Expose himself to his Mortal Enemy whom he neither Lov'd nor would Serve: He knew this Answer was a Declaration of War, and to lose no time took Arms. The same did Thomas Marquess of Dorset, who had escap'd out of Sanctuary, in Yorkshire. Sir Edward Courtney and Peter Bishop of Exeter his Brother in Devonshire and Cornwall; and Others in other Places. The King hearing of these Insurrections was not at all dishearten'd, but mustering all his Forces march'd against the Duke of Buckingham, the Head and Heart of the Conspirators; whom if he suppress'd he suppos'd the Others would fall of Course, or if not, he might easily reduce them. The Duke rather by the Influence he had over the Welshmen who were his Tenants, than out of an Inclination they had to follow him, got a great Multitude of them together, with whom he march'd through the Forrest of Dean towards Gloucester, intending to pass the Severn there, and thence to proceed into the West to joyn the Courtneys; which if he cou'd have effected, King Richard's Reign had not been so long as it was by a Year. But it happen'd that the River Severn was so swoln by a continual Rain for 10 Days together, that it Over-flow'd all the Neighbouring Country, did abundance of Damage, and 'twas so Remarkable, that for a Hundred Years after, that Inundation was call'd, The Great Water, or Buckingham's Water, by the Inhabitants of those Parts. These Floods as it hinder'd the Duke's passing the Severn to joyn his Friends in Devonshire; so it prevented his Friends on the other Side of the River passing over to him: In which Extremity the Welshmen deserted by Degrees, till at last the Duke had none left about him but his Domestick Servants. Nor Prayers nor Threats cou'd keep them together, so he was forc'd to fly with the rest, and in Despair fled to the House of one Humphrey Banister near Sbrewsbury, designing to hide himself there till he cou'd raise more Forces, or escape thence to the Earl of Richmond in Bretagne. He trusted this Banister as a Man who had so many Obligations to him, that he did not think it cou'd be almost possible for Humane Nature to be so Ungrateful, as to betray a Master who had been so Kind to a Servant as the Duke had been to Banister; having bred him up, provided for him honourably, and put entire Confidence in him on many Occasions. Yet upon King Richard's Proclamation to Apprehend the Duke, with the Promise of a Thousand Pounds Reward to the Man that should Discover him, this faithless Wretch betray'd his Master to John Milton Esq; Sheriff of Shropshire, who surrounded his House with a Party of the County Militia, seiz'd the Duke, and carried him to the King, who then kept his Court at Salisbury. Banister and his whole Family were destroy'd by the Surprising Judgments of the Almighty. The Usurper refus'd to Pay him the Thousand Pounds promis'd in the Proclamation; Saying, He that would betray so good a Master, would be false to any other. The Duke earnestly desir'd to be admitted to the King's Prefence, but whether he was or not, we cannot determine. Some Writers affirm he was, and that he attempted to Stab him with a Dagger. 'Tis certain he confess'd the whole Conspiracy, and without any further Tryal was Beheaded in the Market-Place at Salisbury, on the 2d of November. Such was the Fate of Henry Stafford, whom most Authors call Edward Duke of Buckingham: He married Katharine the Daughter of Richard Woodville, Sister to Queen Elizabeth Wife to Edward IV. by whom he had Edward Duke of Buckingham, Henry Earl of Wiltshire, and two Daughters; The one married George Lord Hastings, and the other Richard Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-Waters. The Duke of Bucks was Hereditary Constable of England, and his Estate and Revenues were so great, that King Richard had reason to be Jealous of him; for no Subject in England was so Powerful either in the Number of his Tenants and Dependants, or in his vast Riches.

By the dispersing of the Welshmen the Western Army was so discouraged, that every Man shifted for himself. Some fled to Sanctuary, others took Shipping and sail'd to Bretagne to the Earl of Richmond. Among these were Peter Courtney Bishop of Exeter, Sir Edward Courtney his Brother, afterwards created Earl of Devonshire by Henry the Seventh, Thomas Marquess Dorset, John Lord Welles, Sir John Bourchier, Sir Edward Woodville the Queen Dowager's Brother, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheyney and his two Brothers, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir William Berkley, Sir William Branden, Thomas Branden Esq; his Brother, Sir Richard Edgecomb, John Hallowell Esq; and Capt. Edward Poynings, a famous Soldier, whom Henry VII. highly preferr'd. King Richard did all that a Wise Prince cou'd think of to prevent their getting off. Knowing what an Addition to the Earl's Power, the Prefence of so many Persons of Quality would make, he set Guards on most of the Ports of England; but those in the West being in the Hands of the Malecontents, they escap'd the Cruel Vengeance which was prepar'd for them. The Usurper fitted out a Fleet to Cruise off the Coasts of Bretagne, and prevent the Earl of Richmond's Landing any Forces in England; but the Earl not hearing of the Duke's Misfortune, set Sail the 12th of October with a Fleet of Forty Ships having 5000 Bretons aboard. They had not been long at Sea before they met with a Storm that scatter'd their Fleet. The Ship in which was the Earl in Person was driven on the Coast of England to the Mouth of the Haven of Pool in Dorsetshire; where finding the Shore was crouded with Troops to oppose his Descent, he forbade any of his Men to land till the whole Navy came up. However, he sent out his Boat with some Officers to demand of the Men, who stood on the Shoar, Whether they were Friends or Enemies? These Traytors instructed by King Richard answer'd, They were Friends posted there by the Duke of Bucks, to receive the Earl of Richmond. The Earl suspecting the Deceit, and perceiving he was alone, the rest of his Fleet not appearing, weigh'd Anchor and return'd to France. He landed in Normandy, where he refresh'd himself and his Men two or three days, and then sent a Gentleman to Charles the Eighth, the French 1483. French King desiring Passports thro' his Territories into Bretagne; which was readily granted by Charles. However the Earl did not stay for the return of his Courier, but trusting to the French King's Generosity continu'd his Journey thro' Normandy to Vannes, where the Duke of Bretagne resided. When he arriv'd there he heard of the Duke of Buckingham's Death, and found the Marquefs Dorset, and the other English Gentlemen who had made their Escape. They all swore Allegiance to him, and he took his Corporal Oath, on the same Day the 25th of December, that he wou'd marry the Princess Elizabeth when he had suppress'd the Usurper Richard, and was in Possession of the Crown.

Some of the Conspirators executed. The Zeal which these Gentlemen shewed in his Cause, and the Consideration of the great Interest they had in England, lessen'd the Earl's Sorrow for the Misfortune of his Friends in their first Attempts against the Tyrant, and encouraged him to refit his Fleet and prepare for a New Voyage to England, where many of his Friends were seiz'd and Executed; as Sir George Brown and Sir Roger Clifford who were Beheaded at London; and Sir Thomas St. Leger, who had married the King's own Sister the Dutcheß of Exeter, Thomas Rame Esq; and several of his own Servants; the two former were executed at Exon; the latter, whom he condemn'd on bare Suspicion, at London, and other places. The Usurper made a Progress to Devonshire and Cornwall to settle the Peace of those Counties, where the Earl's Party was very Numerous. The Mayor, Aldermen and Citizens of Exeter presented him with a Purse of Gold to obtain his Favour: He receiv'd it graciously, lay in the City one Night, and the next Day went about it to take a View of it: When he came to the Castle, and was inform'd 'twas call'd Rugemont, he seem'd very Melancholy, and said, I find I shall not Live long. He thought that Name was Foretold by an Old Prophecy which he had Heard relating to him, That his End wou'd be nigh when he came to Richmond: Which Prediction was fulfill'd at the Battel of Bosworth. In his Western Journey, he found the Gentlemen of those Parts were almost all concern'd in the Conspiracy to depose him and raise the Earl of Richmond to the Throne. All that had made their Escape were Out-law'd, and those that fell into his Hands were put to Death; for he knew not what Mercy and Humanity meant.

1484. In the Beginning of the following Year he Summon'd a Parliament, in which the Earl of Richmond and his Followers were attainted, and the People burthen'd with severe Taxes and Impositions. The Money so collected was wasted on his Creatures, or squander'd away Prodigally on such as knew any thing of his Guilt in the Death of his Nephews, to stop their Mouths. He obliged the Lord Stanley to confine his Wife the Countess of Richmond, so that she shou'd have no means of holding Correspondence with any one to his Prejudice. He order'd William Collingburne of Lydiard in Wilshire to be Hang'd, Drawn and Quarter'd, for Aiding and Assisting the Earl of Richmond and his Followers, and Writing a Satyrical Dyttich upon him and his Favourites, the Lord Viscount Lovel, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby.

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog, Rule all England under a Hog.

Alluding by the Hog to the Usurper's Arms, one of his Supporters being a Wild-Boar. Yet these Executions did not ease him of his Fears: He heard by his Emisaries abroad, that Dr. Moreton Bishop of Ely and Ursewich, the Countess of Richmond's Chaplain, who liv'd in Flanders, had carried on a close Correspondence with many of the Chief Persons in his Kingdom; and that the Duke of Bretagne still continu'd to Protect and Support the Earl Henry. He saw the Storm that had lately been gathering over him was not dispers'd by the Duke of Buckingham's Death, and the Flight of the Courtneys; the Clouds grew Darker still, and the Tempest that threatned him was such as requir'd all his Arts and all his Power to Provide against. He secur'd his Dominions on the Side of Scotland, by entering into an Alliance with the Scots King, to whose Eldest Son the Duke of Rothsay he married the Lady Anne de la Pool, Daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne the Usurper's best belov'd Sister. Her Son John he proclaim'd Heir Apparent to the Crown, without having regard to King Edward the Fourth's Daughters: Yet all his Negotiations and Successes Abroad and at Home were Ineffectual, and he perceiv'd that nothing would entirely secure him against the Earl and his Friends Contrivances, unless he cou'd get his Person into his Power. To this Purpose he sent over other Ambassadors to the Duke of Bretagne, with Instructions to apply themselves to Peter Landaise the Duke's Chief Minister and Favourite, and by Immense Sums of Money to endeavour to tempt him to betray the Earl. They were to offer him for the Duke his Master the Clear Profits of all the Earl's Estate in England, and for himself whatever he cou'd ask of them. The Treacherous Breton hearken'd to the Proposals made by Richard's Ambassadors, and promis'd to deliver the Earl of Richmond to them. But the Bishop of Ely who had Intelligence in King Richard and the Duke of Bretagne's Courts, understood what Designs were forming against Earl Henry, of which he sent him Notice by Ursewich; and the Earl giving Credit to his Information, escap'd in Disguise with his Principal Officers into the French King's Dominions. Landaise intended a Day or two after to have seiz'd him, and when he miss'd him sent Couriers into all Parts of the Dutchy in Search of him. He was scarce got into the French Territories, when one of the Parties that were sent out after him came within an Hour's Riding of him, but he had prevented Landaise his Treachery who acted without his Master's Privy. The Duke of Bretagne being at that time dangerously Ill, and leaving all things to his Management. The English Refugees that remain'd in Bretagne expected all to be deliver'd up to the Fury of King Richard, when they heard of the Earl's Escape, and the Reasons of it: And had not the Duke of Bretagne recover'd and took on him the Administration of Affairs, the Traytor Landaise wou'd have seiz'd them, and yielded them up to the Usurper's Ambassadors. The Duke inquiring into the Causes of the Earl's Flight into France, was very much displeas'd with Landaise, and sent for Sir Edward Woodvill and Capt. Poyning, to whom he excus'd the Treachery of his Minister, disowning the Knowledge of it, and gave them a considerable Sum of Money, to conduct them to all the Englishmen who were at Vannes, thro' Bretagne into France to their Master the Earl of Richmond: For which generous Act the Earl sent him Thanks by a Messenger on purpose. Himself went to Loinges on the Loire, where Charles the Eighth, the French King, kept his Court, and from thence accompanied him to Montargis. Charles entertain'd him and his Followers very Magnificently, but was not very forward to lend him any Assistance.

While the Earl was in the French Court, John Earl of Oxford repair'd to him with James Blunt Captain of the Castle of Haumes, in which the Lord Oxford had been confin'd several Years, and had engag'd the Governor in the Interest of the Earl of Richmond; with them came Sir John Fortescue, Porter of the Town of Calais. James Blunt had reinforc'd his Garrison, supply'd it with all sorts of Provisions for a vigorous Defence, and left a Trusty Officer to Command there in his Absence. The Arrival of the Earl of Oxford, and the Revolt of the Garrison of Haumes, animated afresh Earl Henry and his Friends, whose Spirits began to sink, seeing the little Hopes they had of Help in France. Their Company encreas'd after this daily: Most of the English Gentlemen who were Students in the University of Paris did Homage to the Earl, among whom was Mr. Richard Fox, afterwards Bishop of Winchester; and as their Numbers grew greater Abroad, their Interest at Home was consequently enlarged.

The Usurper, who by his Spies had a full Account of all their Proceedings, knew that the Hopes of the Party were founded on the Earl's Promise to marry the Princess Elizabeth, which he resolv'd by some Means or other to Prevent; and to that end he did his Utmost to ingratiate himself with her Mother Queen Elizabeth. He sent several Flattering Messages to her in Sanctuary, Promised to advance the Marquess Dorset and all her Relations, and won upon her so much by his fair Speeches, that forgetting the many Affronts he had cast on the Memory of her Husband, on her own Honour and the Legitimacy of her Children, and even the Murder of her dear Sons, she comply'd with him, and promis'd to bring over her Son, and all the late King's Friends from the Party of the Earl of Richmond. She went so far, as to deliver up her Five Daughters into his Hands; whom as soon as King Richard had got in his Custody, he resolv'd to order the Matter so, that he might be in a Condition to take the Eldest of them to be his Wife; which was a sure Way of defeating the Earl of Richmond's Purposes. Queen Elizabeth was so charm'd by his false Promises, that she wrote to her Son the Marquess Dorset to leave Earl Henry and hasten to England, where she had procur'd him a Pardon, and provided all sorts of Honours for him. What Success her Letters had, we shall see in the Course of this History.

We have already observ'd, that King Richard had cast his Eyes upon his Brother Edward the Fourth's Daughter, the Princess Elizabeth: He had been guilty of Treason and Murder, and almost all the Crimes that are to be found in the Infernal Rolls: Incest seem'd only wanting to make him a compleat Monster of Mankind, the Horror of his People, and the Shame of the whole World. As he was Master of the Art of Dissimulation, and had lately put on the Mask of Piety, so he was a little at a loss how to remove his Wife out of the way, to make room for his Niece in his Bed. He began his Lewd Design, by shewing an Aversion to his Wife's Company and Embraces. He complain'd to several Lords of the Council, of her Barrenness; especially to Thomas Rotherham, Archbishop of York, whom he had lately Released out of Prison. He told him of some Private Defects in the Queen, which had render'd her Person disagreeable to him, and hoped the Bishop would tell her of it, who being a Woman of a meek Temper, he thought would take it so much to Heart, that she would not Live long after it. Dr. Rotherham said to some of his most intimate Friends, The Queen's Days are but few; for he perceiv'd by the Usurper's Discourse, that he was weary of her and wanted another Wife, and he knew him so well, that he cou'd not suppose he would scruple to add one Murder more to the many bloody Cruelties he had been guilty of to satisfy his Lust and Ambition. To prepare the Way for her Death, he order'd a Report to be spread among the People, that she was Dead: Which he did with an Intention, that the Rumour coming to her Ears, it might allarm her with fear of her sudden Fate, and those Fears throw her into a Disease which might carry her off. The Queen no sooner heard of what was reported against her, but she believ'd it came originally from her Husband; and thence concluding, that her Hour was drawing nigh, she ran to him in a most Sorrowful and Deplorable Condition, and demanded of him What she had done to deserve Death? The Tyrant answer'd her with Fair Words and False Smiles, bidding her be of Good Cheer, for to his knowledge she had no other cause. But whether her Grief, as he design'd it should, struck so to her Heart, that it broke with the Mortal Wound, or he hasten'd her End, as was generally suspected, by Poison, she Died in a few Days afterwards. She was Daughter of the famous Earl of Warwick; and when Richard married her, Widow to Prince Edward, Heir to Henry VI. The Usurper affect'd to shew an extraordinary Sorrow at her Death, and was at the Expence of a Pompous Funeral for her. Notwithstanding all his pretended Mourning, before she was scarce cold in her Grave, he made his Addresses to the Princess Elizabeth, who had his Love in abhorrence, and the whole Kingdom appear'd averse to so Unnatural a Marriage. His Affairs were in such an Ill Posture, that he durst not provoke the Queen and the People further, by putting a Violence on the Princess's Inclinations; so he defer'd his Courtship till he was better Settled in the Throne. The Nobility daily past over into France: The Gentry and Commonalty every where, shew'd an Affection to the Earl of Richmond, as far as they durst do it, without bringing themselves under the Lash of the Tyrant's Laws. He was most jealous of Thomas Lord Stanley, his Brother Sir William Stanley, and Gilbert Talbot. He oblig'd the Lord Stanley to leave his Son George Stanley, Lord Strange, at Court, as an Hostage of his own Fidelity. He commanded the Governor of Calais to Attack the Castle of Haumes: The Earl of Oxford and Captain Blunt immediately hasten'd to the Relief of it, but before they could arrive near it, the Garrison was reduced to the last Extremity, and the Besiegers, on the report of the Earl of Oxford's Approach, offering them to March out with Bag and Baggage, they Surrender'd the Fort, and Joyn'd the Earl, who led them to Paris, where they were Entertain'd by the Earl of Richmond. The Reduction of Haumes, and the small Hopes of Assistance which Earl Henry had in the French Court, made the Usurper so secure, that he recall'd the Squadron of Men of War, which he had order'd to Cruise in the Channel and prevent the Earl's making a Descent in England, and contented himself with commanding the Lords and Gentlemen, who liv'd near the Coasts, to be on their Guard to Defend them.

In the mean time the Earl of Richmond continued his Negotiations in the Court of France for Succours; but Charles VIII. being in his Minority, he was forced to apply to the Regents, or

The chiefest of them was Lewis Duke of Orleans, who afterwards was King: But by their Civil Dissentions, the Affair of his Supplies was spun on to so great a length, that the Usurper flatter'd himself 'twould never take effect: For this Reason he grew more Pleasant than before, his Joy increas'd as his Care lessen'd, and lull'd him at last into a Fatal Security.

The Q. Dowager periwades her Son, the Marquis of Dorset to leave the E. of Richmond.

The Queen Dowager, to oblige the King, who lately appear'd very ready to Serve her and her Daughters, continued to Write to her Son the Marquis of Dorset, to leave Earl Henry. The Marquis fearing the Earl wou'd not succeed in his Enterprize, gave way to his Mother's Perswasions; and King Richard's Flattering Promises, left the Earl, and stole away from Paris by Night, intending to Escape to Flanders: But as soon as the Earl had Notice of his Flight, he apply'd to the French Court, for leave to Apprehend him in any Part of his Dominions; for both Himself and his Followers were afraid of his Discovering all their Designs, to their utter Destruction if he got to England. Having obtain'd Licence to Seize him, the Earl sent Messengers every way in search of him; and among the rest, Humphrey Cheyney Esq; who overtook him near Champagne, and by Arguments and Fair Promises prevail'd with him to return. By the Marquis's Disposition to leave him, the Earl began to doubt, that if he delay'd his Expedition to England longer, many more of his Friends might grow cool in their Zeal for him; so he earnestly Solicited the French Court for Aid, desiring so small a Supply of Men and Money, that Charles cou'd not in Honour refuse him; yet for what he Lent him, he would have Hostages, that Satisfaction should be made. The Earl made no Scruple of that, so leaving the Lord Marquis Dorset (whom he still mistrusted) and Sir John Bourchier as his Pledges at Paris, he departed for Roan, where the few Men that the French King had lent him, and all the English that follow'd his Fortunes Rendezvous'd.

The Earl stops him.

K. Richard designs to Marry the Princess Elizabeth.

When he arriv'd there, he was inform'd of the Usurper's Intentions to marry the Princess Elizabeth himself, and her Sister, the Princess Cecilia, to a Man of Mean Condition. This was Mortifying News to him, for he imagin'd if his Alliance with the House of York was by that Means broken, their Friends would all fall off from him: However he resolv'd to push for the Crown, as Heir to the House of Lancaster, but then it was necessary for him to encrease his Strength and Interest; wherefore he dispatch'd away a Messenger to Sir Walter Herbert, a Man of Great Power in Wales, to get him to espouse his Quarrel, by an Offer of Marrying his Sister, a Beautiful Young Lady. The Earl of Northumberland had Married another of Sir Walter's Sisters, and the Earl of Richmond's Agent had Instructions to Address himself also to him, and periwade him to forward the Marriage. The Messenger found the Ways so narrowly watch'd, that he cou'd not proceed on his Journey; and 'twas well for the Earl that he did no more in it; for had any such Treaty been propos'd and known, his Friends, who were so on the Princess Elizabeth's account, had all forsaken him. The Messenger being thus disappointed, the Earl receiv'd One out of England Morgan Kidwellie, Esq; a Lawyer, who brought him Advice, That Sir Rice ap Thomas, a Gentleman who was as powerful in Wales as Sir Walter Herbert, and Capt. John Savage, a famous Soldier, had made Great Preparations to Assist him; that Reginald Bray had collected large Sums of Money to Pay his Troops, and earnestly Entreated him to hasten his Voyage and direct his Course to Wales. The Earl rejoicing at this Good News, order'd all his Forces to Embark and Sail from Harfleet in Normandy in August, with about Two Thousand Men, in a few Ships, just enough to Transport them. After Seven Days Sail, he arriv'd in the Haven of Milford, and Landed at a Place call'd Dall, from whence he March'd the next Day to Harford West, where he was Receiv'd with Joy by the Townsmen. Having Refresh'd his Men, and sent Notice, by Trusty Messengers, to his Mother, the Lord Stanley, and Sigilbert Talbot, that he intended to direct his March towards London, desiring them to meet him on the Way with their Powers, he advanced to Shrewsbury, where Sir Gilbert Talbot Joyn'd him with the E. of Shrewsbury's Tenants, as Sir Rice ap Thomas and Richard Griffith Esq; had done before, with a Body of Welsh-Men; by which his Army became so strong, that he easily Reduced all the Towns to which he came in his March. Sir Rice ap Thomas wou'd not come unto him, till he had promised to make him Governour of Wales, in case he got the Crown; which the Earl agreed to and perform'd as soon as 'twas in his power, Sir Rice having been very Faithful and Serviceable to him.

The Earl of Richmond Lands in Wales.

His Power increases.

In the mean while, the Lord Stanley and his Brother Sir William Stanley rais'd Men, but did not declare whom they would side with: Sir William advanced with his Army into Staffordshire, and waited on the Earl of Richmond at Stafford, attended only by Twenty or Thirty Persons. The Lord Stanley lay at Litchfield with 5000 Men; yet neither he nor his Brother Joyn'd the Earl. Sir William having had a Short Conference with him, return'd to his Forces; and when the Earl approach'd near Litchfield, the Lord Stanley return'd to Atherstone, to prevent King Richard's having any Suspicion of him; being afraid that the Tyrant would murder his Son the Lord Strange, whom he had in his Custody, if he sided openly with the Earl of Richmond.

The Usurper at first despised the Earl's Attempt, hearing he had brought so few Men with him, he did not doubt but Sir Walter Herbert would easily Suppress him with the Militia of Wales, which he order'd him to raise, but when he heard that Sir Walter had suffered him to pass, and so many Gentlemen had Joyn'd him with their Friends and Dependants, that his Army would be as numerous as his own, if the Lancashire Men, under the Stanley's, declar'd for him, he resolv'd to Oppose him in Person. He commanded Henry Earl of Northumberland, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford, and other Gentlemen whose Loyalty he suspected to attend him in Arms, and sent for the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, Sir Robert Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower, and others, to bring their whole Strength with them, to enable him to give the Earl Battel before he receiv'd further Assistance. When all his Troops were arriv'd at Nottingham, where he kept his Court, he put himself at their Head, and led them to Leicester. Sir Thomas Bourchier, Sir Walter Hungerford and several others, found means to Desert to the Earl; which tho' it was a great Discouragement to Richard, yet it did ease Earl Henry of his Discontent, for that the Lord Stanley had not Joyn'd him. His Army proceeded from Litchfield to Tamworth, Himself bringing up the Rear with about Twenty Horse.

As he was musing on the Difficulties of his Enterprize, he lagg'd behind his Company, and it growing Dark, they march'd on and entered Tamworth before they mist him. His Care was increased, by a Report, that King Richard was at hand; whose coming up before the Lord Stanley had joyn'd him, threatned his whole Army with Destruction; yet his Men were not discourag'd, they trusted in their own Valour and the Goodness of their Cause, and proceeded with Great Resolution.

The Earl having insensibly lost his Companions, and the High-way to Tamworth, turn'd aside to a Little Village Three Miles from Tamworth, where he stay'd all Night, not daring to discover himself, or ask a Guide to the Town. His Followers were much surprized at his Absence, and afraid what was become of him. He was also apprehensive of the ill Effects of their missing him, and not a little fearful of falling into the Hands of some of the Usurper's Parties. Early in the Morning he left the Village, and happily arriv'd at the Town, to the unspeakable Joy of his Army: He excus'd his Absence by pretending he had been to consult with some private Friends of his who durst not yet appear for him. He was unwilling his Companions should think him Guilty of such a Blunder as to lose his Way, when he had so many Guides about him, and made that a piece of Policy, which was indeed downright Ignorance: So easie 'tis for Princes to impose upon their People who are ready to judge favourably of all their Actions.

He just shew'd himself to his Soldiers, and then left them again to go to Atherstone, where he first saw and saluted the Lord Stanley, his Father in Law; He held a Conference with him and Sir William Stanley in a little Field, where they consulted how they should give the Tyrant Battel to the best Advantage. In the Evening Sir John Savage, Sir Bryan Sanford, and Sir Simon Digby, came unto him with all their Friends and Followers from King Richard who was advanc'd to Leicester, and his Army encamp'd not far off, on a Hill call'd Arme Beame, in Bosworth Parish. The next Day after King Richard arriv'd at Leicester, he went to the Camp and drew up his Men in order of Battel on the Plain. He plac'd his Archers in Front under the Command of the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earl of Surrey his Son; Himself led the Main Body, with two Wings of Cavalry on each Flank. The Earl leaving the Lord Stanley return'd to his Army, and march'd them out of Tamworth towards the Enemy, resolving to fight King Richard. The Lord Stanley also march'd from Atherstone, and halted in a place between the two Armies. The Earl sent to him to come and help to set his Men in Order of Battel; but the Lord Stanley even now was so cautious, that he excus'd his appearing among the Earl's Followers: He bad him Draw up his Soldiers, He won'd do the same by his, and Joyn him at Supper time. Tho' this Answer vext the Earl of Richmond inwardly, he seem'd as well satisfy'd as if he had come, and Chearfully put his Men in Order: His Front was thin, and consisted of Archers, commanded by John Earl of Oxford; Sir Gilbert Talbot led the Right Wing, and Sir John Savage the Left, attended by a Troop of Young Fellows well arm'd, Clad in white Coats and Hoods, who made a gallant Figure, terrible to the Enemy. The Earl of Richmond accompanied by the Earl of Pembroke led the Main Body; his whole Strength did not amount to Six Thousand Men, Stanley's Forces which were Seven or Eight Thousand strong excepted: And King Richard had twice that Number. we have mention'd, the two Armies advanced towards each other; the Lord Stanley moving aside off as the Earl of Richmond mov'd; and when the Usurper was come farther into the Plain where he expected the Earl's Approach, he made a Speech to his Army to this Purpose:

My Friends and Fellow-Soldiers,

BY your Valour and Conduct I got and have enjoy'd the Crown in spite of all the Wicked Designs of your and my Enemies. I have govern'd this Nation as a good Prince ought to do for the Benefit of my Subjects, and done nothing without the Advice and Consent of my Counsellors, whose Fidelity and Wisdom I have often prov'd; and your Loyalty to me makes me believe that you have an Opinion of me as I have of my Self, that I am your Rightful and Lawful King. Tho' at my Accession to the Throne I was Guilty of a Wicked Detested Crime, yet my Repentance of it has been so Severe and so Sincere that I hope you will forget it, as I shall never cease to Deplore and Lament it. Considering the Danger we are in at this Time, what a gracious Prince I have been to you, and what good Subjects you have been to me, we are bound by the strictest Bonds of Obligation and Duty mutually to defend one another in so great Peril. To keep what we have got is as glorious as to get it: And as by your Assistance I was advanced to the Throne, so I hope by the same Help to continue in it. I doubt not you have heard of the Traiterous Devices of a an Obscure Welshman (whose Father I never knew, and whom I never saw) against our Crown and Dignity. You hear who they are that he depends upon, a Company of Traytors, Thieves, Outlaws and Fugitives; mean Beggary Bretons, and Cowardly Frenchmen: whose Aim is the Destruction of you, your Wives and Children, as 'tis their Leader's to Disposse's me of the Imperial Crown of this Realm. Let us therefore joyn heartily in our common Defence, Fight like Lions, and fear not to dye like Men: Indeed there is Nothing for you to be afraid of. The Hare never fled faster from before the Hound, nor the Lark from the Kite, nor the Sheep from the Woolf, than these Boasting Adversaries of ours shall quit the Field at the Sight of such brave Soldiers. Nor do I Promise you Victory without Reason: For let us think a little who it is that we have to deal with. And first for the Earl of Richmond, Captain of the Rebels, a Welsh Boy, of little Courage and less Experience in War; Bred up in the Duke of Brittain's Court like a Bird in a Cage, who never saw an Army, and consequently is not Capable to Lead one. The Soldier's Success is owing in a great measure to the Captain's Conduct and Valour. What can his Men hope from him? What from Themselves? a Crew of Vagabonds and Rebels, who will Tremble when they see us advancing with Banners display'd to chastize them. They will either fly before us, or Conscious of Divine Vengeance, for the breach of many Oaths of Allegiance they have Sworn to us, throw down their Arms, and at our Feet implore our Royal Mercy. As for the Frenchmen and Bretons, our Noble Ancestors have often triumph'd over them. What are They? Boasters, Drunkards, Ravishers, Cowards, The most Effeminate and Lewd Wretches that ever offer'd themselves in Front of Battel. Since such are the Enemies we are to Fight with, Come on, My Friends

Whether this Speech was made By him or for him, we cannot decide; the Author from whom we took it says it was his own, and that it had not so good an Effect on the Minds of his Soldiers as he intended it should have. He had many Gentlemen, and others in his Army, who follow'd him more out of Fear than Affection; and wish'd well to his Adversary. The Earl of Richmond receiving by his Scouts, That the Usurper's Army was drawn up in Battalia a little distance off on the Plain, rode from Rank to Rank and Wing to Wing to encourage his Men.
He was arm'd at all Points, (his Helmet excepted) and got up on an Eminence to be the better seen by his Soldiers: For tho' he was handsom and well-proportion'd, yet he was short.
Having kept Silence some time to consider of what he was about to say to them, He began his Speech thus:

These Words so encourag'd his Men, that they demanded to be led immediately against the Enemy. There was a Morass between the two Armies, the Earl left it on his Right hand, by which he not only hinder'd King Richard's attacking him on that Side, but had the Sun in his Back, and it shone full in the Faces of his Enemies.
The Usurper seeing his Army was approaching, order'd his Trumpets to sound and the Archers to let fly their Arrows: The Earl's Bowmen return'd their Shot, and when that Dreadful Storm was over, the Foot joyn'd and came to close Fight. 'Twas then that the Lord Stanley came in to the Earl's Assistance. The Earl of Oxford fearing his Men might be surrounded by the Multitude of the Enemy, commanded none shou'd stir above Ten Foot from the Standard: The Soldiers presently clos'd their Ranks and ceas'd the Combat, expecting further Orders. King Richard's Troops being Jealous of some Stratagem, stood still to observe them;
and indeed they did not fight with a very good Will at all. The Earl of Oxford led his Men again

1485. to the Charge. The Duke of Norfolk, the Usurper's fast Friend, chang'd the Order of his Battel, widen'd his First Line, but clos'd and enlarg'd his Second; and then renew'd the Combat. King Richard hearing the Earl of Richmond was not far off, attended with a few of his Guards only, fought him amidst his Enemies, and having spy'd him, set Spurs to his Horse and ran towards him; The Earl perceived him, and prepar'd to receive him as a Man shou'd his mortal Foe. The King meeting with Sir William Branden the Earl's Standard Bearer in his way, overthrew and slew him. This Knight was Father of Charles Branden Duke of Suffolk, Famous in the Reign of Henry VIII. Richard then fought Sir John Cheyney, dismounted him, and forc'd his Way up to the Earl; who kept him off at Swords Point till Assistance came in, and he was reliev'd by his Followers. At the instant Sir William Stanley, who had been as wary as the Lord Stanley his Brother, joyn'd the Earl with Three Thousand chosen Men, upon which King Richard's Soldiers turn'd their Backs and fled; himself fighting manfully in the midst of his Enemies was Slain. The E. of Oxford made a terrible Slaughter in the Van of the Usurper's Army. The Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Ferrars of Charley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury dy'd on the Spot, together with about a Thousand of their Men. The greatest part of those in the main Body of Richard's Army watching their Opportunity, while the Van was hotly engag'd with the Earl's, left the Field and departed every Man to his Home; having been by Force taken from their Habitations to fight for a Prince whose Government was Odious to them. The Duke of Norfolk was warn'd, by a Dyctich in the Meeter of those Times which was fix'd on the Gate of the House where he Lodg'd, not to venture farther in the Tyrant's Quarrel; for he was betray'd, and all those that engag'd with him wou'd be ruin'd. The Rhimes were these:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too Bold;
For Dicken, thy Master, is Bought and Sold.

But as John Howard Duke of Norfolk owed his Advancement to the Usurper, who made him a Duke, he thought his own Title to the Honours he held wou'd be Precarious, if Richard cou'd not defend his Crown; so he follow'd his Fortune, and fell a Victim to his Ambition. Sir William Catesby a Judge, who had been a main Instrument of the Usurper's Tyranny, and several other Offenders were Taken, and two Days after Beheaded at Leicester. The Lord Viscount Lovell, Humphry Stafford Esq; and Thomas Stafford his Brother, made their Escapes. Many Gentlemen and Private Soldiers threw down their Arms, submitted to the Earl, and were graciously receiv'd. Among those was Henry Earl of Northumberland, who did not engage in the late Battel, He and his Men standing Neuter; for which he was immediately taken into the Earl of Richmond's Favour and Sworn of his Privy-Council. Thomas Earl of Surrey was sent to the Tower, as having been more zealous than the rest in the Tyrant's Cause: However he was releas'd soon after, and preferr'd to Places of the greatest Trust and Honour. Earl Henry had scarce a Hundred Men Kill'd on his Part, and no Person of Quality besides Sir William Branden. The Engagement lasted in all about two Hours, and happen'd on the 22d day of August. The Usurper there finish'd his Evil Course after he had reign'd two Years, two Months and one Day, reckoning from the Time of his Coronation, 1485. which was the Day after his Election. Had he liv'd with as much Glory as he dy'd, his Character wou'd have shone bright in the English Annals. But tho' he wanted not Personal Bravery, yet that Quality as shining as it is, was fully'd and obscur'd by his Cruelty, and Thirst of Blood. He might have sav'd his Life had not Despair hurried him on to Death. In the Beginning of the Battel, he perceiv'd, by his Mens fighting with an ill-will and others leaving him, that the Day was Lost. Some of his Creatures advis'd him to Fly, and brought him a swift Horse to carry him off; but knowing how generally he was hated by the whole Kingdom, and that his Crimes were such as deny'd him all hopes of Pardon, he thought the longer he liv'd his Misery wou'd be the longer, and that at last he shou'd dye with Infamy; wherefore he rush'd desperately into the thickest of the Enemy, and met a more glorious Fate than he deserved.

After the Battel was over and the Victory entirely gain'd, the Earl of Richmond fell down on his Knees in the Open Field, thank'd the Almighty for the Blessing he had given to his Arms, Pray'd for the Catholick Church, and his Subjects which now he had the Charge of. He then rode up to an Eminence, and from thence gave his Soldiers Thanks for behaving themselves so well in the late Fight, promising them all Rewards answerable to their Deserts. The Army shouting Clapt their Hands and saluted him King, crying out with one Voice, King Henry, King Henry! And the Lord Stanley taking King Richard's Crown, which was found among the Spoils of the Field, put it on the Earl's Head, who from that Time assum'd the Title and Power of King. We must not omit to inform the Reader of the Lord Strange's Escape. King Richard hearing his Father had rais'd Five Thousand men and was Advancing towards the Earl of Richmond, sent to him to Joyn him, and Swore by God's Death, if he refus'd it, he wou'd order his Son's Head to be cut off before he died. The Lord Stanley answer'd, He had more Sons, and cou'd not Promise to come to him at that Time. The Tyrant as he Swore to do, order'd the Lord Strange to be Beheaded at the Instant when the two Armies were to Engage: But some of his Council abhorring that the Innocent young Gentleman should suffer for his Father's Offence, told the Usurper, Now was a Time to Fight, and not to Execute; advising him to keep him Prisoner till the Battel was over; The Tyrant hearken'd to their Advice, broke his Oath, and commanded the Keepers of his Tents to take him into Custody, till he return'd from the Combat. By this Means the Lord Strange escaped the King's Revenge, equally Bloody and Unjust. The Keepers of his Tents deliver'd him to his Father the Lord Stanley after the Fight; and for saving him, were taken into the New King's Favour, and preferr'd. In the Evening King Henry march'd to Leicester. Where King Richard's Body stript stark Naked was brought in a shameful manner to be Buried. Blanch Sanglier, a Pursuivant at Arms threw it upon a Horse, like a Calf; His Head and Arms hanging on one Side and his Legs on the other, his whole Carcass besmear'd with Dirt and Blood. The Pursuivant rode with it to the Grey-Fryers Church at Leicester, where it was expos'd a Filthy Spectacle to the View of the People, who us'd it Ignominiously, and afterwards 'twas Buried in that Abbey-Church; where King Henry in respect to his Family, 1485. Family, order'd a Tomb to be erected over his Grave. We shall not trouble the Reader with a long Account of his Person and Manners: He has doubtless by this time seen enough of him, and the Picture shewn at a nearer View wou'd rather Frighten than Divert him. He was short and little, Crooked or Hump-back'd, one Shoulder higher than the other: His Face was little: He had a Cruel Look; and what confess'd the Malice and Deceit of his Heart, He often mus'd, and musing bit his nether Lip: He wore a Dagger always about him, and frequently would draw it up and down the Scabbard: He was Cunning and False, Proud and Valiant; and in a word, by the History Sir Thomas More has left us of him, the greatest Tyrant that ever Sat on the British Throne; where no Tyrant did ever Sit long.

A short Character of King Richard.

The Reigns of King Edward V. and his Successor Richard III. were so short, that there were few Remarkable Occurrences in their Times: And the most Illustrious Persons, both in War and the Arts and Sciences, will more Properly come under that of Henry the VIIth.

IN the First Part of Richard the III's Reign, There happen'd such a Flood in Gloucestershire, that all the Country was Overflow'd by the Severn, several Persons were Drown'd in their Beds, Children in Cradles swam about the Fields, and Beasts were Drown'd even on the Hills: The Waters did not Abate in Ten Days; which hinder'd the Duke of Buckingham's Passing that River into Wales to joyn the Welshmen who were risen against King Richard, and occasion'd his Misfortune and Death.

Hol. 743.

Banister, who betray'd the Duke of Buckingham his Master, was sorely afflicted with God's Secret Judgments: His Eldest Son went Mad, and died raving in a Hog-sty. His Eldest Daughter, who was very Beautiful, was suddenly stricken with a foul Leprosy. His Second Son was taken Lame in his Limbs. His Younger Son was Suffocated in a Puddle of Filthy Water; and himself in an extreme Old Age found Guilty of Murther, but sav'd by his Clergy.

Hol. 744.

John Duke of Norfolk,
Sir Robert Brackenbury, Lieutenant of the Tower,
The Lord Ferrars, and Sir Richard Ratcliff, lost their Lives fighting Valiantly for King Richard at Bosworth Battel.
Sir William Branden, and Sir John Cheyney, Signaliz'd themselves in the same Fight, on the Side of the Earl of Richmond.

Of Men of Learning, there were some in the Reign of Richard III.
of Note: As,

John Penketb an Augustine Frier, of Warrington in Lancashire, one of Scotus's Followers; he Preach'd an Infamous Sermon in Favour of King Richard: The same did Dr. Shaw, an Eminent Preacher, Sir Edmund Shaw's Brother, an Alderman of London.
John Kent, or Cailleie, Born in South-Wales, Rhetorician.
George Ripley, a Carmelite Frier of Boston, a Great Mathematician and Poet.
Dr. John Spine, a Carmelite Frier of Bristol, &c.

*R*ICHARD Plantagenet, Duke of Gloucester, and King of England and of France, and Lord of Ireland, the Third of that Name, was the Younger Son of Sir Richard Plantagenet, the (a) fourth Duke of York of that Royal Family, and King of England, designate by King Henry the Sixth, and by the most Noble Senate, and Universal Synod of this Kingdom, the High Court of Parliament. The Mother of this Richard Duke of Gloucester, was the Lady Cecily Daughter of Sir Ralph de Nevill, Earl of Westmorland, by his Wife Joan de Beaufort, the Natural Daughter of John Plantagenet (alias) de Gaunt, Duke of Guiene and Lancaster, King of Castile and Leon, third Son of King Edward the Third; for in that Order of York.

(a) He was not the fourth Duke of that Family. The first was Edmund of Langley. The second was Edward his Son, whose Brother Richard, Earl of Cambridge, was Beheaded for Treason before Duke Edward dy'd. He left this Richard, who cou'd not be the fourth Duke of York, his Father having never born that Title; But his Uncle Edward being Slain at the Battel of Agincourt, and dying without Issue, King Henry the VIth. created this Richard Duke of York: so he was the third Duke of that Title of this Family.

this Duke is best accounted, because William of Hatfield, the second Son of King Edward the Third died in his Infancy, and this Duke of York and King designate, was propagated from two younger Sons of the same King Edward the Third, whereby he had both Paternal and Maternal Title to the Crown of England and France: But his better and nearer Title was the Maternal Title, or that which came to him by his Mother the Lady Anne de Mortimer, the Daughter and Heir of Philippa Plantagenet, who was the sole Daughter and Heir of Lyonel Plantagenet Duke of Clarence, and second Son (b) of King Edward the Third, according to the Account and Order afore said.

The Lineage of Edm. III.

And this Lady Philippa was the Wife of Sir Edmond de Mortimer, the great and famous Earl of March, and that Duke Richard, King designate, by his Father Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York (Sirnam'd also de Coningsborough) issued directly and in a Masculine Line from Edmond Plantagenet, alias de Langley, the first Duke of York, and the fifth Son of King Edward the Third; who was the most renowned and glorious Progenitor to those Princes of York and Lancaster, and the first King in a Lineal Descent from that great Henry Sirnam'd Plantagenet, famous for his great Prowess and many Victories, King of England in the Right of his Mother the Empress Matilda or Maud, Daughter and Heir of King Henry the First, and still'd Anglorum Domina, sometime Wife of the Emperor Henry the Fifth, by which he was also Sirnam'd Filius Imperatricis: The French men call'd him Henry du Court Manteau, or Court Mantle, because he wore a Cloak shorter than the Fashion was in those Times. By his Father Galfrido, or Geoffry Plantagenet, he was Earl or Duke of Anjou (for then Dux & Comes, and Ducatus & Comitatus, were Synonymies and Promiscuous words) he was also Earl of Maine, of Torraine, and Hereditary Seneschal, or High Steward of France, and by his Marriage of Eliaenor Queen of France Repudiate, Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Gascoigne and of Guiene, and Earl of Poitou, he was Duke and Earl of those Principalities and Signiories; also by the Empress his Mother Duke of Normandy: He was Lord of Ireland by Conquest, and confirm'd by Pope Adrian. But these were not all his Seigniories and Dominions; for after he was King of England, he extended his Empire and Principate in the South to the Pyrenean Mountains, (The Confines of Spain and France) in the North to the Isles of Orkney, and in the East and West with the Ocean, as Giraldus Cambrensis, Gul. Neubrigenfis, & Joannes Sarisburiensis, grave and credible Authors affirm, who stiled him, Regum Britannia maximus; and doubtless he was the greatest King of Britain since King Arthur.

† Or Nickname.

But it is controverted amongst the Antiquaries and Heralds, which Earl of Anjou first bare the Sirname and † Sobriquet of Plantagenet, or Plantagenet after the vulgar Orthodox, by what occasion, and from what cause it was taken and born, and from what Time and Age it had beginning: Some would have the forenamed Geoffry Plantagenet, Father of this Henry, the first Earl of Anjou, which bare it. But we shall find stronger Reasons to derive it from a much more ancient Earl of Anjou, and better Causes than can be found in him, if we step but a little back to their Stories, and compare the Men and their Times. Geoffry Plantagenet being a Man of a Gallant and Active Fire, dispos'd to the Courts of Princes, to Jufts, Turnaments, &c. and to the Courtship of fair Ladies those of the Highest Rank, and had so Amorous a Star, That Philippe le Grosse, King of France, suspected him for too familiar Commerce with his Bed. But it was of better Influence when he atchieved and married the Empress Matilda, by which we may very well calculate, he neither had nor would be intent or at leisure for such a mortified and perilous Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. But if we would know the Man, let us look upon the first Fulke, Earl of Anjou, who liv'd about an Hundred Years before the Norman Conquest of Eng- land, and was Son of Godefray, or Geoffry Grifegonell the first Earl of Anjou (according to du Hail- lon) Ancestor and Progenitor to the foresaid Geoffry Plantagenet, some seven or eight Degrees in the ascending Line, as Paradin accounteth, a Man raised upon the Foundation of a great Courage and Strength (two of the best Principles when they have good Seconds, and make too a glorious Man, where they serve his Virtues, not Affections, as in this Prince they did) whose Disposition on the other side being let out into as vast an Ambition and Covetousness, ne'er look'd upon the Unlawfulness of his Desires, how horrid soever (which amongst the many rest) run him upon the shelves of wilful Perjury and Murder; the one for defrauding and spoiling a Church of certain Rights, and the other for contriving the Tragedy of his young Nephew, Drogo, Earl of Brittain, to make himself Lord of his Country and Principality. The secret Check and Scourge of those Crimes had a long time to work upon his Conscience, and of a great Sinner made a great Penitent; being Old and having much solitary Time and many heavy Thoughts (which naturally attend Old Age, and suggest better Considerations of our former and youthful Sins) he opens the Horror of them, and his afflicted Mind to his Confessor, (as great Constantine to Aegyptus) who enjoyn'd him to make the same Confession before the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem; which Pilgrimage the Earl perform'd in all lowly and contemptible manner, passing as a Private and Unworthy Person, without Train or Followers, save two of his meanest (which he took rather for Witnesses than) Servants, whose Service was, when they came near Jerusalem, the one with a Cord (such as is us'd for the Strangling of Criminals) thrown about his Master's Neck, to draw or lead him to the Holy Sepulcher, whilst the other did accostre and strip him as a condemn'd Person, and with extremity Scourge him until he was prostrate before the Sacred Monument, where he gave Evidence of his unfeign'd Contrition and Sorrow. Amongst other devout Expressions, uttering this, Mon dieu & Seigneur recoy a Pardon le perjure & homicide & miserable Foulque; And after this Pilgrimage he liv'd many Years of Prosperity in his Country, honoured of all Men. To justify this, there be many Examples of other Princes and Noble Persons, who liv'd about the Year of our Lord One Thousand, and somewhat before, and in Three or Four Ages after, who underwent the like Pilgrimages imposed under Base and Mechanick Nick-names and Persons, as of a Carpenter, a Smith, a Fisherman, a Mariner, a Shepheard, a Wood-man, a Broom-man, &c. In my Inquiry after that of Plantagenet, I met with an Ancient Manuscript, that afforded me a large Plantagenest, the Plant or Stalk of a Broom.

And, under the Name and Habit of a Broom-man, our Pilgrim perform'd this Penance, and took the Sobriquet of Plantagenest from wearing a Stalk of Broom, or Plant of Genest; this is generally receiv'd, but the Time and Reason neither set down nor rendred by any of our Heralds and Antiquaries, French or English; for the time when he performed this, I observe 'twas about the Year of our Lord One Thousand certainly. But for the particular Reason this Count had to chuse the Genest Plant, or Broom-stalk, before any other Vigetable or Thing, I shall lay down that Opinion which is my own, noting for a Circumstance by the way, that the Broom in Hieroglyphical Learning is the Symbol of Humility; and the Poets, particularly Virgil the best of Poets, gives it the Epithet of humilis, humilis Genista; and the Etymologists derive it from Genu the Knee, the Part most apply'd, and as it were dedicate to the chief Act of Reverence, Kneeling; to which the Natural Philosophers say, there is so Mutual a Correspondency, and so Natural a Sympathy between Genu and Genista, that of all other Plants or Vegetables, it is most comfortable and Medicinable to the Pains and Diseases of the Knees. Pliny a great Master amongst them saith, Genista tusca, cum, &c. Genua dolentia 24. cap. 9. sanat.

Leon. Eufebius.

Plin. lib. 24. cap. 9. sanat.

Strabo, lib. 16.

Du Hailon.

But the most considerable Reason is, as I conceive it, from the use he was constrain'd to make of the Twigs of Broom when he came to be scourged at Jerusalem, the Place necessitating the use of them to that purpose, being (as Strabo relates) a Stony, Sandy and Barren Soil, only natural and grateful to the Genest, as the Watry and Moist to the Birch, Willow and Withy, of which there could be none there for that reason. And from hence it must most conjecturally take the beginning of that Honour, which afterward his Princely and Noble Posterities continued for their Sirname, who became Dukes and Princes in sundry places, and some of them Kings of England, France, Scotland, and Ireland; and (as the People of that Age verily believ'd by their observation) were the more Prosperous and Happy for his sake.

For the continuance of the Name, some (who pretend to see further and better in the Dark than others as clear sighted) would have it taken of late time, and not used by the Kings and Princes of England, of the Angeume Race. But there are many Proofs to be adduced against them: Let us look into Mr. Brook's Genealogies of England, we shall find nothing more obvious and frequent in the Deductions of those Princes of the House of Anjou, than the Addition and Sirname of Plantagenet; Edm. Plantagenet, Geo. Plantagenet, John Plantagenet, Edw. Plantagenet, Lyonell Plantagenet, Humphrey Plantagenet, &c. In the French Historians and Antiquaries, Ion de Tillet, Girard du Haillon, Claude Paradin, & lean Baron de la Hay, we shall often meet with Geoffry Plantagenet, Arthur Plantagenet, Richard Plantagenet, and diverse the like, all of the first Age, when the Angeume Princes first became English, and some before. Mr. Cambden also in his Immortal Britannia, mentioneth some very ancient; as Richard Plantagenet, John Plantagenet, &c. And witnesseth, that the forenamed Geoffry Plantagenet used to wear a Broom-stalk in his Bonnet, as many Nobles of the House of Anjou did, and took it for their chief Sirname. It might be added, that these Earls of Anjou were descended out of the Great House of Saxony in Germany, which hath brought forth many Kings, Emperors and Dukes; and that they were of Kindred and Alliance to the ancient Kings of France, and sundry other Princes. But I will close here for the High Nobility of King Richard, as the good old Poet did for another Heroical Person, and come to the other Matters of his Private Story; And first for his Birth and Native Place, which was in the Castle of Fosbringay, or as some write, the Castle of Birkhamstead, both Castles and Honours of the Duke his Father, about the Year of our Lord 1450, which I discover by the Calculation of the Birth, Reign, and Death of King Edward his Brother, who was Born about 1441, or 1442, and Reigned Two and Twenty Years, Died at the Age of One and Forty, Anno 1483. The Dutcheff of York, their Mother, had Five Children betwixt them, so that Richard could not be less than Seven or Eight Years younger than King Edward, and he surviv'd him not fully Three Years.

This Richard Plantagenet, and the other Children of Richard Duke of York, were Brought up in Yorkshire and Northamptonshire, but lived for the most part in the Castle of Midelham in Yorkshire, until the Duke their Father, and his Son Edmund Plantagenet Earl of Rutland, were Slain in the Battel of Wakefield, Ann. (c) Dom. 1461, upon which the Dutcheff of York, their Mother, (having cause to fear the Faction of Lancaster, which was now grown very exulting and strong, and of a Mortal Enmity to the House of York) secretly convey'd her Two younger Sons, George and Richard Plantagenet (who was then about some Ten Years old) into the Low-Countries, to their Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheff of Burgundy, Wife of Charles Duke of Burgundy and Brabant and Earl of Flanders. They continued at Utrich, the Chief City then in Holland, where they had Princely and Liberal Education, until Edward Earl of March their Eldest Brother had reveng'd his Father's Death, and taken the Kingdom and Crown (as his Right) from Henry VI.

(c) He was Slain the 30th of December, 1460, as by Thius History of Froissart is to be seen in Hollinshead, pag. 108c.

when he call'd Home his Two Brothers, and enters them into the Practice of Arms, to season their Forwardness, and Honour of Knighthood, which he had bestow'd upon them; and soon after invests George in the Duchy of Clarence and Earldom of Richmond, which Earldom he the rather bestow'd upon him, to darken the young Earl of Richmond Henry Tudor. Richard had the Dukedom of Gloucester and Earldom of Carlisle, as I have read in an old Manuscript Story, which Creation the Heralds don't allow: But whether he was Comes thereof after the ancient Roman understanding, that is Governour; or Comes, or Count, after the common taking it by us English, or others, that is, for a special Titular Lord, I will not take upon me to determine, but affirm I have read him Comes Carliolensis.

And after the Great Earl of Warwick and Salisbury, Richard de Neville, was reconciled to the King's Favour, (d) George Duke of Clarence was married to the Lady Isabel, or Elizabeth, the Elder Daughter of that Earl, and Richard Duke of Gloucester to the Lady Anne; which Ladies, by their Mother the Lady Anne de Beauchamp, Daughter and Heir of Sir Richard de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, were Heirs of that Earldom. But Anne, altho' the younger Sister, was the better Woman, having been a little before married to Edward Plantagenet Prince of Wales and Duke of Cornwall, only Son of King Henry the Sixth, and was now his Princess and Dowager, by whom Duke Richard had a Son call'd Edward, created Prince of Wales when his Father came to the Crown.

The Employment of this Duke was for the most part in the North, as the Country of his Birth, so more naturally affected by him; according to the Poet:

— Natale solum dulcedine cunctos Mulcet. Ovid.
Sooth'd with Sweet Charms, all love their Native Soil.

And there lay his Appanage and Patrimony, with a Great Estate of the Dutches's Wife, of which the Seignior of Penrith, vulg'd Perith, in Cumberland was part, where he much resided, and Built or Repair'd most of the Castles, all that Northern Side generally honouring and affecting his Deportment, being Magnificent (to apply Sir Thomas Moore) something above his Ability, which he express'd most in his Hospitality. And surely, if Men are taken to the life best from their Actions, we shall find him in the Circle of a Character (not so commaculate and mix'd, as Passionate and Purblind Pens have dash'd it) whilst we squint not at those Virtues in him, which make up other Princes absolute: His Wisdom and Courage had not then their Nicknames and Calumny as now, but drew the Eyes and Acknowledgment of the whole Kingdom towards him; and his Brother had a sound Experience of his Fidelity and Constancy in divers Hazardous Congresses and Battels, through which he had faithfully follow'd his Fortune, and return'd all his Undertakings successful: As

at Barnet, where he entred so far and boldly into the Enemies Army, that Two of his Esquires, Thomas Parr and John Milwater being nearest to him were slain; yet by his own Valour he quit himself, and put most part of the Enemies to flight, the rest to the Sword. With the like Valour he behaved himself at the Battel of Exon, Doncaster, St. Albans, Blore-beath, Northampton, Mortimer's Cross, and Tewkesbury. And it was then confest a very considerable Service to the State, his taking of the Famous Pirate Thomas Nevill, alias Faulconbridge, Earl of Kent, (e) with whom comply'd Sir Richard de Nevill Earl of Warwick, a near Kinsman to the Earl of Kent his Natural Father, which held him up in the better Esteem, and whetted him to any Attempt. For this hanghty Earl, who had drawn him from the House of York (to which he had done Valiant Service not long before) to the Party of Henry the Sixth and his Lancastrian Faction; and fearing what Forces and Aid King Edward might have from beyond Sea, provides a warlike Fleet for the Narrow Seas, of which this Faulconbridge was appointed Admiral, with Commission to Take or Sink all Ships he met, either of the King's Friends or Subjects, who did not underact it, but made many Depredations on the Coasts, and put many to the Sword becoming an Enemy the more considerable, King Edward finding (as the Case stood then with him) his Attempts by Sea would be of too weak a proof to surprise him, which the Duke of Gloucester contrived by an Advertisement he had of his private stealth into several of the Parts, sometimes where he had recourse to some Abettors of that Faction, and coming to Shore at Southampton, by a ready Ambush seiz'd and apprehended him, from whence he was convey'd to London, so to Middleham Castle, and after he had told some Tales, put to Death (f). And while he continued in the Northern Parts, he Govern'd those Countries with great Wisdom and Justice; preserving the Concord and Amity between the Scots and English, tho' the Breaches were not to be made up with any Strength and Continuance, the Borders living out of the Mutual Spoils and Common Rapines, ever prompt for any Cause that might beget Brauls and Feuds. And in the last Year of the Reign of the King his Brother, the Quarrels grew so outrageous and hostile, that nothing could compose them, but the Sword and Open War, arising from an unjust detaining the Tribute, as Polidore writeth.

King Edward took it very ill at the Hands of James IV. King of Scotland, that he refused to pay the Tribute whereunto he was bound by Covenant; and therefore resolv'd by Arms to compel him to it: But King Edward being distracted with a Jealous Care and Watching of France, neglected that Business of Scotland, and in the mean time Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother to King James, pretending earnest Business in France, makes England in his way, and instigates King Edward to put on Arms against his Brother, promising to return shortly out of France, and raise a Power in Scotland for his Aid: Here-

(d) This is so erroneous, that the Earl of Warwick was at Open Variance with the King, and had prevailed on the Duke of Clarence, who was Poor, by Offers of this Match to forsake King Edward's Interest, and joyn with the Earl against his own Brother; upon which the Duke went over with him to Calais, married his Daughter, returned with him to England and expell'd his Brother the Kingdom. Habington's Edward IV. p. 48.

(e) This Thomas was never Earl of Kent, but Bastard Son of William Nevill Earl of Kent, who was Lord Faulconbridge before King Edw. IV. created him Earl of Kent.

(f) This Story is told quite another way by Habington. Faulconbridge came to London with his Forces, Attacked the City, was forc'd to retire, got into Sandwich with 900 Men, fortify'd the Town, and yielded it at last on Terms of Pardon, brought by this Duke of Gloucester, which were violated, and Nevill being apprehended at Southampton, was Executed, tho' he pleaded That his Name was particularly insert'd in the Sandwich Pardon. The Duke of Gloucester did not apprehend him. Hab. 109.

1482. upon the King resolv'd it, and sent the Duke of Gloucester with a good Army into Scotland, who march'd Master of the Field near to Berwick, having a little before sent Sir Thomas Stanley to Besiege it, and soon after took it himself. But the Duke of Albany failed him, and had underhand struck up a Peace with his Brother of Scotland; yet Richard of Gloucester accomplish'd the Expedition very honourably and happily: Thus Polidore.

Anno 2.
Edw. 4.

But to Enlarge what he reporteth desertively, and abridgeth; King Edward, notwithstanding that Negligence (noted by him) levied Strong Forces (the King of Scotland being as vigilant in that Business) and made the Duke of Gloucester his General, under whom went Sir Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Stanley, after Earl of Derby, the Lord Lovell, the Lord Grey of Groby, the Lord Scroope of Bolton, the Lord Fitzbugh, Sir William Parr of Rose, a Noble and Valiant Gentleman, Father of the Lord Parr of Rose, Kendal, and Fitzbugh, and Grandfather to Sir William Parr Earl of Essex and Marquess of Northampton, Sir Edward Woodville Lord Rivers Brother to the Queen Elizabeth, with many other of Eminency and Noble Quality.

Chron.
Croy.

The Duke march'd first with his Army to the Borders and Frontiers of Scotland, giving the Overthrow to such as resisted; then made up to the Strong Town of Berwick, which at that Instant the King of Scotland possess'd by the Surrender of Henry VI. and had the like Success with those Troops of the Enemies he met and found about the Town. After a short Siege, the Besieged upon Summons and Parley, finding themselves too weak to make good the Opposition, were easily perswaded to be quiet, and safely rendring the Town and Castle upon very slender Conditions, as is recorded in the Chronicle of Croyland. Having placed a Governour and Garrison in the Town, he continued his March towards Edenborough, with a Purpose to Besiege and Sack it, but was met in the Half way by Ambassadors from thence, who, after a Favourable Audience and Access craved, in the Name of their King and Nation implore a League, or at least a Truce between the Kingdoms, offering so Fair Conditions for it, that the General, after a Deliberate Consultation, granted to Suspend or Intermit all Hostile Proceedings, with a Fair Entertainment to their Persons, and a Publick Edict throughout the Army, That no English should offer any Violence or Offence to any Scot or their Goods; and by this Provident Truce, that Ruddy Storm, which seem'd terrible to impend, was diverted and made a Calm Preface to the Famous League, afterwards concluded by him when he was King and James the Fourth of Scotland. But whilst these Employments staid him there, News arriv'd of King Edward's Death, and was mutter'd very doubtfully by some who had confidence and ground to suppose it hasten'd by Treachery. The Nobles at London, and in the South Parts speedily call the Duke Home by their Private Letters and Free Approbation, to assume the Protection of the Kingdom, and Two Princes committed unto him by the King. Rex Edwardus IV. Filios suos Richardo Duci Glocestrie, in tutelam moriens tradidit: as Polidore testifieth.

The Duke
of Gloucester
made Ld.
Protector.

The Army and Affairs of those Parts dispos'd, he came to York, where he made a few Days stay to pay some Religious Offices and Ceremonies to the Manes and Exequies of the Deceased King, so hasten'd to London, having in his Train (besides his own ordinary Retinue) Six Hundred Voluntary Gentlemen of the North Parts, brave Horsemen and gallantly mounted; upon the Way he dispatch'd certain Segual Messengers to the Young King (who was then at Ludlow-Castle in Wales) to provide for his Honourable Conduct to London, where he arriv'd not long after the Lord Protector, and was Magnificently Receiv'd and Lodg'd at the Bishop's Palace: His Brother the Duke of York was then with the Queen Mother in the Palace at Westminster, who out of a pretended Motherly Care (rather indeed her Policy) would not let him stir from her to see the King, who had desired his Company, but instantly takes Sanctuary with him in the Abbey. The Lord Protector solicites her by some Noblemen to send or bring him to the King; which she peremptorily stood against, until Cardinal Bourchier Archbishop of Canterbury was made the Messenger; who so gravely and effectually perswaded with her, that she delivered him the Duke: After some Days respite in London-House, the King, according to Ancient Custom, was to remove Court to the Tower of London, the Castle Royal and Chief House of Safety in the Kingdom, until the more weighty Affairs of the State, and such Troubles (if any hapen'd) as often intercedes the alterations of Reigns, were well dispatch'd and compos'd (some threatening Evils of that kind being discover'd and extinguish'd before the Protector came to London); and until all things proper to his Coronation were in Preparation and Readiness, the Lord Protector still being near unto him with all Duty and Care, and did him Homage, as Honourable Philippe de Comines, le Duc de Gloucester avoit fait homage à son Neveu Comme à son Roy & souverain Seigneur; but this Testimony, being avouch'd by one who loved not the Protector, may leave more credit; who says, When the Young King approach'd towards London, the Lord Protector, his Uncle, rode bare-headed before him; and in passing along, said with a Loud Voice to the People, Behold your Prince and Sovereign; to which the Prior of Croyland, who lived in those Days, reporteth Richardus, Protector nihil reverentie, quod capite nudato, genua flexo aliove quolibet corporis habitu in subdito exegit, Regi Nepoti suo facere disulit aut recusavit: And why should these Services and his Constancy be judg'd less real to the Son than to the Father, his Care and Providence looking pregnantly through all Turns that concern'd him and his State; and therefore timely removed such of Danger as were vehemently suspected for their Ambition and Insolent Assuming Power and Authority not proper to them, and so stood Ill Affected to their Prince, and Turbulent Maligners of the Government. And thus his Strict Justice to some, begat the Envy of others, as it fell out in the time of King Edward, between those of the Blood Royal (with whom the ancient Barons sided) and the Regnists, who being stubborn, haughty, and incompatible of the others Nearness to the King, stir'd up Competitions and Turbulencies among the Nobles, and became so insolent and publick in their Pride and Outrages towards the People, that they forc'd their Murmurs at length to bring forth Mutiny against them: But finding the King's Inclination gentle on that side, they so temper'd it, as they durst extend their Malice to the Prince of the Blood and Chief Nobility; many times by Slanders and False Suggestions, privately incensing the King against them, who suffer'd their Insinuations too far, whilst his Credulity stood abused, and his Fa-

1483. your often alienated from those, whose Innocence could understand no cause for it. The Engines of those Intrusions and Supplantations were the Greys, the Woodvills, and their Kinsmen, who held a Strong Belief, to have better'd their Power with the Young King their Kinsman, and then they might have acted their Rodomontades and Injuries in a higher strain, remov'd the Prince of the Blood, and set up what Limits they pleas'd to their Faction and Power during the Minority of the King, and after too, whilst the Queen Mother could Usurp or hold any Superintendency upon the Sovereignty, or her Son. These things, and the Mischiefs that seem'd to superimpend the State, equally pois'd and consulted by the Lord Protector, and others of the Principal Nobility, it was resolv'd, to give a timely Remedy or Period to them; all which Sir Thomas Moor acknowledgeth, and confesseth the Nobles of the Kingdom had reason to suspect and fear the Queen's Kindred would put their Power more forward when their Kinsman came to be King, than in his Father's time, altho' then their Insolencies were intolerable. And this Author further acknowledgeth, there had been a long Grudge and Heart-burning between the King and Queen's Kindred in the time of K. Edward; which the King, altho' he were partial for the Queen's Faction, was earnest to reconcile, but could not: And after he was dead, the Lord Grey, Marquess Dorset, the Lord Richard Grey, and the Lord Rivers, made full account to sway the Young King: and having learn'd it was best Fishing in a Troubled Stream, threw all occasions of Dissentions amongst the Great Men of this Kingdom, that so, whilst the other Nobles were busie in their own Quarrels, they might take an opportunity to Assault and Supplant where they hated. And for provision towards the Design, the Marquess had secretly gain'd a Great quantity of the King's Treasure out of the Tower, and the Woodvills made Good Preparations of Arms; of which, some were met with by the Way, as they were convey'd close pack'd in Carts. It was therefore high time for the Protector and Ancient Nobility to look circumspectly about them, and fasten on all occasions that might prevent such growing Treacheries, which could be no way but by taking off their Heads. Which being resolv'd, the Marquess of Dorset, the Lord Richard Grey their Uncle, Sir Anthony Woodville Lord Rivers, and some other of that Kindred and Faction were Apprehended, and at Pomfret Executed: (only the Marquess, by some Private Notice given him, fled and took Sanctuary). At the same time the Lord Hastings (who much favour'd the Queen and her Party, especially the Marquess, therefore the more to be suspected dangerous) was Arrested for High Treason, and in the Tower upon the Green had his Head chopt off; an Act of more strange and severe Appearance than the other, having the esteem of a Good Subject, and generally suppos'd much Affectionate to the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham. And Sir Thomas Moor reporteth, that the Protector was most unwilling to have lost him, but that he saw him joyning with their Enemies, and so his life had ill requited Them and their Purpose: this was a Dilemma; but what that Purpose was, and what they had in Agitation at that instant, is not directly said, only from other places of the Story. And those which follow Sir Thomas Moor, it may be conceiv'd, they doubted him for his Affectation of the Sovereignty, and some Practice against the King and his Brother, for those be the Charges they press upon him, altho' 'tis neither Said nor Made Good by any Direct and Just Proof. But admit he was now grown Jealous of him, and sent Sir William Catesby, a Man in great credit with the Lord Hastings, to sound what Opinion he held of that Title and Claim he might lay to the Crown, who (presuming upon Catesby's Gratitude and Trust that had been advanced by him) without Circumstance, and even with Indignation express'd an utter Mislike thereof, and engag'd Himself, his Uttermost Power and Ability against it, peremptorily adding, "He had rather see the Death and Destruction of the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, than the Young King depriv'd of the Crown: Which Reply, Catesby (being more just to his Employment than honour to his Point) returns the Protector, who laid hold upon the next Occasion to seize his Head, which is the greatest and bloodiest Crime that brings any Proof against him; and yet not so clear, but that there may be some other State Mystery or Fraud suspected in it. Let us leave it upon that account, and but consider how much more we forgive the Fames of H. I. E. III. H. IV. E. IV. H. VII. because they had their Happy Stars and Success; and then, Prosperum scelus virtus vocatur, there is Applause goes with the Act and Actor. Julius Caesar, was, and ever will be reputed a Wise and a Great Captain, altho' his Emulation cost an infinite quantity of Excellent Humane Blood, and his Nephew Oct. Augustus never ceas'd Proscribing Banishing and Massacring, until he had dispatch'd all his Proud Emulators: Julius Caesar thought it, Crimen sacrum vel crimen Regale; or, Crimen sacrum Ambitio: Whose Rule was,

*Si violandum est jus, regnandi gratia
Violandum est, aliis rebus pietatem colas.*

If Right for ought may e'er be violate,
It must be only for a Sovereign State.

Drawing it from that Rule (tho' Apoorypha) in Euripides,

Κάλλιστον ἀδικεῖν τ' ἀλλὰ δ' εὐσεβεῖν χρεῖαν.

*Eurip. in

Si injuste agere oportet, pro tyrannide (aut Regno) pulcherrimum est injuste agere, in altis pietatem colere expedit.

And Antonius Caracalla, alledged the Text to justify the Killing of his Brother Geta his Colleague in the Empire. Polynices, the Brother of Eteocles, was of the same Religion, and said, A Kingdom could not be bought at too high a Rate, put in Friends, Kindred, Wife and Riches: Via Axiom Po- ad potentiam est tollere Emulos & premere Adversa- lites, which the great Master of Axioms allowed, hath been countenanced by many great Examples of State-reason, and Policy in all times, even since the Ogygian Age. For an old Observation, and general in all foreign Countries saith,

Regnum furto
Et fraude ademptum antiquum est specimen imperii. Senec. in Trag.

By Fraud or Theft to seize a Crown,
Is the old Game, long since to Princes known.

So King Atrous, by his own Experience could say;

— Ut

1483.

*Ut nemo doceat fraudis & sceleris
viam, Regnum docebit.*

Dominion teaches every Wicked Art.

Artes im-perii.

But what those Ages call'd Valour, Wisdom and Policy, in those great Scholars of State, who with Credit practis'd their Artes Imperii, and Rules of Empire, comes not under the License or Warrant of our Christian Times; yet we may speak thus much for Richard (to those who cry him so deep an Homicide) that he had either more Conscience or less Cruelty than they attribute to him, that by the same Act of Power could not secure himself of others he had as just cause to fear; especially Jasper Earl of Pembroke, his Nephew Richmond, and the subtle Doctor Morton, who was extremely his Enemy, and the Chief Instrument that secretly mov'd against him. And altho' the King had no certain notice which way his Engins wrought, yet he knew enough to suspect him for, and to remove him from the Council-table unto the Custody of the Duke of Buckingham, the Man he had reason to suppose nearest to his Trust, though his Expectation leaned on a broken Reed there; for the Duke was now secretly in his Heart defected from the King, and become Male-content: Morton but touch'd his Pulse, and knew how the Distemper lay, which he irritated into such Sparklings as gave him Notice where his Constitution was most apt and prepared, yea, so subtly mastered it, that he had leave to steal from Brecknock Castle to Ely, so for good store of Coin found safe passage into France whither his desires vehemently carried him, in hope to fashion the Earl of Richmond to his Plot; and under pretence of a Lancastrian Title, to stir him to take up Arms and invade England, with the Assurance of many mighty Friends here, which would make the Design of an easie and quick dispatch; nor forgot he how much Artificial and Eloquent Perswasions add to the Blaze of Ambition, knowing the Earl's Temper like other Mens in that, and observing him with a kind of pleasure listen, he gave such a studied gloss and superlatation to the Text, that the Earl was now so full of Encouragement and Hope for the Invasion, that their purposes spread as well into England as in France. The Protector having also certain Intelligence of some particular Designs dispos'd himself in his Actions more closely, and knew what Friends and Confederates had engag'd themselves to Richmond, who yet kept a Face of Love and Fidelity towards him, as did the Duke of Buckingham and the Countess of Richmond, who appear'd in this Instant an earnest Suitor to reconcile her Son into favour; and that the King would be pleas'd to bestow on him any of King Edward the Fourth's Daughters. But this took not the Vigilancy of his Eye from him and his Party, the Cause being of Greater Danger and Apprehension now, than in King Edward's time; for the Earl had drawn unto him many of the English Nobility and Gentry; and some Foreign Princes had in favour to him promis'd their Aids. But in the time of King Edward, his Title and He was so little understood by his Blood of Lancaster, and the better judging-sort of the English Nobility and Gentry, King Lewis the Eleventh of France, Francis the Second Duke of Brittain, and other Foreign Princes look'd very slightly upon it. And yet, as John Harding observ'd, the King might be Jealous of him, being given out for an Heir of the House of Lancaster, and Nephew to Henry the Sixth: With this he consider'd, that some Foreign Princes stood not well-affected to him; or that some at home, envying his House and Posterity, would catch at any Spark to trouble his Peace and kindle a Sedition; therefore he had good reason to think, that as his Liberty might make these Beginnings more popular, so their Ends more dangerous and ingrateful (the Vulgar tasting all things by the Ear, and judging by the Noise) which he sought early to prevent.

For Philip Comines reports, When he first came to know this Earl, he was then a Prisoner in Brittain, and told him, He had been either in Prison, or under Strict Command from Five Years old, which is not unlikely; for I find him but young when he was committed to the Custody of Sir William Herbert, Lord of Rayland-Castle in Monmouthshire, where he continued not long; for Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who was Uncle unto him (being then in France, whither he had fled after the Overthrow of the Lancastrians at Tewksbury) (as John Stow) having advertisement that his Nephew was under Sir William Herbert's Custody, with whom he had Alliance and Friendship, came secretly out of France into Wales, and at Rayland-Castle found only the Lady Herbert, her Husband being with the King; in whose Absence, the Earl practis'd so cunningly with her, that he got his Nephew from thence, and convey'd him to his own Castle of Pembroke, (the Young Earl's Native Place) presuming upon the Strength of it, and the Peoples Affection, but over-wean'd in his Opinion and Hope: For so soon as the King receiv'd notice of the Escape, Sir William Herbert was commanded to levy his Forces and make towards them, a Man of a Wise and Valiant Disposition, descended from Herbertus, who was Chamberlain and Treasurer of the Kings, William Rufus and Henry Beaulerk, and was created Earl of Pembroke afterward: From this Noble Herbertus are descended the Herberts, Earls of Pembroke and Montgomery, and many other Welsh Gentlemen of that Sirname and Family.

The Two Earls being inform'd of his Approaches and Strength, distrusting their own, fled by Night, and posted to the Port of Timby, where they kept close until a fit Opportunity offer'd them Transportation for France, intending to see the Court there, where the Earl of Pembroke had not long before receiv'd a very favourable Entertainment. But a violent Storm diverted their Course, and run them upon the Coasts of Little Brittain, which fell out as a Sad Disaster, and Cross to them and their Design for a long time after, the Duke of Brittain being no Friend to it; but at the Port of St. Maloes they must Land. What Success they met with in this Flight (and other Noble Englishmen which follow'd the Unlucky Party of Henry VI. being constrain'd when he was overthrown by Edward IV. to fly) will fall into our Discourse hereafter: There is this Memorial in the Stories of Brittain.

Whilst these Ears made some stay in St. Maloes to refresh themselves, Francis the Second Duke of Brittain had notice of their Landing, who sent as speedily a Command to the Governour to Arrest them both into Safe Custody; an Act, as it appear'd, both strange and injurious, being Subjects to a Prince with whom the Duke had League. But for a better Gloss, he had found a considerable

The last D. of Britain, who was Earl of Richmond, and possessed of the Earldom, was John de Montfort, who flourished Anno Dom. 1400. and had Sons, but not Earls of Richmond, as Robert Glouc. writeth, and now this Francis I. renew'd the Claim which was about 30 Years after John de Montfort Duke of Britain. And Jean Froissard calls it, Prison Courtoise; for the Duke had well considered what Expectation and Use he might raise by them, and knew the News could not be distasteful to the King of England, whose Throne had been threatned so much by the Earl of Richmond's Liberty; and therefore, from hence he hop'd an answerable Benefit, and to contract the King in a Firm Amity and Acknowledgment unto him; nay, which is further, (if we may believe Jac. Nyerus) he thought by this occasion to bear the Reins so hard upon King Edward, as that he should not dare to make any Breach with him, propter Henricum Richmondiae Comitum non audebat Anglus ab amicitia Britanni discedere.

King Edward treateth for the delivery of Richmond.

Ennius apud Cic. in Offic.

King Edward IV. sends for Richmond.

And doubtless in his Heart he was favourable to any Chance that might have Ruin'd or Infested England, and could have wish'd the Earl of Richmond and his Title under his Protection. King Edward seasonably prevented this, that such Attempts, tho' at first they appear'd but like the Prophet's Cloud, might not spread after into a Spacious Storm. And to prevent all underhand Contracts with the Duke of Britain, dispatch'd Letters unto him, further interpreted by a Rich Present, and Richer Promises. The Duke receives both with as Honourable Complement, protesting none could be more ready to do the King of England's Commands than he. But where he treated for the Delivery of

1483. the Earls, he hop'd to be lawfully excused, being an Act would cast a Stain and Scandal, not only upon his Credit and Honour, but upon all Princely and Hospitable Privileges; and could appear no less than a mere Impiety, to thrust such distressed Persons as fled to their Protection, into the Arms of their Enemies; and it was his Opinion, if any Malice or Violence should be acted upon them, the Guilt must reflect on him. But that the King might believe he was forward to come as near his Desires, as in honour could be, he engag'd himself to keep so careful and vigilant a Watch upon 'em, that they should have no more Power to Endanger him, than if they were in strict Prison. This being return'd, tho' not agreeable to the King's Hope and Wishes, yet bearing such a Caution of Honour and Wisdom, he remain'd satisfied; and so it paused for the space of Eight Years, (as I conjecture) for the King made this Demand in the Twelfth Year of his Reign, 1472. all which time he was very intent to preserve the League with good Sums of Money and costly Presents. In the Twentieth of his Reign, 1480, he receiv'd Intelligence, that the Earl of Richmond had stir'd up Fresh Embers and New Friends in the French Court to blow them; and that the French King had dealt, by the Solicitation of the Earl of Pembroke, and others, privately to get the Earl of Richmond, and offer'd Great Sums to the Duke of Britain. This gave new Disturbance, and the King must now, by the best means he could, renew his former Sute to the Duke of Britain; for which Employment he intrusts Doctor Stillington Bishop of Bath, his Secretary, a Man of a Wise, Learned and Eloquent Endeavour, of good Acquaintance and Credit with the Duke of Britain, who gave him an Honourable and Respective Entertainment. The Bishop (after he had prepared him by the Earnest of a very Rich Present) tenders the Sum of his Employment, not forgetting what he was now to Act and what to Promise on the King's Part: And (for a more glorious Insinuation) tells him how the King had elected him into the Noble Society of St. George's Order (as the most honourable Intimation he could give of his Love) to qualify all Exceptions too and Jealousies, assures him, the King had no Intent to the Earl of Richmond, but what was answerable to his own Worth, and Quality of the King's Kinsman; having declared a Propensity and Purpose to bestow one of his Daughters upon him. The Duke well mollified and perswaded, deliver'd the Earl by a strong Guard to the Bishop at St. Maloes Port: a Change of much Passion and Amazement to him, whose Sufferings took hold upon the affable Disposition of the Noble Peir de Landois Treasurer to the Duke, who had the Earl in Charge and Conduct, to St. Malo. He urges the Cause from him of his so altered and present Condition, with Protestation of all the Aid he could: The Earl thus fairly and happily provok'd (and perceiving the sparkles of his Sorrow had hapt into a tender Bosom) freely expos'd himself, and with such an overcoming Countenance of Tears and Sighs, fram'd his own Story, and press'd Landois, that it so wrought upon his Temper, he perswaded the Earl to put on clearer hopes, assures him there should some means be found to shift the Tempest; thereupon writes a sad Relation to the Duke, to move his Compassion and Favour, and knowing the Baron Chandais, (a Great Man in credit with him) well affected to the Earl by along and reciprocal Affection, he repair'd to his House near St. Maloe, and prevail'd with him to use his Power

1483. wer with the Duke for returning the Earl; who posted to Vannes, where the Court was then, and took the Duke at such an Advantage, by suggesting his Credulity abused, and cunningly drawn into this Contract by the King, that there was a Post dispatch'd to stay the Earl. In that interim, Landois had not been idle, to find a way to let the Earl Escape into the Abby Church of St. Malo, where he claim'd the Benefit of the Holy Asyle, which was easily contriv'd, by Corrupting his Keepers. But the Duke to stand clear of the King's Suspicion, sent over Maurice Brumell to satisfy him, that the Earl according to promise was sent to St. Malo, there deliver'd to his Servants deputed, whose negligence let him escape; and that he had demanded him of the Convent, who deny'd to render him without Security and Caution; and that he should be continued a Prisoner in Vannes with as much Courtesy as formerly. Now being it was fall'n into those Strict and Peremptory Terms, and within the Contumacy of such Lawless Persons, where he could not use Power, he yet faithfully protested no suit from the French King, or any other, should draw him from his former Promise: All which he religiously perform'd, whilst King Edward liv'd, the space of Twelve Years, (after Philip de Comines) in which circle of time, it may with admiration be observ'd, thro' what Changes and Interchanges of Hazards, Dangers and Difficulties he was preserv'd. Soon after King Edward's Decease, King Richard renew'd and continu'd the Treaty by Sir Thomas Hutton of Yorkshire, receiving the same Satisfaction in answer, but was fail'd in the performance, and so dishonourably, that it then appear'd the Duke had kept in with Edward, more for Fear than for Love or Honour (the Name of Edward and the Earl of March, being, indeed, accounted terrible, where his Victorious Sword was drawn) which Breach of the Duke was not left unpunish'd (at least as that Age then guess'd) by a Divine Revenge; for having married Margaret, Daughter and Co-heir of Francis I. Duke of Mountford Duke of Brittain, she dying without Issue, he married Margaret Daughter of Gaston de Foix King of Navarre, by whom he had One Daughter Anne, married to the French King Charles VIII. Thus Duke Francis died without Issue Male, and the Dutchy being swallow'd up and drown'd in the Lillies or Crapands of France, and with his Family of Brittain irrecoverably lost and absorbed. Thus much for the Jealousie and Fears of these Two Kings †.

But

† The Style, Condition and Authority of Duke Richard, while he was only Protector, and his acknowledged Obedience to his Nephew King Edward V. will appear by this Letter taken out of the Original Journal Book. And the formal Manner of his taking the Kingdom from his said Nephew, will be plainly seen by some Instructions given to certain Commissioners sent to the Lord Dynham Lord Deputy of Calais, from the same Journal. The Duke's Letter was as followeth.

The Instructions are as follow.

These be the Articles of Instructions given to the L. Mounjoie, Maister John Cook Archdekin of Lincoln, and Sir Tho. Thwaytes Kt. answering to the Lettre of the Lord Dynham, late direct unto the Kinges Grace, as then Protector of England. Which Lettre resteth in four principal Poyntes.

"The first Article remembred the Othe which they of Calais, perteynyng to any of the thre Jurisdiccions; that Incontinent upon the knowlege of the Deth of King Edward III. (whom God assoil) comen unto them, made holy together upon a Book, to be true unto King Edward V. his Son, as to their Liege Lord, and to kepe the Town, Castell and Marches of Calais trusty to him: And to suffer no Man with Power to entre into the same, except the Kinges Person, or the Hastings then being the Kinges Lieutenant, and not without due Payment to be made to the Souldiers and other Officers of al that to them shal be found due, for the save keeping of the said Town and Marches.

"As to that Article, it shal move beside, that howbeit suche othe of Ligeaunce was made sone upon the Deth of the said King Edward III. to his Sone, not only at Calais, but also in divers places in England by many gret Aftates and Personages, being than ignorant of the verraye sure and true Title, which our Soverayn Lord that now is King Richard the III. hath and had the same tyme to the Crowne of England; that Othe notwithstanding now every good true English man is bound, upon knowlege had of the said verraye true Title, to depart from the first Othe so ignorantly gyven to him, to whom it apperteyneth not, and thereupon to make his Othe of newe, and owe his Service and Fidelite to him, that good Lawe, Reason, and the concorde assent of the Lordes and Commons of the Royallme have ordeigned to reigne upon the People, which is our said Soverayn Lord King Richard III. brother to the said King Edward III. late deceased, whom God Pardon: Whose sure and true Title is evidently shewed and declared in a Bill of Petition, which the Lordes Spirituels and Temporels, and the Commons of the Land solemnely porrected unto the Kinges Highness at London the XXVI day of Juyn. Whereupon the Kinges said Highness notably assisted by wel nere al the Lordes Spirituel and Temporell of this Royallme, went the same day unto the Palais at Westminster; and ther in such Roial Honourable apparelled within the gret Hal ther toke Possession, and declared his Mind, that the same day he wold begin to reygne upon his People. And from thence rode solemnly to the Cathedral Church of London; and was received ther with Procession, with gret Congratulation and acclamacion of al the People in every place, and by the weye that the King was in that day. The Copie of the which Bill the King wil to be sent unto Calais, and ther to be redd and understood togredre with these presentes: Desiring right effectuoullie al maner persones of the said three Jurisdiccions, what aftate, degre or condition they be of; and also them of Gusnes and Hammes, to make their Feithes and Othes to him, as to their Soverayn Lorde; like as the Lordes Spirituels and Temporels, and many other Noblemen in gret numb're, being in England, frely and of goode hert, have done, for ther partes: And that the said Towne of Calais, al Castells and Fortresses, being within the said Marches, they wil saufly kepe unto the behoove of our said Lord King Richard the III. and them not deliver to any Person, but by his Commandement onely, &c. J. S.

These Resolutions of dethroning K. Edward V. and of making Richard King were very suddenly taken, or else the Players of this Game carryed on their Business very secretly to amuse the People. For the Day of Edward's Coronation was set, which was to be the 21st Day of June. And all solemn Preparation was making for that Purpose, til near the said Day King Edward with the Advice and Order of his Uncle Richard the Protector, appoints and summoneth the Gentlemen that were to be knighted at his Coronation, sending to each of them a Letter to this Tenor, viz.

"To Ours Gilbert Elq; Trusty and Welbelov'd, We Grete you well. And by the Advice of our dearest Uncle, the Duke of Gloucester Protector of this Our Royallme during our young Age, and the Lords of our Councel, we write unto you at this time, Willing and ne the less charging you, to prepare and furnish your self to receive the Noble Order of Knighthood at our Coronation: Which by Gods Grace we intend shal be Solempniz'd the one and twentieth Day of this present Month at our Palace of Westminster; Commanding you to be here at our Tower of London four Days afore our said Coronation, to have Communication with our Commissioners concerning the Matter: not failing hereof in any Wise, as ye intend to please us, and as ye will answer, Yeven the 5 Day of June.

But now to the progress of our Story, where the Barons and Commons with one General Dislike, and an Universal Negative Voice, refused the Sons of King Edward, not for any Ill Will or Malice, but for their Disabilities and Incapacities; the Opinions of those Times too held them not Legitimate, and the Queen Elizabeth Gray, or Woodvill, no lawful Wife, nor yet a Woman worthy to be the King's Wife, by reason of her extream unequal Quality. For these and other Causes, the Barons and Prelates unanimously cast their Election upon the Protector, as the most worthiest, and nearest, by the experience of his own Deservings, and the strength of his Alliance, importuning the Duke of Buckingham to become their Speaker, who accompanied with many of the Chief Lords, and other Grave and Learned Persons, having Audience granted in the Great Chamber at Baynard's Castle, (then York-House) thus address'd him to the Lord Protector:

The Duke of Buckingham to the Protector in the behalf of the 3 Estates.

The common publish'd Stories have Elizabeth Lucy, but that is false.

SIR, May it please your Grace to be inform'd, that after much Grave Consultation amongst the Noble Barons, and other Worthy Persons of this Realm, it stands concluded and resolv'd, That the Sons of King Edward shall not reign; for who is not sensible, how Miserable a Fortune, and Dangerous Estate that Kingdom must be in, where a Child is King, according to the Wise Man, Ve tibi terra cuius Rex est Puer. But here, Sir, there is Exception of further consequence against them, That they were not born in lawful Marriage, the King having then another Wife living, Dame Elizabeth Butler: Besides the great Dishonour and Reproach he receiv'd by disparaging his Royal Blood, with a Woman so far unmeet for his Bed. These Considerations have resolutely turn'd all their Eyes and Election towards your Grace, as only worthy of it, by your singular Virtues, and that Interest in the Crowns of England and of France, with the Rights and Titles, by the High Authority of Parliament, entail'd to the Royal Blood and Issue of Richard Duke of York, whose lawful begotten Son and Heir you are; which, by a Just Course of Inheritance and the Common Laws of this Land, is divid'd and come to you. And unwilling that any Inferiour Blood should have the Dominion of this Land, are fully determin'd to make your Grace King; to which, with all Willingness and Alacrity, the Lords and People of the Northern Parts concur. And the Mayor, Aldermen and Commons of the City of London, have all allow'd, and gladly embraced this general Choice of your Grace; and are come hither to beseech you to accept their Just Election, of which they have chosen me their unworthy Advocate and Speaker. I must therefore again crave leave, in the behalf of all, to desire your Grace will be pleas'd, in your Noble and Gracious Zeal to the Good of this Realm, to cast your Eyes upon the growing Distresses and Decay of our Estate, and to set your happy Hand to the redress thereof; for which, we can conceive no Abler Remedy, than by your undertaking the Crown and Government, which we doubt not shall accrew to the Laud of God, the Profit of this Land, and your Grace's Happiness.

This Speech of the Duke is recorded by Dr. Morton, Sir Thomas Moor, and other Chronicles and Historians, to which the Protector gave this Reply:

MY most Noble Lords, and my most Loving Friends, and Dear Country-men, The Answer of the Lord Protector to the 3 Estates.
 Albeit I must confess, your Request most respectful and favourable, and the Points and Necessities alludg'd and urg'd true and certain, yet for the Entire Love and Reverend Respect I owe to my Brother deceased and to his Children, my Princely Couzens, you must give me leave, more to regard mine Honour and Fame in other Realms; for where the Truth and Certain Proceedings herein are not known, it may be thought an Ambition in me to seek what you voluntarily proffer, which would charge so deep a Reproach and Stain upon my Honour and Sincerity, that I would not bear for the World's Diadem: Besides, you must not think me ignorant (for I have well observ'd it) there is more difficulty in the Government of a Kingdom, than Pleasure; especially to that Prince who would use his Authority and Office as he ought. I must therefore desire, that this (and my unfeigned Protestations) may assure you, the Crown was never my Aim, nor suits my Desire with yours, in this; yet I shall think my self much beholding unto you all in this Election of me, and that Hearty Love I find you bear me, and here protest, that for your sakes it shall be all one, whether I be your King or no; for I will serve my Nephew faithfully and carefully, with my best Counsels and Endeavours, to defend and preserve him and his Kingdom; nor shall there want readiness in me, to attempt the Recovery of that Hereditary Right in France, which belongs to the King's of England, tho' of late negligently and unhappily lost.

There the Protector became silent, and thought it not safe in his Discretion or Policy, to open all the Disgusts he had of the Sovereignty, for that would have been Matter of Exprobration of the Barons, and touch'd too near the Quick, tho' he had well observ'd, by sundry Experiences of the Leading Times, and Modern too, the inconstant ebbing and flowing of their Dispositions, how variable and apt they were to take up any occasion of Change, pursuing their Kings (if once stirr'd) so implacably, that many times they never left without Death or Deposing. Examples he had in the Reigns of King Edward his Brother, and Henry VI. not long before that in the time of Richard II. and his Grandfather Edward II. more anciently the Extream Troubles and Distress of King John, and Henry III. all by the Barons, being dreadful Warnings and insolent Monuments of their Haughtiness and 1483. Levity; and this was Alta mente repostum with the Wife Prince.

But the Duke of Buckingham, thinking the Protector set too slight a Consideration upon so Great a Concernment, and the Affection tender'd by himself and the Nobility (and over-hearing something he privately spake to the Lord Mayor and Recorder, tending to his dislike) for an Epilogue or Close to his former Oration, he thus freely adds.

The bold and round Conclusion of the Duke of Buckingham.

"SIR, I must now, by the Priviledge of this Employment, and in the Behalf of those and my Country, add so much Freedom unto my Duty, as to tell your Grace, It is immovably resolv'd by the Barons and People, That the Children of King Edward shall not Reign over them. Your Grace hath heard some Causes; nor need I intimate, how these Estates have entred and proceeded so offensively to other Men, and so dangerously to themselves, as is now too late to recal or retire. And therefore, they have fixt this Election upon you, whom they think most able and careful for their Safety: But, if neither the General Good, the Earnest Petitions of the Nobility and Commonalty, can move you, we most humbly desire your Answer and Leave to Elect some other that may be worthy of the Imperial Charge; in which (we hope) we shall not incur your Displeasure, considering the Desperate Necessity of our Welfare and Kingdom urges it. And this is our last Suit and Petition to your Grace.

The Protector touch'd by this round and brave Farewel, which made him very sensible: For (as Sir Thomas Moor discreetly confesseth) the Protector was so much moved with these Words, that otherwise of likelihood he wou'd never have inclined to their Suit: And faith, That when he saw there was no remedy, but that he must either at that Instant take the Crown, or both he and his Heirs irrecoverably let it pass to another; peradventure, one that might prove an Enemy to him and his, especially if Richmond slept in; betwixt whom and this Prince, the Hatred was equally extream: Therefore it behoved the Protector to collect himself; and fixing his Consideration upon the effect of that Necessity they last urged, gave this Reply:

The Protector's Reply to the Duke's last Suit. "MY most Noble good Lords, and most loving and faithful Friends, the better sense of your Loves and most Eminent Inconveniences insinuated by your Noble Speaker, hath made me more serious to apprehend the Benefit of your Proffer and Election. And I must confess, in the Meditation thereof, I find an Alteration in my self, not without some Distraction when I consider all the Realm so bent against the Sons of King Edward. And therefore being certain, there is no Man to whom the Crown by Just Title can be so due as to our self, the rightful Son and Heir of our most Dear and Princely Father, Richard Duke of York; to which Title of Blood and Nature, your Favours have joyn'd this of Election, wherein we hold our self to be most strong and safe: And having the lawful Power of both, why shou'd I endure my profess'd Enemy to Usurp my Right, and become a Vassal to my Envious Subject? The necessity of these Causes (as admitting no other Remedy) urges me to accept your Offer; and according to your Request, and our own Right, we here assume the Regal Preheminence of the

Two Kingdoms, England and France, from this Day forward, by us and our Heirs, to Govern and Defend the one, and by God's Grace and your Good Aids, to Recover and Establish the other to the ancient Allegiance of England; desiring of God to live no longer than we intend and endeavour the Advancement and flourishing Estate of this Kingdom.

At which they all cry'd, God save King Richard: And thus he became King. But yet his Detractors stick not to Slander and Accuse all that was said or done in these Proceedings of State for mere Dissimulation; by which Justice, they may as well censure (At sit Reverentia dictum) all the Barons, worthy and Grave Commons, which had there Votes therein, which wou'd fall a most impudent and intolerable Scandal upon all the High Court of Parliament; for in short time after, all that was alledg'd and acted in that Treaty and Colloquy was approved and ratified by the Court of Parliament, so that their Cavils only discover an Extream Malice and Envy. For it was not possible, therefore not credible, he cou'd upon such an instant (as it were) by any Practice, attain to that Power and Credit, with all the Barons, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, to procure and persuade them from the Sons of King Edward, so unanimously to become his Subjects, and put the Crown upon his Head with such Solemnity and Publick Ceremonies. Whilst these Matters had their current, the Northern Gentlemen and his Southern Friends joyn'd in a Bill Supplicatory to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, earnestly expressing their Desires for the Election of the Lord Protector, with the former Causes urg'd: Also That the Blood of the Young Earl of Warwick was Attainted, and his Title Confiscate by Act of Parliament. This Bill was deliver'd to the Lords, assembled in the Great Hall at Westminster, the Lord Protector sitting in the Chair of Marble amongst them, upon the 26th of June, some Six or Seven Days after he was Proclaim'd: The Tenour of the Bill was thus written in the Chronicle of the Abbey of Croyland:

117. Abb. Croyland.

Protector eodem die, quo Regimen sub Titulo Regii Nominis sibi vendicavit (viz.) 26<sup>o</sup> die Junii, Anno Dom. 1483. se apud Magnam Aulam Westmonasterii in Cathedram Marmoream Immisit & tum mox omnibus proceribus tam Laicis quam Ecclesiasticis & ceteris assidentibus, assistantibus &c. ostendebatur rotulus quidam, in quo per modum supplicationis in nomine procerum & Populi Borealis exhibitum sunt, Primum, quod Filii Regis Edwardi erant Bastardi, supponendo, illum pracontraxisse matrimonium cum quadam Domina Elianora Boteler, antequam Reginam Elizabetham duxisset in Uxorem: Deinde quod Sanguis alterius Fratris (Georgii Scilicet Clarentiae Ducis) fuisset Attinctus. Ita quod nullus certus incorruptus Sanguis Linealis ex parte Richardi Ducis Eboraci poterat inveniri, nisi in Persona Richardi Protectoris, Ducis Glocestriae, & jam eidem Duci supplicabant, ut jus suum in Regno Angliae sibi assumeret & Coronam acciperet.

In English thus:

"THE Protector, that same Day, wherein he took upon him the Government, under the Royal Name and Title, being the 26th of June 1483. seated himself in the Marble Chair in the Great Hall of Westminster; after which, all the Lords, as well Temporal as Spiritual, and others sitting, or standing by, &c. a certain Writing was produc'd, wherein, " by 1483. "by way of Humble Petition, in the Name of the Gentry and Northern People, was represented, First, That the Sons of King Edward were Bastards upon account of his having entered before into a Contract of Marriage with the Lady Eleanor Boteler, before his Marriage with Queen Elizabeth: And next, That the Blood of the other Brother, George Duke of Clarence, was Attainted. Infomuch, that none being to be found that was undoubtedly of a Lawful and Lineal Descent from Richard Duke of York, besides Richard the Protector, Duke of Gloucester, they therefore Humbly Petition'd the said Duke to take to himself his Right unto the Kingdom of England, and to Accept of the Crown.

Camden.

But the Barons were all accorded before this Bill came, (b) both Sides moving with an equal and contented forwardness; and in July next following 1483. was Crown'd and Receiv'd with as general Magnificence and Acclamations, as any King in England many Years before. For as a Grave Man writeth, (i) Fuit dignissimus Regno, &c. non inter malos sed bonos principes Commemorandus; That he was most worthy to Reign, and to be numbred amongst the Good, not Bad Princes. The Queen his Wife was Crown'd with him, and with no less State and Greatness; Accompanied him from the Tower to Westminster, having in their Train (besides the Nobility of the South Parts) Four Thousand Gentlemen of the North (k). Upon the 19th of June 1483. in the 25th Year of Lewis the French King, he was named King of England, the Morrow Proclaim'd, and Rode with Great Solemnity from London to Westminster, where in the Seat Royal, he gave the Judges of the Land a Strict and Religious Charge for the Just Executing of the Laws; then departed towards the Abbey, being met at the Church Door with Procession, and the Scepter of King Edward deliver'd to him by the Abbot; so ascended to St. Edward's Shrine, where he offer'd; the Monks in the mean time singing Te Deum: From thence he return'd to the Palace, where he Lodg'd until his Coronation.

His Eldest Son, Sir Thomas Howard, was at the same time Created Earl of Surrey, and made Knight of the Garter; Henry Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, was made Constable of England for term of Life, but he claim'd the Office by Inheritance.

Sir Thomas Moor writes, That Sir Thomas Howard executed the Office of Constable that Day; William Lord Berkley was Created Earl of Nottingham, Francis Lovel Viscount Lovel, and Chamberlain to the King; the Lord Stanley restor'd to Liberty and made Steward of the Household (l), Thomas Rotherham, Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury, having been committed for delivering the Great Seal to the Queen Widow, receiv'd to Grace, and many Knights Adubb'd of the Old Order, and some of the New, or Habit of the Bath, whose Names I have set down, to shew what regard was had of their Family, and in those Times accused of so much Malignity.

(i) Compare this Quotation out of Camden with what that Author says of K. Richard in his Brit. sub Tit. Leicestershire; speaking of Bosworth. Here Henry Earl of Richmond encounter'd King Richard III. who had by most Wicked Means Urs'd the Kingdom: He overcame and slew the Usurper, and freed England by his Valour from the Rule of a Tyrant. Besides, he does not tell us where Camden speaks so well of him.

† This Title this young Prince enjoy'd but a small time: For as he was Created about the 8th of Septemb. he was dead before the 21st of July the next Year, as may be collected from a Warrant of K. Richard to Nicholas Leventhorp, Receiver of the Dutchy of Lancaster, order'd thereby to pay to John Dawney, late Treasurer of Pomfret 139l. 10s. due to him for divers Provisions and Emptions by him made for the expence (as the Warrant ran) of our most Dear Son, whom God pardon. Which last Words bespeak him now dead. This bare Date July the 21. Anno 2do. But before his Death, the King his Father heaped up all the Honour he cou'd upon him: He made the Lord Prime, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for Three Years; confirm'd his Title of Earl of Arum anew to him; constituted Great Officers in his Household, whereof I find William Herbert was his Secretary, for which he had XL Mark assign'd him for his Salary yearly out of the Honour of Pomfret, F. He was (if we may give credit to the King his Father's Patents to Create him Prince of Wales) of great hopes for his Excellent Parts and Disposition. of 1483. of that Day's Bravery, his Habit and Caparisons of Blew Velvet, Embroider'd with Golden Naves of Carts burning, the Trappings supported by Foot-men, habited costly and suitable. On the Morrow, being the 6th of July, all the Prelates, Miter'd in their Pontificalibus, receiv'd him at Westminster-Hall towards the Chapel; the Bishop of Rochester bare the Cross before him, the Cardinal and the Earl of Huntingdon follow'd with a pair of Gilt Spurs, and the Earl of Bedford with St. Edward's Staff for a Relick. After the Procession, the Earl of Northumberland bears a Pointless Sword naked, the Lord Stanley the Mace of the Constableship (but waited not for Constable) the Earl of Kent bare the Second Sword naked with a Point upon the Right hand of the King, the Viscount Lovel another Sword on the King's Left Hand with a Point. Next came the Duke of Suffolk with a Scepter, the Earl of Lincoln with the Ball and Cross, then the Earl of Surrey with the Sword of State in a rich Scabbard in Place of the Constable of England, the Duke of Norfolk on his Right hand with the Crown: After him immediately, the King in a Sur-coat and Robe of Purple, the Canopy born by the Barons of the Five Ports, the King between the Bishop of Bath and Durham, the D. of Buckingham bearing up his Train, and serv'd with a White Staff for Seneshal or High-Steward of England.

In the Front of the Queen's Train, the Earl of Huntingdon bare the Scepter, Viscount Lisle the Rod with the Dove, the Earl of Wiltshire her Crown, and next to him follow'd the Queen herself (in Robes like the King) between Two Bishops, the Canopy born by Barons of the Ports, upon her Head a Coronet set with Precious Stones; the Lady Margaret Somerset, Countess of Richmond, carried up her Train, follow'd by the Dutcheffs of Suffolk, with many Countesses and other Ladies. In this manner the whole Procession pass'd through the Palace, and entred the West Door of the Abby, the King and Queen taking their Seats of State, stay'd until divers Holy Hymns were sung, then ascended to the High Altar shifting their Robes, and putting on other open and voided in sundry Places for their Anointing; which done, they took other Robes of Cloth of Gold, so return'd to their Seats, where the Cardinal of Canterbury and the other Bishops Crowned them, the Prelate putting the Scepter in the Left Hand of the King, the Ball and Cross in his Right, and the Queen's Scepter in her Right Hand, and the Rod with the Dove in her Left; on each Hand of the King stood a Duke, before him the Earl of Surrey with the Sword as aforesaid; on each Hand of the Queen stood a Bishop, by them a Lady kneeling, the Cardinal said Mass, and gave the Pax; then the King and Queen descending, were both hous'd with one Host parted between them at the High Altar: This done, they Offer'd at St. Edward's Shrine, where the King laid down St. Edward's Crown and put on another, so return'd to Westminster-Hall in the same State they came, there disperfed, and retired themselves for a Season. In which Interim, came the Duke of Norfolk, Marshal of England, mounted upon a brave Horse, trapp'd with Cloth of Gold down to the Ground, to submove the Press of People and void the Hall. About Four of the Clock, the King and the Queen sat to Dinner, the King at the Middle Table of the Hall, and the Queen on his Left Hand; on each side a Countess attending her, holding a Cloth of Plaifance (or rather of * Essuyance) for her Cup: On the King's Right Hand sat the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Ladies were plac'd on one side of a Long Table in the middle of the Hall against them, at another Table the Lord Chancellor and all the Nobles; at a Table next to the Cup-board, the Lord Mayor of London and the Aldermen.

Behind the Barons of the Kingdom sat the Barons of the Ports; there were other Tables for Persons Quality. After all were seated, came the Lord Marshal again, the Earl of Surrey Constable (Pro illa vice tantum) the Lord Stanley, Lord Steward, Sir William Hopton, Treasurer of the Household, and Sir Thomas Piercy, Controulers; they serv'd the King's Board with one Dish of Gold and another of Silver. The Queen was serv'd all in Gilt Vessels, and the Cardinal Archbishop in Silver Dishes.

As soon as the Second Course was served in, Sir Robert Dimock, the King's Champion, makes Proclamation, That whosoever would say, King Richard the Third was not lawfully King, he would Fight with him at all Gutterance, and for Gage thereof threw down his Gauntlet; then all the People cry'd, King Richard, God save King Richard; and this he acted in three several parts of the Hall; then an Officer of the Cellar brought him a Gilded Bowl with Wine, which he drank, and carried the Cup away as his ancient Fee: After that, the Heralds cry'd Largeß thrice, and return'd to the Scaffold. Lastly came the Mayor of London with the Sheriffs, with a Voider, serving the King and Queen with Sweet Wines, who had each of them a Cover'd Cup of Gold for their Reward: By which time the Day began to give way to the Night, the King and Queen departing to their Lodgings.

And this is a Brief and True Relation of his Coronation, testified by all the Best Writers and Chroniclers of our Stories, publick and allow'd, which may confute the Boldness of that Slander, that says, He was not rightfully, and authentically Crown'd, but obscurely and indirectly crept in at the Window. But all Times have De-tractors, and all Courts their Parasites; and many that have admired Princes to their Graves, even there have turn'd from them, with Ingratitude and Murmur. Soon after this the King dismissed, and sent Home all the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, with a straight Charge and Direction to them, the Judges of Oyer and Terminer, with all other Magistrates and Officers in general and particular, for the Equitable and Just Government of their Jurisdictions and Circuits: And it is observ'd, those Times were under as happy an Expectation of Law and Justice, as those, either before or after more flatter'd; which John Hide (a Learned Man, and Doctor of Physick) implies in a Manuscript Poesy of his.

Alone unable to sustain the weight
Of Publick Rule, and judge in each Debate,
To choose a Court of Elders for the State.
So I, elected to the Pond'rous Crown,
On you lay half the Uneasy Burthen down.
First then, Let Vicious Passions be suppress'd,
And banish Love and Hatred from your Breast.
In equal Scales impartial Justice weigh,
Nor to the Poor oppress'd Relief delay;
Let not defrauded Orphans Sue in vain,
Nor be Debauch'd with Baits of proffer'd

All things thus in a Happy Prefage and Good Order, the King, with the Queen, departed from London, and makes Windsor the first Gist in his Progress for some few Days: From thence to his Mannor of Woodstock, then to the University of Oxford, where the Muses Crown'd their Brows with fragrant Wreaths for his Entertainment. Next he visited the Circular City of Gloucester, and gave the Citizens (for the Love and Loyalty they express'd, in Holding the Castle and Town so constantly against Queen Margaret and the Forces of Henry the Sixth, for him and his Brother the King) large Priviledges and Immunities.

And here the Duke of Buckingham takes his leave for Brecknock, constantly disposed and affected in all outward appearance. The King making small stay any where, (save at Coventry) until he came to the goodly and ancient City of York, the Scope and Goale of his Progress, which receiv'd him with all Honour and Festivity, and was there the second time Crown'd by Dr. Rothem, Archbishop of that See, in the Cathedral Church, and his Son invested in the Principality of Wales, as the Prior of Croyland reporteth; Eodem die quo Richardus Coronatus est Rex in Ecclesia Metropolitana Eboracensi, mox Filium Edwardum in Principatum Wallie cum insignis virga aurea &c. exevxit. & Pomposa & sumptuosa festa & convivium ibi fecit ||.

Re. Corson, Prince; in acclamation whereof, there was Stage

Capt. of Calais. Intermission, as it were, of all Busie and Serious Agitations) yet the King, still where he travell'd had a Just Regard to the Administration and Execution of Justice and the more Facinorous Malefactors: And surely these respective Inclinations of his had their Solemn Affections and Desires naturaliz'd in him, witness'd by the Scope and Integrity of those Just Laws which after follow'd.

The Progress thus spent, he returns to London; and having consulted some Matters of State, declares his first Resolution for the Tribute detain'd by France, which he had formerly by a Friendly Message demanded, but now sends Stout Menaces and Threats for it. The French would not have it call'd a Tribute, but a Pension, as Philip de Comines insinuates, though it had been rais'd and paid to King Edward IV. in lieu of the Dutchy and Countries of Aquitaine, Normandy, Poitou and Maine, &c. whereof the French had seiz'd the Crown of England, which King Edward IV. forc'd Lewis to acknowledge, and to covenant and agree, That he, his Heirs and Successors, should pay unto the Crown of England, the Sum of Fifty Thousand Crowns, with caution and security to be paid in the City of London; or after Jean Tillet and John Maiernus, Seventy Five Thousand Crowns to be paid into the Tower; with which the French King also granted, in the name of Annual Pension, Sixteen

Thousand Pounds to some Noblemen and others of special credit with the King. As to Sir Thomas Gray, Marquess of Dorset, William Lord Hastings, Chamberlain to the King, Doctor Thomas Rotbram, Bishop of Lincoln and Lord Chancellor of England; John Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyney, Master of the Horse; Sir Thomas Mountgomery, Mr Challoner, and to the Master of the Rolls: The chiefeft of these had Two Thousand Crowns a piece per Ann. Besides which Pensions, he gave Rich Presents, and sent Rewards to such Lords as stood most for this accord. Euguerant de Monstroulet avoucheth, That the Lord Howard and the Master of the Horse, were the chiefeft of the Mediators in it: his reason is, that they were the Men most in favour with King Edward. Jean Tillet, with Philip de Comines tells us, The Lord Howard in less than Two Years, had the value of Twenty Four Thousand Crowns in Plate, Coin and Jewels, over and above his Annual Pension; the Lord Hastings at one time to the value of Two Thousand Marks in Plate, besides his Pension. || i. e. That same Day wherein Richard was crown'd King in the Metropolitan Church of York, he advanced his Son Edward to the Principality of Wales, with the Ensigns of the Goldeu Rod, &c. and there celebrated most splendid and sumptuous Feasts.

† In order to this Solemnity, the King sent from York the last Day of August, to Piers Curteis, Keeper of his Wardrobe; in these Words:

By the KING.

* He knighted also Gaufridus de Sasiola, Ambassador from the Queen of Spain, being present at this Solemnity; by putting a Collar of Gold about his Neck, and striking three times upon his Shoulders with his (the King's) Sword, and agreeable Words added, and by other Marks of Honour according to the English Custom. In testimony whereof the King gave him his Letters Patents, dated at his Court at York, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the King's Court being present, in the Act of the said Prince Edward's Creation, on the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, which was the 8th Day of September, 1483. wick, 1483. wick, had of the Kings of France much more than any other English Nobleman, which the Chronicle of Brittain seconds. And doubtless, King Richard had still compell'd him to continue it, had not Eruptions of State and Tumultuary Practices fatally deterr'd his Sword: For as Kings have vaster Limits, they have higher Bounds than others. If our Vulgar Paths be rugged, theirs are slippery, and all their Mighty Resolutions and Ambitions have their Fate and Circle; hither they must, and no further; yet as envious as Fortune shew'd her self, he brought King Lewis to Terms of Fair Promises and Mediation for time of Payment, as Comines obscurely implies.

The Q.
Mother & K. Richard
reconcil'd.

This Year the King kept a very Magnificent Chistmas at Westminster, and was reconciled to the Queen Dowager, who left Sanctuary,* and to congratulate the King's Favour, sent her Five Daughters to Court, where they were receiv'd with all Princely Kindness.

The Parliament of Rich. 3.

On the Three and Twentieth Day of January, in the First Year of his Reign, he summon'd a Parliament to be holden at Westminster, in which (after the enacting of many Good Laws) the Marriages of King Edward were debated, that with the Lady Gray adjudg'd unlawful, and her Children illegitimate, there being proof of a former Contract and Marriage with the Lady Eleanor Talbot, Daughter of the Old Earl of Shrewsbury, and Relict of the Lord Butler of Sudeley, then and long after living, and all that had been inferr'd by the Duke of Buckingham, or contain'd in the Bill supplicatory, demonstrated, was again consulted, and Judgment given against that Marriage, and Incapacity of the Children also of the Earl of Warwick and his Sister, the Lady Elizabeth Plantagenet, all decreed and confirm'd by Act of Parliament; so that here to tax so general an Assent, were to say there was not one Honest nor Just Man in that High Court, and what greater Scandal to the whole Kingdom?

There was likewise notice taken of the Earl of Richmond's Pretence to the Crown, by a Title deriv'd from the House of Lancaster, who was at that time in France, labouring to engage the King and the Duke of Brittain in the Quarrel. Oh! the infinite Windings and Perplex'd Sleeps we labour through, to get that we must bid Goodnight to To morrow; and yet the True and Rightful Lancaster had no Finger in it, for this Earl was not then granted to be of the House of Lancaster, until the Pope by his Bull had given him that Stile, and himself (after he was King) by his Prerogative assum'd it. In this Parliament he was attainted of High Treason, and with him John Earl of Oxford, Thomas Marquess of Dorset, Jasper Earl of Pembroke, Lionel Bishop of Salisbury, Peirce Bishop of Exeter, the Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond, Thomas Morton Bishop of Ely, Thomas Naudick, by the stile of Thomas Naudick of Cambridge, Conjuror, William Knevet of Buckingham smear'd with the same Pitch, George Brown of Beechworth, Thomas Lukenor of Tratton, John Guilford, John Fogg, Edward Poinings, Thomas Fieries of Cherstonceur, Nicholas Gainsford, William Clifford, John Dorrell, with others of Kent || and the West Countrey. There was further enacted for the approbation and confirming the True and Lawful Title of King Richard, this Clause or Sentence:

"It is declared, pronounced, decreed, confirm'd and establish'd by the Authority of this present Parliament, That King Richard III. is the true and undoubted King of this Realm, as well by Right of Consanguinity and Heritage, as by Lawful Election and Coronation, &c. And in a place of the Roll of this Parliament, † there are Arguments to be gathered, that the Two Sons of K. Edward were living in the time of this Parliament, which was at * This cannot be true, for she was certainly in Sanctuary in March following with five of her Daughters, viz. Elizabeth, Cecil, Anne, Katharine and Bridget: Nor could this Queen, which was now undervalued by the Name of Dame Jane Gray, be persuaded to leave the Sanctuary by any Entreaty hitherto. Inasmuch, that the King, on the First Day of March, in the presence of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, solemnly swore upon the Gospels, "That if she would come to him out of the Sanctuary at Westminster, he would provide for her and for her Daughters, as his Kinswomen; and that they should be in no danger of their Lives; and that he would allow her 700 Mark a Year; and her Daughters 200 Mark apiece for their Portions in Marriage, and would take care to marry them to Gentlemen. And to this his Oath he set his Sign Manual, as may be seen more at large in certain Notes in the Third Book. For he had left this Queen in a very bare condition, having possess'd himself (and that by Act of Parliament) of all her Castles, Seignuories, Mannors, Lands, Tenements, Farms, Fee-Farms, Franchises, Liberties and other Hereditaments, made over to her at any time, either by Confirmation, State or Act of Parliament, all from the 1st day of May last, to be utterly void, annull'd and of no strength nor effect in Law; Thus roughly had King Richard dealt with her. And this was done by an Act of Parliament that sat after Christmas, when this Author relates she left the Sanctuary, and the king was reconciled to her. J. S.

|| This Inturrection of the Gentry in Kent was strong, so that soon after it was over, King Richard himself hasten'd thither in Person; and a severe Proclamation was set forth for the Taking of those concerned in it; and Who, and of what Quality they were, and what the Rewards were of such as should take them, the ensuing Proclamation will discover.

"The King, our sovereign Lord, remembering that many and divers of his True Subjects of this his County of Kent, have now late been abused and blinded by Sir John Gilford, Sir Thomas Lowkenor, Sir William Hawte Knyts, Edward Poyngs, Richard Gilford, William Cheney, Thomas Penys, Will. Brandon, John Wingfeld, Anth. Kene, Nic. Gaynsford, John Isley, Rauf Tikhill, Anthony Browne, John Pympe, Rob. Brent, Long Roger, Richard Potter, Richard Fisher, Sir Markus Eussen Priest, and others the King's Rebels and Traitors, which imagin'd and utterly conspyred the Destruction of the kyng the Sovereign Lords most Royal Person, the Subversion of his Royallme, and the Common-welfare of the same: And many of his said Subjects of this his County of Kent, when they knew and understood their said conspyred Treasons, left and forsook them, and as his true Subjects thence have well and truly behaved themselves. For the which the kynges Grace standeth, and wol be to them good and gracious sovereign Lord; and willet and desyreth al his said true Subjects to put them in their effectual Devoirs to take his said Rebels and Traitors; and graunteth that he or they chat shal hap to take the said Sir John Gilford, &c. Renold Pimroe, &c. shal have for each of them 300 Mark, or 40 l. of Land. And for ever each of the other after named 100 l. or Ten Mark of Land; and great Thanks of the Kynges Grace; and over this, the kynges wolle it be known, that if any Person harbour, lodge, comfort, succour or kepe within his House, or otherwise ayd or receive wytingly any of the said Traitors, and disclose them not, nor bring them to the Kyng in al good hast possyble after thys Proclamation, that then he or they so harbouring, ayding, comforting, succouring or lodging them, or any of them hereafter to be taken and reputed as the Kynges Rebels and Traitors. And also, that no Man presume, after this Proclamation, to keep any Goods or Cattals of the said Traitors; but them utter and shew to the Kynges Commissioners, in this hys said County of Kent, assign'd and appoynted. And they that so truly wil shew it shal be wel rewarded, and they that do the contrary shal be punished according to the Law. J. S.

† The Author would have done much towards the Credit of what he drives at in his History, to have specified this place of the Roll, and the Words thereof, whence such Arguments might be gathered. For all History relates the Murthers to be committed before this time. J. S.
